VI. Grotius ^b proposes another way of solving the Difficulty under our present Debate: He says, that the first Introducers of distinct Proprieties must be understood to have done it with this Exception and Limitation, that the Right of this Propriety excluding others from the Use of every Man's proper Goods ought then to expire and to give place, when another cannot possibly without making use of them, be sustain'd or preserv'd: And consequently, that in such a Case of Necessity a Thing possess'd in peculiar, when another Man's Life cannot be sav'd without it, is turn'd again into common. Or, what amounts to the same Purpose, that when Men originally instituted separate Proprieties, they agreed by mutual Covenant, to forbear using the particular Goods of each other, any farther than the Owner should give leave: Yet so as to make it allowable in extreme Necessity, for a Man to seize on any Thing absolutely requisite for his Preservation, as if it still lay in its primitive Indifference and Community. For since in written Laws, that Interpretation is to be follow'd which recedes the least from natural Equity, he presumes this will hold more strongly in regard to Customs, which obtain only by tacit Agreement. And surely it must be in the highest Degree equitable, that a Man be permitted to save his Life, by using any thing at hand, when all other Means fail him.

But this Exposition lies open to several Exceptions and Difficulties: For if Necessity gives a Man a Right of seizing on the Goods of others, as if they lay in common, what hinders but that, if he have sufficient Strength, ^c he may take them from the Owners, when they themselves are at the same time pinch'd with the like Necessity? Yet this Grotius doth by no means allow. Again, Grotius requires Restitution to be made in these Cases: But I am oblig'd to no such Duty, when I take a Thing by virtue of my Right. Besides, he forgot to mention how different the Case is, when a Man falls under such Necessity by his own Sloth or Negligence, and when it comes on him without his Fault. Which Distinction being omitted, a Right seems to be given to idle Knaves, whose Vices have brought them into want, to seize forcibly for their own Use the Fruits of other Mens honest Labours; and so continuing their Poverty and their Laziness together, to put a Necessity on industrious Persons of feeding such useless Bellies for nothing. But all wise Men, as they allow such as are innocently miserable to deserve Assistance and Relief; so they advise us to pack off mendicant Drones and Lubbards, with the old Answer that the Ant gave the Grasshopper in the Fable ^e. Since then it is lawful for every Proprietor to distinguish between such as are indigent out of Misfortune, and such as are reduc'd to the same Condition by their own Demerit and Neglect; 'tis plain, that he has such a Right over his own Goods, as shall in some measure prevail even against a Person in extreme Necessity: So far at least as that he shall have the Privilege of judging, whether the Man be an Object worthy of his Relief, or not; that it may be in his Power to oblige and win a necessitous Person by his seasonable Succours: For nothing raises the Value of a Kindness so much as its being done for the Removal of an extreme Distress. But all this Merit and Obligation is cut off, when we give another only what he might otherwise, as his own Right and Due, violently take from us.

We think therefore, that this Point of Dispute will be more clearly determin'd by the Principles and the Method which we have laid down; that is, by saying, in short, that the wealthy Person is bound to relieve him who innocently wants, by an imperfect Obligation; to the performing of which though regularly no Man ought to be compell'd by Violence, yet the Force of extreme Necessity is so great, as to make these Things recoverable by the same Means as those which are truly and rightfully due: That is, by making complaint ² to the Magistrate, or when the

^a See Levit. xxv. 39. Selden L. 6. c. 7. Nothing can be drawn to the contrary from Prov. xxx. 9. Other Authors give this Example of extreme Necessity: A Man being in an unknown Country, is attack'd by an unjust Assailant, and cannot otherwise save himself than by speedy Flight. He find ready at hand a Horse belonging to some Person of the Country, but which he sees no means of restoring, as well because he is ignorant of the Owner, as because he may be oblig'd to ride far to escape the Danger.

^b L. 2. c. 2. f. 6. ^c And thus in Estarch (Apophthegm) when a Captain of Coast-robbers made an Inroad into the Territories of Lacedemon, and being taken, urg'd in his own Defence, That he was neither able of himself to pay his Companions, nor could prevail with those that had Money to supply him; and therefore he ventur'd to take it by Force. Cleomenes call'd this Proceeding, ὄντ μὲν ἡρώδης, A very compendious Wickedness. Add. Pandulf. Collenut. rer. Neapolit. l. 5. p. 373.

^d Grotius in his Notes upon this Text affirms that it ought to be render'd, If he be taken in the Fact, he shall restore sevenfold. i. e. He shall not be oblig'd to any Thing but Restitution, according to the Law prescribed, which supposes always, that the Thief hath something, since he must restore out of it what he has taken. See Exod. xxii.

§ VI. I do not perceive how this can follow from Grotius's Hypothesis. It is certain, that when a Proprietor can't spare the Bread, for Example, or Corn, which he hath for his present Use himself, 'tis not permitted to any other, tho' he be in ever so great Necessity, to take them away from him by Force. But yet the Maxim is no less true, which supposes, that in these last Cases all Things become common, as they were at first; for Community does not at all hinder, but that all which every one is possess'd of for his own Use, should not belong to him only who is in actual Possession of it, altho' the Property is his, and we can't take any thing from him out when he hath an Overplus, and we can't otherwise find any Means to supply our Wants. See what is said I. 5. 4. Chap. 4. Note 2. So that our Author has done well to depend upon other Reasons, which he alleges afterward, and which are sufficient for his Purpose.

^e This is the only Refuge that they have, who believe that the greatest Necessity cannot authorize any Man to take another Man's Goods of himself; but as Mr. Thomasius has observ'd, Instit. Jurisp. Div. Lib. 2. Chap. 2. §. 171. they acknowledge tacitly, that he that is reduced to that troublesome Necessity, has a full Right to require what he wants; for only those Things which are due by virtue of a compleat Obligation, can be the Subject of the Magistrate's Decision.

Urgency of the Distress cannot allow time for such an Expedient, than by seizing what is ready at hand, either in a secret or in an open manner. Now the chief reason why we affirm those things which proceed purely from the Virtue of Humanity, to be owing only by an imperfect Right, is that Men may be allow'd both an occasion of shewing their voluntary Propension to the Discharge of their Duty, and likewise of endearing others to them by their voluntary Benefits. But now if a Man should despise these Considerations, must a poor necessitous Creature be famish'd because he cannot prevail on the unmerciful Miser? Certainly such an inflexible Churl ought rather to be depriv'd of his Gift and of his Merit together; since he had not Heart enough to venture on an Act of common Humanity.

From what has been hitherto offer'd, it is easy to gather the Reasonableness of those Exceptions which Grotius subjoins to his and our main Assertion. For since nothing but inevitable Necessity can justify the taking by force what is owing only upon an imperfect Obligation, in the first place it is clear, that all fairer Courses are first to be tried, as complaining to the Magistrate, begging and intreating, promising Restitution, if we are ever able, or offering to discharge the Debt by equivalent Labour and Service. Secondly, This License can by no means take place, when the Owner of the Thing which we want, lies under as great a Necessity as we ourselves: On the contrary, we suppose the Owner to abound. This Caution or Exception may be extended farther, and we may say, that a distress'd Person cannot fairly take a thing from the Owner without his Consent, if it be only manifest, that upon the Loss of that thing the Owner will hereafter fall into the like indigent Condition. For in these Cases 'tis fit Charity should begin at home. That Rule of the Civil Law which Grotius applies to the present Business, that when the Considerations on both sides are equal, the Case of the present Occupant is to be preferr'd: doth not seem so exactly to hit the Purpose. For that Maxim only imports, that Judgment ought to be given for the Possessor, whilst the Claimant's Title and his are alike disputable. But in the Matter before us, the Possessor's Right and Title are granted, and the only Question is, whether I am oblig'd by the bare Law of Humanity, to perish myself for the sake of preserving another? which is a Paradox that no Man will pretend to maintain. The other Sentence which Grotius applies out of Curtius ^a, is much more proper and more agreeable to the Point; Melior est causa suum non tradentis, quam poscentis alienum. He who refuses to deliver what is his own, has a fairer Cause than he who demands what is another Man's.

Thirdly, We lay it down as an indispensable Condition, that Restitution is to be made if possible; especially if the Thing taken were of great Value, and such as the Owner could not well part with without some Consideration. But if the Thing were small and inconsiderable, and the Loss so light, that the Owner's Fortune could not feel it, 'twill be sufficient, when opportunity serves, to shew that we should not have been wanting in Gratitude, if his Greediness would have given us leave to be obliged to him. As for Grotius's requiring ⁴ Restitution, it seems not to suit with his Hypothesis. For if upon a Case of Necessity the Right of Primitive Communion returns, so as to give a Man a just Title to the Goods of others, then Restitution can on no account be desir'd or demanded. But since this is necessarily to be made, it appears that the Right of the Owner doth not expire thro' the Necessity of the Petitioner; but that he ought voluntarily to have given Relief, either gratis, or upon receipt of the Price of the Thing, or any other Compensation. Which Duty when he neglects to perform, then indeed the Necessity of the distress'd Person gives him a Right of taking the Thing by Force, but still with the same Burden, or under the same Condition which the Owner might have impos'd on him; that is, either to refund the Value hereafter, or at least to make a grateful Acknowledgment of the Benefit.

VII. If we look on other Authors, we shall find them much divided about this difficult Point. The fourth Chapter of the fifth Book of the Decretals ^b, enjoining Penance to Thieves who steal out of Necessity, is by the Gloss expounded of little and indifferent Necessity, not of such as is extreme and insupportable. Covarruvias ^c delivers his Opinion almost to the same purpose as Grotius: The Reason (says he) why a Man in extreme Necessity may, without incurring the Guilt of Theft or Rapine, forcibly take the Goods of others for his present Relief, is, because this Condition renders all things common. For it is the Ordinance and Institution of Nature itself, that inferior things should be design'd and directed to serve the Necessities of Men. Wherefore the Division of Goods afterwards introduc'd into the World, doth not derogate from that Precept of natural Reason, which suggests, that the extreme Wants of Mankind may be in any manner remov'd by the use of temporal Possessions. There is alledg'd a Passage of St. Ambrose from Gratian, Decret. c. Sicut. ii. §. 4. dist. 47. It is the Bread of the Hungry which you detain: It is the Raiment of the Naked which you lock up. Peresius^a, arguing on the same side alledges, that in this Case a Man is compell'd to the Action by a Force which he can't resist; and then, that the Owner's Consent may be presum'd on, because Humanity obliges him to succour those who are in Distress. Besides, he observes, that the necessitous Person doth not properly take the Goods which were another Man's, but which lay in common: And yet he is bound, when he has obtain'd deliverance from his Want, to make fair Restitution. Anton. Matthæus^b is of Opinion that a Distinction should be made in this Case between the Crime and the Punishment; the Crime of the Theft, he says, is not taken off even by extreme Penury, but he would have the Punishment either wholly remitted, or considerably mitigated and abated. Now that the Crime of Theft is committed even under these Circumstances, he endeavours to prove from the Definition of Theft in the Civil Law, which he makes to reach this Action: Theft, the Emperor Justinian tells us, is a fraudulent seizing on the Goods of others, for the sake of making a Gain of them. But we may fairly plead (in Opposition to Matthæus) that neither of these Imputations can fall on the Fact which we defend. For how can this be term'd a fraudulent seizing on another Man's Goods, when both the Owner lay under an imperfect Obligation of giving the Thing desir'd, and the other Person had a Right, by Virtue of his present Condition, to possess himself of it by the most convenient means he could? Nor can he well be said to take a thing of another Man's for the sake of making a Gain of it, who designs it purely for the Relief of his extreme Distress, with full Wishes and Resolutions to restore, or to repay it as soon as possible. That part of his Argument is meer Bravado, where he tells us, that no Violence can compel a wise and a good Man to defile himself wilfully with any uncomely Action: And that in these Cases every one should, as Tully^c advises, rather patiently endure his own Inconvenience, than trespass on the Conveniences of others. Now besides that 'tis an easy matter to talk Philosophically, whilst we do not ourselves feel the Hardship any farther than in Speculation^d; the Fact under Debate can, according to our way of determining it, include no other Turpitude or Indecency, than such as Persons of Breeding and Quality are guilty of, when the severity of Famine compels them to feed on the basest and most filthy Meats. And then the Rule about Conveniences and Inconveniences is beside the Question, which only supposes some little Matter to be taken from a wealthy Person, who doth not feel the Loss, to keep another from perishing by the Extremities of Hunger or of Weather. The same Author observes, on^e the Lex Rhodia de jactu, that tho' for the publick Benefit, in a time of Scarcity, every Man is oblig'd to bring what Corn he has by him into the common Market, yet People are not hereupon impower'd to carry off what they please, because they are in want, and others abound; but the whole Business is to be left to the Care and to the Direction of the Magistrate. But must the Poor therefore be content to starve, when the Magistrates neglect to make due Provision for their Sustainance?

As to what some urge, that there doth not appear any Dispensation of the Law in this Matter, 'tis an Objection that may be easily spar'd. For sufficient Reasons have been given why we may well presume, that the Law which forbids Theft is not to be extended to the present Case.

VIII. Lastly, The Danger and Necessity of our own Goods seems to allow us the Privilege of destroying or of invading those which belong to other Men: Yet with these Proviso's, that the Danger did not happen thro' our Fault; that we cannot find a more convenient way of¹ removing it; that we do not ruin a more valuable Thing of our Neighbour's, for saving one of our own, inferior in Price and Consideration; that, in case the other Thing had not been lost but for our sake, we pay the Price of it; and lastly, that if what belong'd to our Neighbour must have otherwise been destroy'd, together with ours, if we had not preserv'd² the latter by making away with the former, that then we consent to bear a part in the Damage. On this Foundation is grounded the Equity of the Rhodian Law de jactu, by³ which it was provided, that if for the lightning of a Ship the Men were compell'd to throw any Goods overboard, the Loss should be made up by general Contribution, since it happen'd upon account of the general Safety^e. Thus too if my Vessel be driven upon the Cables, or the Nets belonging to another, I have Liberty to⁴ cut them in Pieces, if I cannot otherwise get clear. And if my own Neglect did not bring me into that Trouble, I am to answer but for half the Cost. Thus in a Fire, I may pull down my Neighbour's House for the Security of mine, if I am willing to make good all that he suffers by the Mischief. For tho' in ⁵ one of the *Roman Constitutions*³, it is determin'd, that in case the Fire had actually reach'd to the House that was pull'd down, the Person who procur'd it shall not be responsible; yet the common Opinion inclines more to Equity^b, which asserts, that upon such Demolishment of one House for the Security of many, the Damage shall be repair'd by those neighbouring Inhabitants who thus escap'd the Danger; though the House which they in this manner ruin hath not been touch'd by the Flames. For it would be indeed unreasonably hard, that when ⁶ I have sav'd my own Concerns by destroying those of another Man, the whole Loss should be thrown upon him, whilst the whole Advantage lights on me. From the same Rules and Principles the Roman Lawyers deduce most of their Doctrine concerning that kind of Damage which they call *Dammum Insectum*⁷. Thus, for Example, if my next Neighbour has a ruinous House, very likely to tumble to the Prejudice of my Effects, he shall be oblig'd to give me Security for answering all Damages that I sustain; and if he refuse this Condition, upon applying myself to the Prætor, I obtain ⁸ an Edict, empowering me to enter the ruinous Place. On the same Account they assert, that ⁹ in case a Man has a Field surrounded in such a manner on all sides, by the Lands of others, that he cannot get to it without seemingly committing a Trespass; the Borderers shall be compell'd by the Judge to grant him Passage, at least upon the offering of a reasonable Consideration.

Grotius^d makes this farther Deduction from the Doctrines we have been now laying down, that it is lawful for him who wages a just War to possess himself of a Place seated in a Country that is at Peace with him; if there be certain (and not only imaginary) Danger, that the Enemy will otherwise surprize it, and from thence annoy him with irreparable Mischief: Provided he take nothing but what is necessary to his own Security, as the bare Custody of the Place, leaving both the Jurisdiction and the Profits to the right Owner; and fully purposing to restore the Custody too, so soon as the Necessity that brought him thither shall cease. To these Conditions it should be added, that the Lord of the Place is first to have frequent Notice given him, and to be desir'd that he would himself secure and defend the Place, upon a Promise from the other Prince to defray the Charges; or that he would demolish and render it untenable, if he thinks that the most proper Method. And another equitable Caution is, that in case the new Possessor has expended any Sum in raising Works and Fortifications, the proper Lord is not oblig'd to refund, unless he intended to have built the same Defences himself; inasmuch as the other did not make it his Aim purely to improve the Place, but chiefly to secure his own Territories. Bæcker, in his Notes on this Passage of Grotius, well observes, that it is apparent from the Usage of all Ages and of all Nations, that no one thinks himself oblig'd to allow another thus to seize on any Fort or Place of his¹⁰, if he be able to hinder his Attempt. And that therefore if the other do actually take Possession, the Fact is such as may admit of easy Pardon, but not such as can be fairly and strictly defended on the Grounds of Natural Law. To which Purpose we may consider farther, that 'tis very probable the Enemy may hence entertain a Suspicion, that the Lord of the Place is in secret Confederacy against him; and so the whole Burthen of the War may be easily devolv'd on the third Party. And tho' the Enemy be well

Tit. 24. Quod vi aut clam, Leg. 7. §. 4. See Lib. 9. Tit. 2. Ad Leg. Aquil. Leg. 49. §. 1. and what Mr. Titius says in his Observations in Compens. Jur. Lauterbach. Observ. 420. as also Mr. Noodt ad Leg. Aquil. Chap. 19.

⁶ Mr. Titius hath reason to say, that these Rules are good in Speculation, but the Application is very hard, and almost impracticable in Civil Societies. Indeed, we can't for the most part be assured, that he who hath beat down his Neighbour's House, had reason to think that he could save his own that way, and that he was obliged to it by Necessity; for without this how can we determine, whether he ought to make good the Damage? Moreover, Burnings almost always happen by some Fault, or at least by Imprudence and Negligence, and very often we know not whom to charge them on, or how they began; and if the Author be sometimes discover'd, 'tis found usually that he is unable to make up the Damages of such as have suffer'd. Lastly, When the Fire is come by meer Chance, we can't exactly tell how the neighbouring Houses can be preserved from the Fire by the demolishing of one already beat down, and so 'tis impossible to state exactly who are bound to make good the Damage, and how much each shall contribute. Experience also proves, that upon these sad Occasions, they who received the Damage are constrained to bear it themselves, unless the way of Reparation be fixed beforehand by some Agreement, or Order of State, or the Bounty of others affords them a voluntary Relief. The Order therefore establish'd in some Places, that the Damages that come by such Accidents should be satisfied by the Publick, and so every one is obliged to contribute to the Relief of the Miserable, is highly commendable, Observ. on Pufendorf CL. and on Lauterbach CCCCXX. It is also a wise Establishment, and will be of excellent Use, if it be well managed, which has been lately made in Prussia, where all such as have Houses are obliged to pay some small Annual Rent to the Directors of the Fire-Office, where there is a Bank made up of such Contributions, which are design'd to make good the Damages of such Owners of Houses as are burnt, according to the Valuation made of them, and according to which they pay their Rent.

¹⁰ This has place no less, when the Owner of the Place has no Power to defend himself; for if he can, and doth not, 'tis the same as if he gave Passage to his Neighbour's Enemy; so that this last may look upon him himself as a new Enemy.

fatisfied that the Place was seiz'd without the Leave or Concurrence of the Lord, yet if he resolve and endeavour to dispossess those who hold it, the innocent Prince cannot but feel some Part of the Calamities of Arms; which if he keeps off by any Means, he cannot justly fall under Reprehension. And thus too in a lesser Case, it can never be advisable for a Man to admit more Strangers into his House, than he can conveniently get rid of when he pleases: Since otherwise he is under a Necessity of being at their Disposal; and must perhaps be content to walk out of Doors, and to leave all to his new Masters¹¹.

¹¹ There is not the least Difficulty in the Example alledged by Grotius, in the same Place, concerning them who having need of a Vessel to save themselves, or defend themselves, take the first they meet, and use it upon the Conditions required. See Xenophon de Expedit. Cyri, Lib. 5. Chap. 1. and Mr. Hertius's Discourse de Collisone Legum, Sect. II. §. 14. in Tom. I. of his Opusc. and Comment.

WHAT Duties the Law of Nature enjoyns a Man to exercise towards himself; and what Indulgence, what License, or Favour it allows him in the Preservation of his own Person or Goods, we have hitherto endeavour'd to explain (*). We may now pass on to those other Natural Precepts which contain the Duties we are to practise towards other Men. These we have formerly divid- ed into Absolute, and Hypothetical or Conditional.

In the Series of absolute Duties, or such as oblige all Men antecedently to any human Institution, this seems with Justice to challenge the first and noblest Place, *that no Man hurt another*²; and that in case of any hurt or damage done by him, he shall not to make Reparation³. For this Duty is not only the widest of all in its Extent, comprehending all Men, on the bare account of their being Men; but it is at the same time the most easy of all to be perform'd, consisting for the most part purely in a negative Abstinence from acting; except that its Assistance

§. 1. Not that they are always independent upon every human Act or Establishment. Our Author intimates the contrary clearly at the end of this Paragraph, in numbring up the Things to which this Maxim extends. No Man can be ignorant that we ought not to neglect such Duties of Humanity, as concern Bargaining, as for Example, to refuse to sell any Man what he stands in need of. But the Reason why he calls those Duties, which he treats of in this and the following Chapter, absolute, is because they are the natural Consequence of the universal and original Constitution of Mankind, and ought to be paid to all Men, though they have no other Relation to us, but a bare Similitude of Nature. Whereas conditional Duties always suppose some human Act, Agreement, or other Accident, and oblige only under certain Circumstances, and with relation to certain Persons.

² Nefas est nocere Patria, &c. It is a Crime to injure one's Country, and consequently a Citizen, who is a Member of it. Then we mult injure no Man, because every one is our Fellow-citizen of the great City of the World. Do the Hands endeavour to hurt the Feet, or Eyes the Hands? As therefore the Members of the Body keep a fair Correspondence with one another for the Preservation of the whole: So Men ought to deal friendly one with another, because they are born for Society, which can't be preserv'd, unless all the Parts, of which it is compounded, love one another, and endeavour mutually their own Preservation. Sen. de Ira, l. 2. c. 31. Besides this Passage, which our Author refers to a little lower, please to read, Epiſt. 95. p. 464, &c. Edit. Lugd. Bat. 1672. and Epiſt. 103.

³ All Duties which relate to Society may be compriz'd under these three generals: 1. To do Evil to no Man. 2. To hinder others from doing the Mischief which they threaten to do. 3. To do all the good we can sincerely. These three Principles yield an infinite Number of particular Consequences, according to the difference of Subjects. Our Author speaks here of the first, and of the other two together in Chap. III. of this Book. Titus Obs. 151.

is sometimes necessary in restraining the Lusts and Passions, when they fight and struggle against Reason; amongst which rebellious Desires, that boundless Regard which we sometimes shew to our own private Advantage, seems to be the Principal, and the Ringleader. Besides, it is the most necessary of human Duties, inasmuch as a Life of Society cannot possibly be maintain'd without it. For suppose a Man to do me no good, and not so much as to transact with me in the common Offices of Life, yet provided he do me no harm, I can live with him under some tolerable Comfort and Quiet. And indeed this is all we desire from the greatest Part of Mankind; a mutual Intercourse of good Turns lying only between a few. But what Possibility is there of my living at Peace with him who hurts and injures me; since Nature has implanted in every Man's Breast so tender a Concern for himself, and for what he possesses, that he cannot but apply all Means to resist and repel him, who in either respect attempts to wrong him? Now as the Strength of this Precept is a Guard and a Fence to those Things which we receive from the immediate Hand of Nature, as our Life, our Bodies, our Members, our Chastity, our Reputation, and our Liberty; engaging Men to keep them sacred and inviolable: So must it be supposed to spread itself thro' all those Compacts or Institutions, by which the Propriety of any Thing is made over to us; since without it they could obtain no Force or Effect. Whatever therefore we can on any good Title call our own, Men are by this Precept forbidden to take away, to enslave, or to impair, or any way to withdraw it from our Use, in whole or in part. The same Duty is virtually contain'd in many affirmative Commands, which enjoining some one positive Practice, remove and restrain the contrary Enormities. How plainly the Necessity of this Law insinuates itself into the Minds of all Men, let Seneca's Observation inform us. Ask a common Rogue (says he) whether he had not rather obtain by honest Means, what he now gets by Theft and Villany? He who makes it his Gain to assault and pil- lage all he meets, would be more willing to find the Money by Chance, than to take it by Violence. There is no one who would not be better pleas'd to enjoy the Fruits of his Wickedness without the Practice of it⁴. Tully says excellently to the same purpose, that for a Man to rob and injure another to promote his own Advantage, is more against Nature than Death, or Poverty, or Pain⁵.

II. Farther, it follows from this Precept, that in case a Man be hurt or injur'd by another, in any respect, the Person who stands justly charg'd as Author of the Wrong, ought, as far as it lies in his Power, to make Reparation¹. For otherwise it would have been a vain Command not to harm another, if the Party who actually suffers such a Harm, must be content to put it up without farther Notice, and leave the Offender to enjoy in Peace the Fruit of his Injury, never obliging him to refund, or to restore. Furthermore, were not Restitution made a necessary Duty, neither would wicked Men ever abstain from wronging others; nor would those who have been injured, find it an easy Task to compose their Mind in such a manner, as to maintain Peace with the other Party, so long as they have obtain'd no Recompence or Consideration for their Sufferings.

III. The Word *Damage*¹ which seems properly to refer only to Goods and Possessions, we here use in an extended Sense, so as to make it take in likewise all manner of Harm that may be offer'd to a Man's Body, his Chastity, or his good Name. In this Latitude then, it implies all Hurt, Spoil, or Diminution of whatsoever is already actually our own; all Interception of what by a perfect and absolute Right we ought to receive, whether such Right be the original Gift of Nature, or whether it be allow'd us by human Institution and Law. And lastly, all Omission or Denial of any Duty, or Performance, which others by a perfect Obligation stand bound to pay us². We say by a perfect Obligation; because if the Obligation in the other Party be only imperfect, and we consequently have only an imperfect Right, the with-holding of any such Due cannot really be esteem'd a Damage.

¹ Seneca of Anger, B. II. C. 31. It is a Sin to injure one's Country; and therefore to injure a Fellow Subject, inasmuch as he is a Member of our Country. The Parts ought to be held sacred, if the whole deserve our Veneration. And hence likewise the Person of every Man ought to be inviolable, because every Man is our Fellow Citizen in the great and universal Society. What a Distraction would arise, should the Hand practise Mischief against the Feet, or the Eyes prove treacherous to the Hands? As all the Members conspire in an exact Union and Agreement, because the Safety of each in particular is the Interest of the whole Body; so particular Men ought to spare each other, because we are all born for Society. And no Society can remain secure, without a firm Love and Concord amongst the Members of which it is compos'd.

² Nay, Cicero further says, That there is no Man, who had not rather satisfy his Desires without incurring any Guilt, though he were sure to go unpunished. For, says he, Lib. 3. de fin. c. 11. who is there, or ever was of that covetous Temper, or extravagant Desires, who had not much rather obtain that which he is resolv'd to get by some wicked Means, without making use of them, though he were assur'd of Impunity?

MR. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on §. II.

¹ That a Man be oblig'd to make Satisfaction for any Wrong done to another, it is necessary, 1. That the Injury done be forbidden by some Law, either Natural or Positive. 2. That it was done through our Fault, and that the Will did either directly or indirectly concur in that Action, by which the Injury is done. 3. Lastly, That he who has suffered the Damage, is no way consenting to it. For if he give his Consent, either directly or indirectly, though with some Restrictions, the Prohibition of the Law ceases, and consequently so does the Obligation to Restitution. Our Author ought to have taken notice of these Three Conditions distinctly, because they are the Foundation and Key of all the Chapter.

MR. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on §. II.

² From hence it appears by this first Law of Natural Right, viz. That we ought to do evil to no Man, that all sorts of Actions in general are forbidden, by which any Wrong or Injury is done to our Neighbour in respect to all Things to which he has an undoubted Right, viz. Murder, Wounds, Blows, evil Words, Affronts, Calumnies, Rapine, Extortion, Theft, Pillaging, Fraud, and Force, either direct or indirect, mediate, or immediate, &c. as this Author expresses himself in his Abridgment of the Duties of a Man and Citizen, l. 1. c. 6. §. 3. It ought also farther to be observed, that a Damage or Hurt may be done to the Soul by neglecting to inform the Mind, or regulate the Passions of such as we are oblig'd to instruct or reform, and much more by leading them on purpose into any Error or Vice, from which we ought to restrain them.

For since all Performances of this kind ought to proceed from the voluntary Motion of some virtuous Principle in the Giver, and since I have no Power or Licence to exact the Payment of them by force, it would by no means be convenient that I should think my self damaged, in not receiving such things as I could not otherwise expect, than in the way of free Gift and Benefit. And as I cannot reckon those things amongst my own, which I have only a Fitness or Capacity to possess; so I have no reason to complain of injurious Practice, if they happen to be kept from me. Aristotle says elegantly to this Purpose, he who out of a narrowness of Spirit refuses to assist another with his Wealth, doth not hereby increase it, Eth. v. 4. and since he has not more, the Person whom he thus sends away unreliev'd has not less. On the same Principle is founded the Argument which Cicero makes use of in his Defence of Plancius, that altho' the other Gentleman Laternensis might perhaps be the more worthy Competitor, yet it was in the Power of the People to pass him by, and to choose Plancius into the Office of Ædile, in as much as neither of the Candidates had a perfect Right to that Honour. It is a Privilege, says he, belonging to the very Condition and Constitution of free States, that they be able by their Votes, to give to a Person, or to take from him what they will. Yet in the same Place the Orator distinguisheth between what People could do, and what they ought to do; the Term ought implying that less perfect Obligation, by which we stand engaged to the Exercise of every Virtue. But here Grotius* well

* Lib. II. advises us to take heed of confounding c. 17. §. 3. Points which belong not to the same Head. For the People in a Commonwealth, who are obliged to confer Honours on the most deserving, only by the Rules of State-prudence, yet in case they intrust any person with this their Power of choosing Officers, if we prefer those who are less worthy, the others who are past by, cannot bring an Action of Injury or Damage against the Elector³. Yet the People, by whose Deputation he acted, have a Right of calling him to an account for his Proceedings, and may require Reparation for any Damage which the Commonwealth hath sustain'd by his unworthy Choice⁴. And thus to a Citizen endued with Arts and Abilities sufficient for the discharge of an Office, tho' in reference to obtaining it, he has no Right which will hold good against the State; yet he has an equal Right with others to sue for it: in which Right if any Person by Force or Fraud shall prejudice or obstruct him, he may demand Satisfaction; tho' not the full Value of the Office desired, yet to the value of his reasonable Expectation⁵. And now we are settling our Notion of Damage, we are farther to remark, that it affects not only the thing itself, which being either our Possession or our Due, is hurt, deliv'd, or intercepted; but likewise the Fruits or Profits accruing from the thing, whether they have been already received (though then indeed they may be valued as particular Goods or Things) or whether they are yet only in Hope and Prospect, if the Owner had a Right of receiving them⁶; provided still a Deduction be made of the Expences he would have been put to in securing and gathering in such Fruits⁶; lest he enrich himself at the Charge of the other Party. Now the value of Fruits in Expectation rises and falls according as the time of receiving them is more or less distant, and consequently the Issue more or less uncertain. Thus the losing a Field of Corn in the Blade will not be rated so high, as if it had been destroy'd in the Ear. Some Consideration too is allow'd for what we call Civil Fruits. Thus he who sets on fire another Man's House^b, is not only bound to rebuild it, but likewise to make good the Rent, which it would in the mean time have brought to the Owner. Philo Judeus^c informs us, that in his Nation, when a Man had any way damaged his Neighbour, and done Penance for the Fact, he was obliged, besides paying to the full value, to add one fifth part more, as a Comfort to the Person who had sustain'd the Wrong.

Lastly, it is a clear Point, that all Evils or Mischiefs following by a natural Consequence from any Damage given, ought to be adjudg'd Parts of it^d. Strabo^e relates of King Ariarathes of Cappadocia, that having stop't up the little Passages, by which the River Melas emptied itself into the Euphrates, that so covering the greatest part of the neighbouring Plain, he might divert himself with the childish Play of making little Islands; at length the Damms all giving way on a sudden, the Flood pour'd it self so violently upon Euphrates, as not only to make it carry off part of the Cappadocian Country, and some of their Houses, but to cause great Waste and Mischief in the Lands of their Neighbours, the Galatians: Whereupon the matter being refer'd to the Arbitration of the Romans, they condemn'd the King in Damages of thirty Talents^f.

³ That is to say, as Grotius expounds it, he doth nothing contrary to Justice, properly so called. See l. 1. c. 7. §. 11, 12. above.

⁵ Grotius maintains (§. 3.) that the same thing takes place when any one hinders another from giving a Legacy, either by Violence or Fraud; for it being a kind of Right to be capable of a Legacy, it is a real Injury to deprive a Testator of the Liberty or Will which he hath to give any Person a Legacy, which he is in Expectation of.

⁶ Grotius adds, or for the Improvement of the Thing. See for the Distinction of Fruits, what is said, l. 4. c. 7. §. 3.

Digest. l. 9. t. 2. ad leg. Aquil. leg. 7. §. 7. leg. 27. §. 8. leg. 30. §. 3.

⁸ The Lawyers here distinguish between damnum emergens and lucrum cessans, (i. e.) an emergent Damage, and a ceasing Profit. The first is the Loss which one suffers by the diminishing his Goods at present. The other is the Damage one receives by the Loss of that Gain which he might make. But we ought also to observe, that there are some Events which are the direct and immediate Consequents of the Action, from which the Damage proceeded, in so much that it may be said, it was the cause of it, others there are that have a particular Cause independent on that Action, that was the Occasion of it, or at least had no relation to it, but by some mere Accident. See concerning this the Civil Laws drawn up in their natural Order by Daumatius part 1. lib. 3. tit. 5. where you'll also find in the Prefaces to those Titles, some Observations very important about the difference there is between the Damage that arises from stoppage of Payment, and other sorts of Damages and Interests.

IV. In stating who are to be esteem'd Authors of Damage, it will be necessary to recollect from our first Book, Chap. 5. how many ways the Act of one Man may be imputed to another. A Person then may damnify his Neighbour, not only immediately by himself, but likewise by the Ministry of others. And farther, a Damage immediately done by one Man, may be chargeable upon another (who is consequently obliged to make Reparation) inasmuch as he contributed somewhat to the Action, either by doing what he ought not, or by omitting what he ought to have done^a. He may stand guilty of this Charge in three Ways and Degrees; for he may either be the principal Cause, or he may be equally concern'd with the Actor; or lastly, he may be only an Accessary, and an inferior Cause. Of all which Cases this may in general be observ'd, that the Persons thus chargeable are bound to Restitution, according as they were either the real Cause of the Damages, or contributed to it in whole, or in part. For it often happens, that Persons may concur less principally to the Fact of another Man, by some Omission or Commission, and yet that he would most certainly have done the same Damage, whether they had thus concurr'd or no; so as to render their Concurrence altogether superfluous. Now here tho' they are justly punishable for the Will and the Endeavour, yet since no Part of the present Damage flow'd from them, they cannot be required to make Restitution. Some indeed are for bringing off all Accessaries at a venture; because say they, if these had not lent their Counsel or Assistance, there would not have been wanting others to help forward with the Mischief, and consequently the Damage had been done without their Means. But this Argument is of no Weight, 'tis sufficient to make them guilty, if their Aid had any real Efficacy in producing the Trespas; and had those other Persons join'd their Hands to the Business, they too would have been proportionably responsible. This Rule then may be fix'd as an universal Standard, to know who are bound to make Reparation, and who are not; that when any one did not give real Assistance in the Act of Damage, nor by any antecedent Motion or Default, caus'd it to be undertaken, nor came in for any Part of the Advantage, such a Person tho' by giving any the least Occasion to an ill Action he contracts a Sin, yet shall not be obliged to Restitution^b. And hence 'tis easy to conclude on the other side who shall be oblig'd. Those who insult over their afflicted Neighbours, and rejoice in their Calamities brought on them by wicked and injurious Men, are sinful no doubt in an heinous manner^c; and yet it would be absurd to affirm, that they are bound to repair such Damages as they delight to see. The same must be said of those who defend, excuse, or praise a Trespas already committed, provided they do not hereby hinder the Duty of Restitution; as likewise of those who either wish Success to such a Fact before it is committed, or entertain a silent Joy and Satisfaction during the Performance. There is no ground to build a contrary Opinion on the Passage of Cicero^d, which some would make use of to that Purpose^e. What Difference is there, says he, between him who persuades a Man to an ill Action, and him who afterwards approves of it? Or what signifies it whether I would have a Thing done, or whether I rejoice when it is done? For the Orator employs this Sentence, not to express his Mind seriously^f, but to refute an impertinent Objection. And had it been spoken never so gravely, it could not be strain'd so high, as to assert the Necessity of Reparation in these Cases. And therefore Ammianus Marcellinus^g seems not very properly to apply this Saying of Tully to the Business of Probus, Præfectus Prætorii to the Emperor Valentinian, who, as he relates, did indeed never command any of his Clients or Servants to undertake an unlawful Action; yet if he found them to have committed any Crime, he protected and defended them in spite of Justice itself, without ever enquiring into the Fact, and without the least regard to Honesty or Truth. For here the Dependence on so great a Patron added Strength and Boldness

Mr. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on §. IV.

² By the Roman Law the Approvers and Authors of any Mischief are liable to the same Punishment. Imo Et si erat servus, &c. If a Servant be about to run from his Master, or rob him, and another commends his Design, he is guilty, for he ought not to encourage his Wickedness by Commendation. Digest. l. 11. Tit. 3. De servo corrupto, leg. 1. §. 4. Mr. Bayle in his Discourse about Defamatory Libels, and Grotius before him, approve of this Law, which they say is built upon this sure Maxim, That they who approve an Action, 'tis very likely, would do it if they could, i. e. if some reason of Self-love did not hinder them from engaging in it. The first also approves of the Law of Valentinian and Valens, which make those Men liable to a Capital Punishment, who accidentally meeting with a Libel, disperse it, whereas they ought to have torn it, or burnt it. Vide Cod. l. ix. Tit. XXXVI. De famosis libellis. For (he adds) I can't conceive, but he who in the like Case disperses a Libel, has as great a Desire to injure, as he that composed it, and consequently deserves as great a Punishment as the Author. For certainly in this last Case there is something more than a meer Approbation. To disperse a Libel, which might and ought to have been suppressed, either altogether or in part, is to do an Injury directly to the Party defamed, and join with the Author of the Libel. As to the Law of Ulpian, if a Slave is sully resolved to rob his Master, or get away from him, the Approbation given to these Actions, which he is about to do, since it neither encourages nor confirms him in this unlawful Action, does not seem sufficient to oblige to any Satisfaction, as Mr. Bayle infers. For though a Man would do a Thing with Pleasure, were it not against his Interest, yet in my Judgment he is not punishable, unless he do it, by any human Laws (of which he is speaking) especially if he never desired to do it, and his Approbation did not determine, nor encourage the Actor.

^a Nemo damnus facit (say the Roman Lawyers) nisi qui id fecit, quod facere jus non habet, Digest. lib. 50. Tit. 17.

to their Enormities; and his Protection interposing, hindred them from making good the Damages they had been guilty of ⁵. As to the Point of counselling or advising, this is most certain, that he who suggests to another the way and manner of committing a Trespas, is bound to Reparation. Whereas the same Obligation doth not seem to lie on those who either persuade a Man in general Terms to apply himself to an ill Course, as to Theft or Robbery, for instance, or join their Approbation and Consent ⁶ to his Resolution, when already fixt and settled; as is often the Case with timorous Counsellors, or base Flatterers of Princes ^a. Lastly, concerning those who concur to an injurious Action, by omitting somewhat which they ought to have perform'd, this may be observ'd, that their Omission doth then only bind them to repair the Damage, when it is of a Duty, to which they stood engag'd by a perfect Obligation; not if the thing was only a Matter of Charity and Humanity. For, since what is owing to me in this imperfect Manner, I cannot yet account my own, neither if it be intercepted, can I go about to recover it ⁷, whatever Ziegler in his Observations on Grotius ^b alleges to the contrary.

V. Where therefore many Persons have concurr'd to one Act of Damage, in making Reparation this Order shall be observ'd; those shall be in the first place chargeable, who set forwards the Mischief ^c, either by their Commands, or by some other powerful Means, amounting almost to a necessary Influence. And the immediate Actor of the Crime, or he who was thus forced to lend his Hands for its Performance, shall, in these Cases, be esteem'd only as the Instrument. Where any one appears to have engag'd himself in the Enterprize, without being driven on it by Necessity, he shall be first obnoxious, and then the rest who contributed their Assistance; yet so, that if the former of these Parties concern'd shall have made good the Damage, the others shall be then clear, as to Reparation, tho' not as to Punishment. But what if an Act proceeds from many Persons, who are all Authors or Causes of it in the very same degree; shall each Party be responsible for the whole, or only for an equal Share of the Damage? Grotius ^c pronounces in this Case, that each Person is to answer for all, if the whole Fact proceed from each, tho' not from each alone. Which Rule is somewhat obscure, unless we illustrate it by an Instance. Here are three Men then, who at the same time, tho' perhaps in different Parts, all set fire to an House. This Fact of burning the House seems to have proceeded from each Man entire, and in whole, although not from each alone; in as much as the same Mischief would have follow'd, had one only applied the Fire. But suppose several Persons join in beating or cudgelling a Man, one of whom perhaps gives him a Wound in the Head, another breaks his Arm, and a third strikes out his Eye; here each Person shall not answer for the whole Hurt, but only for that part of it, which he himself effected. Though in Case one of them escape, it is usual to condemn the rest who are taken in the whole, especially when it appears, that they combined together to execute the Mischief. We may still set this Matter in a clearer Light, by distinguishing between divisible and indivisible Acts. The latter which we are concern'd with, are such in which many Persons concur, but in such a manner that the whole Act would have follow'd from the Endeavours of one only; and therefore cannot conveniently be divided into Shares amongst them all; of this kind are the fring of Houses, the breaking down of Banks and Damms, or the like. For the same Damage would have ensued, had one only of the many Parties set his Hand to the Exploit; so that it is impossible to define and settle what part of the Fire, or of the Flood, proceeded from each in particular. When many join in an Act of this Nature, each Person shall be thus far responsible for the whole, that in case they are all apprehended, they shall contribute equally to the Reparation; but if upon the Escape of the rest, one only be taken, he shall then be charg'd with the entire Sum. After the same manner, if some of the Persons apprehended prove insolvent, the whole Burthen shall be laid on those who have more Substance and Ability. In this too the Reparation of Damage differs from the Exaction of Punishment, that in the former, if full Payment or Restitution be made by one of the Parties concern'd, the rest are cleared and excus'd; since it is not consistent with Equity, that the same Damage should be twice made good (though by way of Punishment, this is frequently practis'd) but on the other hand, in penal Cases, nothing is more usual, than that every particular Accomplice in a Crime be made to suffer all that the Law inflicts ^d.

⁷ Certainly of the Person himself, who has refused to do any of these Duties; but if he was hindred by some other Person, he has a Right to require Damages of this latter, if not before humane Tribunals, which often suffer many Wrongs, yet by the immutable Rules of Justice and Equity. See §. 3. above, Note 8.

¹ For the Rule of the Law is this: He does the Wrong, who commands it to be done, but he is in no Fault, who is under a Necessity to obey. Digest. Lib. L. Tit. XVII. De diversis Reg. Jur. Leg. CLXIX.

^a Compare *Ant. Matthæus de Crimin. They petition that each may pay no more than Twenty Thousand. Here the Judgment ought to go against the Thieves, in as much as by the Roman Laws, these Actions of Restitution are reckon'd under the Head of Punishments, s. ult. de Oblig. quæ ex delict. nasc. l. 7. f. 5. l. 8. D. de Jurisdictione, l. 6. *prin. VI. Now whenever we hurt or endamage another, we do it either out of full Purpose and premeditated Guilt, or by a Fault of Negligence only, and not of Design (and this Negligence, as it is more or less gross and supine, is more or less culpable) or lastly, we may do it by meer Chance, so that the Injury cannot rightly be imputed to us^a. Among some People, those Damages are not only imputed to a Man, which are committed with his Assistance or Concurrence, but those likewise which are caused by his Servants or Cattle, without his positive Influence. It is beyond doubt, that he who offers Damage to another out of an evil Design, is bound to make Reparation, and that to the full Value of the Wrong, and of all the Consequences flowing from it. But those likewise stand responsible, who commit an Act of Trespass, tho' not designedly, yet by such a Piece of Neglect as they might easily have avoided¹. For it is no inconsiderable Part of social Duty to manage our Conversation with such Caution and Prudence, that it do not become terrible or pernicious to others; and Men under some Circumstances and Relations are obliged to more exact and watchful Diligence^{b2}. Indeed the slightest Default in this Point is sufficient to impose a Necessity of Reparation, unless under one of these Exceptions, either that the Nature of the Business was such as disdain'd a Care more nice and scrupulous, or that the Party who receives the Wrong is no less in fault than he who gives it; or lastly, that some Perturbation of Mind in the Person, or some extraordinary Circumstances in the Affair, leaves no room for accurate and considerate Circumspection; as suppose a Soldier in the Heat of an Engagement should hurt his next Man with his Arms, whilst he brandishes and employs them against the Enemy. To this purpose the Story in Ælian^c is remarkable; "A young Man travelling towards Delphi, as he defended his Companion from the Robbers, hap- pen'd to kill him by an unlucky Turn of his Weapon; and upon Application to the Oracle receiv'd his Pardon in this comfortable Answer:

Ἐκλενας ἢ ἑταῖρον, ἀμύνων, ἢ σ' ἐμάνηεν
Αἷμα πύλαις ἢ χεῖρας καθαρώτερον ἢ πάρος ἦεναι.

*Striving to save your Friend, you have him slain;
His Blood will cleanse your Hands, it ne'er can stain^d.*

But in Cases of pure Chance, where the hurtful Action is not mix'd with any Fault of ours³, it is evident we are not oblig'd to Reparation. For when I have done nothing that can be fairly laid to my Charge, there seems to be no Reason why the Misfortune, and the Damage of a Harm which I unwillingly caus'd, should rather fall on me than on the Person who receiv'd it^e. Yet if a Person of Wealth hurt a poor Man, though meerly by Chance, it will become him by some Act of Liberality to support and comfort the Sufferer. As for those Actions which lie against us for any Trespass or Hurt committed by our Cattle or Slaves, and the like, Grotius* is of opinion, that they owe their Rise to Civil and Positive Laws; inasmuch as the Master or Owner being innocent of the Fact, is not by any natural Obligation made responsible for it. Yet others hold that Actions of this kind are most agreeable to natural Equity, although they are not precisely suggested by the Law of Nature. It is one of Plato's^f Constitutions, "If a Man or Woman being a Servant, shall injure the Goods of another Person, either by an unskilful, or by an im- moderate Use of them, the Person who receives the Wrong, not being himself the Cause of it; the Master shall either make him Satisfaction for the Damage sustain'd, or shall deliver the offend- ing Servant into his Power and Pleasure." And the same way of proceeding is observable in the old Roman Story of Evander, delivering up his Servant Cacus to Hercules, who had convicted him of stealing his Cattle⁴. But why the Owner of a Beast should rather suffer Damage than he who upon provoking a Creature⁵ not violent by Nature, has without the Owner's Fault receiv'd a Hurt, the Reason seems

Mr. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on §. VI.

¹ See the Civil Laws drawn up in their Natural Order, by Mr. Daumat. Part I. l. 2. Tit. 8. where you will find a great Number of these sorts of Cases decided, wherein it appears, that there is nothing but the indirect and interpretative Will of him that causes the Damage.

² Among the Laws of Moses.

³ This Restriction ought carefully to be observed. For when the accidental Case is an Effect of some Fault, which produced it, we are indispensibly required to make good the Damage, the Obligation to repair being the Effect of the Fault, and not of the Chance. See Mr. Daumat, Civil Laws, Part I. Lib. 2. Tit. 9. We ought to remember that we may be engaged by some Agreement to answer for some accidental Cases, and then, as any one may see, the Obligation to make good a Damage is an Act of our Will, and the Accident gave us only an Opportunity to fulfil our Promises. See l. 5. c. 9. following. Mr. Thomasius goes farther, and maintains, that a Man is bound to make good any Damage, of which he is only the Physical Cause, altho' he does not do any wilful Injury; but the Welfare of human Society does not seem to require, that our Obligation to satisfy a Damage should extend so far. Human Society will be happy enough, if every Man carefully abstains from endamaging others, not only out of a formal Design, but thro' the least Negligence.

to be this, that the Settlement of Proprieties does not impair or prejudice this antecedent natural Precept of Reparation. And therefore, since supposing Things to lie in their primitive Community, in case I had been hurt by a Beast, I had the Power of requiting, or satisfying myself upon the Beast, by any means I thought fit; this Power or Liberty of proceeding is not suppos'd to be taken from me by the Introduction of distinct Proprieties. And inasmuch as the Owner of such a Beast makes a Gain of him, and I suffer'd Loss by him, the Reparation of Damage taking place in Equity and common Favour before the Procurement of Profit, it hence appears, that I can rightly demand of the Owner, either to make good the Loss sustain'd; or in case such a Charge would rise higher than the Value of the Beast, then to deliver him up as a Criminal, to be destroy'd⁶. The same Rule holds much stronger in the Case of a Slave, since he is by Nature made liable to answer for any Damage he shall give. But now, since he has no Goods of his own to repay or requite the Loss, and since his very Body is his Master's, it follows in Equity, that the Master either repair the Wrong, or give him up to the Sufferer. Especially since without this Provision, a Slave would be empower'd to act what Hurt and Mischief he pleas'd; whilst neither he (who is Possessor of nothing, nor indeed of himself) nor his Master, could be oblig'd to Restitution. Nor should the Master by the severest Course of Blows, or of Imprisonment, punish the Offender, would this be any real Satisfaction to the injured Party⁷.

Much more then is it clear beyond the least Doubt or Dispute, that the Owner stands responsible for those Damages which his Beasts commit, either by his own Fault or Instigation, or by their natural and accustom'd Violence, and the common Force of their peculiar Instinct. For the Owner ought either not to keep such Creatures, or carefully to restrain them from doing Mischief⁷.

Of Reparation in general, we have this farther to observe, that when the Hurt or Wrong is done by an evil and criminal Act, there to make good the Damage is not sufficient to take off the Punishment⁸. Though the voluntary Offer of Requitall, as a Sign of Penitence and Sorrow, frequently lessens the Severity of farther Prosecution^{8c}.

It is time now to illustrate this Doctrine by such Instances and Examples as Grotius chiefly will supply us with.

VII. An unjust Slayer is obliged to defray the Charge of Physicians and Chirurgeons, and give to those Persons whom the Deceas'd was by full and perfect Duty bound to maintain, as Parents, Wife and Children (not to any whom he kept out of Charity and Pity) so much as the Hope of their Maintenance shall be fairly valued at; Regard being had to the Age^d, both of the Deceas'd, and of themselves^{e2}. As to Ziegler's Opinion on this Place of Grotius, that some Consideration is to be allow'd for the Gain which the Deceas'd might have acquired, had he lived longer, which consequently would have made their Portions the larger, we think it will scarce hold good, inasmuch as all Advantage of this kind being yet uncertain, cannot be reckon'd amongst our Possessions; and since future Time lies equally open to loss as to gain; and lastly, since it cannot clearly be made

⁶ Besides this, we may observe with Mr. Hertius, that it may be commonly presumed, that the Master of such a vicious Beast knows its Fault, and if when it has done a Mischief, he will neither resign it, nor pay the Damage, he may be thought to approve it.

⁷ If a Slave or Beast be put on by any other Person than the Master of it, 'tis plain that such a Person is obliged to make good the Damage. But we must then suppose, that the Person hurt has not through his own Fault occasion'd the Damage done him by the Slave or Beast; for in this Case he can blame none but himself, and the Slave did nothing but what he might do in his own Defence. In a word, no Proprietor is obliged to satisfy a Damage, where he is guilty of no Fault, unless his Slave or Beast have done a Mischief of their own Accord. Vid. The Civil Laws in their Natural Order, by Mr. Daumat. Part I. l. 2. Tit. 8. §. 2.

⁸ But there can be no true Repentance without Restitution.

MR. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on §. VII.

² The manner of computing the Value of their Maintenance is set down in Digest. l. 35. Tit. 2. ad Legem Falcidiam, Leg. 68. But Titius upon this Author observes, that no exact Estimation can be made of a Damage by this and the following Examples, and therefore in this Case we ought to submit to an Accommodation. I may add, that every one ought to consult his own Conscience well, and consider, that it is better always to make such a Reparation as may seem something more than the Damage done, than expose himself to be thought not to have done enough, for the Cause of the Person damag'd is always more favoured, than of him that did it.

furtis. The French Translation puts the following Citation into the Text after ^c, and 'tis so in the Original. See Luc. xix. v. 8. 'Tis remarkable, what Glycas tells us, in his Annals of Michael the Paphlagonian. But the Emperor Michael, says he, "Did not forbear all his Life-time to lament his Villany towards Romanus III. and endeavour'd by building Monasteries, by Charity to the Poor, and other good Works to appease the Anger of God. And this Method might have prov'd beneficial to him, had he laid down the Empire (for the sake of which the Fact had been committed) and throwing off the Adulteress, the Empress, for the Love to whom he had done that Wickedness, bewail'd his Sin in a private Condition. But he neglecting such Means of Repentance, and still using Zoa as his Wife, still holding fast the Imperial Dignity, and only making a shew of doing good at the publick Charge, thinking thus to obtain his Pardon, betray'd an impious Opinion of God Almighty, as if he would suffer us to buy our own Forgiveness at the Loss of other Men. Valer. Max. l. 2. c. 8. f. 4." So much Difference there is, whether you really add any Thing to another, or whether you only restore what you had taken from him, as there is between the Beginning of a Benefit, and the End of an Injury.

out, how much the deceas'd would have spent of any such Gain, had he been suffer'd to live and to procure it³.

Now he is an unjust Slayer that kills a Man, who had a Right not to be kill'd by him, and who therefore by the Act that caus'd his Death was truly injur'd. And this Right appears to belong to every individual Person, since Nature by a general Command binds all Men to live like sociable Creatures, and to abstain from mutual Hurt. Which Right a Man may, as far as in him lies, renounce; at least so as to make it fair and just for him to be hurt by such or such particular Persons; and this may be done either tacitly or expressly. He tacitly disclaims this Right, who in a violent manner sets upon another without just Cause. For since the other has a Right of repelling the Violence by any Means he can, the Assailant is to accuse himself only for any harm he suffers in the Repulse of his own unlawful Force. The same Right is expressly renounced by him who enters into War with another upon mutual Appointment and Consent. For 'tis a Law of War, that every one have fair Liberty to use his full Endeavours for the Defeat and Suppression of his Enemy⁴. And though in such War the prevailing Person may perhaps sin against Charity, yet the Violation of Charity only will not oblige to repair the Loss he has thus occasion'd.

The Life of a Freeman does not admit of any Rate or Valuation; and had it any, there is no Person to whom the Debt should be paid. For his Life does not properly belong to his near Relations, it is only their Interest that he should live; and therefore the Value of that Interest or Advantage being paid to them, they can demand no such farther Recompence as the full Worth of his Life. The Case is otherwise with a Slave or Vassal, who being entirely the Propriety of his Master, and falling under Exchange and Commerce, in the manner of other Goods, has really a Price set upon him, which, if he be wrongfully kill'd, the Master has a Right to demand. If it seem hard and somewhat like Inhumanity to rate our Slave thus, in the same manner as we would our Beast, it may be answer'd, that we do not make this Valuation of his Person, but only of the Work and Service which he would have done us.

Those in like manner stand bound to Reparation, who kill another in their Sports or Recreations, which is esteem'd equal to deliberate Mischief⁵.

And those also who commit the same mortal Violence, through their own Unwariness and Neglect. Examples of which Case we find set down in the *Institutions*⁶. As if a Soldier practising with his Arms in another place, than what is set apart for those Exercises, should slay a Man who was casually passing by; or if one who is not a Soldier shall happen to do the same; though in the place ordain'd for the publick training of Military Men. But if a Soldier in the same place of common Duty shall undesignedly take away a Man's Life, he shall stand excused; for he was performing his proper Business, and the other Party was in the fault for throwing himself into the Danger⁷. If a Feller of Wood shall with the Limb of a Tree which he is cutting down, kill a Servant passing by in the high Road, or in a Way near a Town; without having first cried out to give Warning. But in Case he did thus cry out, and the Servant neglected to save himself upon timely Notice, the Feller shall not be charged with his Death. No more shall he if the same Misfortune happen'd at a distance from the Highway, or in the middle of a Field, although he did not give the usual sign of crying out; because there the Stranger had no Right of passing, and consequently ventured at his own Peril⁸.

If a Physician destroy his Patient, either by plain Neglect and Desertion, or by administering through Ignorance, improper, and dangerous Medicines⁹.

If a Muletier, through Weakness or Unskilfulness, shall have suffer'd his Mules to run over any Person; provided he undertook this Business of driving at his own Choice, or made it his Profession; not if he was press'd and compell'd to the Service, protesting at the same time his want of Art or of Strength¹⁰.

In the *Alcoran*¹¹, he who shall ignorantly kill a Musulman, is enjoin'd to make good to his Relations the damage they sustain'd by his Death; and to redeem one Person of his own Religion from Slavery.

It seems probable that those likewise were oblig'd to some such Method of Reparation, who by the Favour of the Jewish Law enjoy'd the Privilege and Protection of the Asylums, or Cities of Refuge¹². Since in the Case there specified, of a Man's killing his Neighbour by the fall of the Head of his Ax from the Helve, the Man is not entirely blameless, in as much as he ought to have strengthened his Instrument better, for the Prevention of such a sad Mischance¹³. But how it came to be

³ Mr. Van Meulen, in his Commentary upon Grotius, l. 2. c. 17. §. 16. believes that the Nature and Certainty of the Gain which the dead Person might have made, ought to be examined. If his Gain were altogether uncertain, so that it depended more upon Chance than the Industry of the dead Person, no Satisfaction ought to be made; but if his Gain were morally certain, and would have in all appearance been produced by the Labour and Industry of the dead Person, as the Gain of some Traders, Merchants, and Artificers is, then he ought to satisfy the Persons concerned for the Gain lost, according to the equitable Estimation of an Arbitrator, who shall make as exact Deductions for all Expences which the dead would have been at, as possible, and consider the Circumstances our Author mentions.

VIII. He that has maimed a Man, shall be oblig'd to pay the Charges of the Cure, and to make up what he now gains less than before, by his Labour or Calling^b. On this Head the Jewish Constitutions are very worthy of Remark, as we find them deliver'd in Constantine l'Empereur^c. He that hurts his Neighbour is responsible on five Accounts; for the Damage, for the Pain, for the Cure, for the Cessation of Work, and for the Affront or Disgrace. The Damage they compute in this Method: If, for example, he has beat out the other's Eye, or cut off his Hand, or broke his Leg, they then consider the suffering Party as if he were a Slave to be sold in the Market, and so reckon how much he would have yielded in Sale before the Hurt, and how far his Price is now fallen. For they judg'd there would be no certain Way of settling these Rates and Accounts, should they in this Case distinguish between the different Qualities and Conditions of Men; since the Professions of Life, and the States of Persons admitting so endless a Variety, the Sufferer would be always throwing in some new Reason to enhance the Damage, and aggravate the Hurt, and consequently to enlarge his Demands of Compensation. They thought it convenient therefore to set all Men, with regard to this Business, in the one general Condition of Slaves, the just Value of whom was discoverable beyond dispute. So that if the maim'd Person, suppos'd to be a Slave, would before the Hurt have brought fifty Shekels, and could be sold afterwards for no more than thirty, the Maimer was enjoin'd to pay him twenty Shekels.

As to the Point of Pain, if a Man, for instance, had burnt another, although in the Nails, where no Blister follows, they consider'd how much a Person of that State and Fortune would have taken to suffer voluntarily such a Pain. For one may find a wealthy or a nice and delicate Person, who would not be hired at any rate to endure a slight and moderate Smart; and at the same time one may light on a poor and hardy Labourer, who would be content to undergo some sharp Degree of Torture for the earning of a Penny. Farther, in rating the Pain, they proceeded thus; they suppos'd, for instance, that a Person of that Condition was condemn'd to have his Hand cut off, and then they consider'd how much he would give to lose his Hand, rather by some easy consuming Application, than by the violent Stroke of a Sword; and so much the Party, from whom the Hurt was receiv'd, was bound to give him on Account of the Pain^d.

Concerning the Cure, they observ'd these Rules: If after the Cure perform'd, any Sores or Tumours arose, in case it appear'd that the former Wound was the real Occasion of them, the Person who gave it stood farther bound to pay for his second Cure; if they proceeded from any other Cause, he was not responsible. As often as the Wound being imperfectly heal'd broke out again, he was still charged with the Expences, but not after it had been once brought to a perfect Cure. It might be added, that his Obligation continued only in case the Wound thus broke out of itself; not if the Thing happen'd thro' the Fault of the Patient, or thro' the Unskilfulness of the Chirurgeon.

In rating the Allowance to be made the Sufferer for the Cessation of his Work, they consider'd him as a Keeper of Cucumers. The Jewish Doctors thus enlarge on the Point; they suppose him already to have receiv'd Satisfaction for the Defect or Damage sustain'd in his Body, and likewise for the Pain he has endured. And therefore supposing him (for instance) to have lost the Use of a Hand, or a Foot, they do not now consider what Gain he would have made, had those Limbs remain'd entire; but because he hath been already paid for the disabled Part, they only compute what Damage he suffers during his Sickness in respect of such Work, as he could have perform'd, though maim'd in Body, if well in Health. And they think he may fairly demand so much for every Day of his Sickness, as his daily Wages had been for watching a Cucumber Garden. But because it is a different Thing, whether a Man loses a Hand, or a Foot; whether only lying some time sick of his Wound, he afterwards recovers without prejudice, or whether he is actually depriv'd of a Limb, Maimonides proposes a nicer and more exact Way of rating the Cessation of Work, according to particular Cases. If the Sufferer shall not be maim'd, but only cast into a Sickness, and confin'd to his Bed, or if the affected Limb only swell for a time, and afterwards regain its Soundness and Use, the other Party shall allow him daily for the Loss of his Work, according to the usual Wages or Hire receiv'd by Men of the same Calling. But if he is maim'd in a Limb, or has lost a Hand, Satisfaction being already made him for that Loss, or what they call Damage, being before discharged, as to the bare Cessation of his Work, they then consider him as a Keeper of Cucumers, and computing the Pay generally allowed for this Work, order him so much for every Day of his Illness. In like manner, if he has lost a Leg, they consider him as a Centinel or Watchman at a City Gate; if an Eye, they suppose him to work at turning a Mill; and so agreeably of all other Hurts and Mischiefs.

Lastly, In rating the Affront, or Disgrace, they consider the Condition and Degree of both Parties. Since an Affront is much more provoking from a mean and vile Person, than from one of Quality or Power; and since the same Piece of Disrespect may be light and inconsiderable to one of vulgar Condition, and yet be heinous and intolerable, if offer'd to a Man of Honour. And here we may by the bye observe the Distinction added, concerning the Place or the Scene of the Action, which sometimes very much varies this Point. Thus if a Man sliding down from the Roof of a House, shall hurt one that passes by, and at the same time affront him, for instance, by making the Dirt fall on him, he shall be responsible for the Damage or Mischief, not for the Ignominy. Thus much we have gather'd from the Jewish Laws; and on the same Head the Reader may consult the Roman; particularly, l. ult. D. De his qui effuderint vel dejec. & l. 3. D. Si quadrupes. Where we must take notice, that when 'tis said Scars and Deformity are not capable of being prized or rated, the Rule¹ will hold good only in the Case of Freemen. For since the debauch'd Manners of that Nation set a higher Price than ordinary on handsome Slaves, they might consequently claim a pecuniary Satisfaction from those who should rob a Slave of this Advantage, by a Wound in the Face, or any Injury of that kind. So the disfiguring the Face of a Virgin or unmarried Woman, whose Beauty sometimes is the best part of their Fortune, may be reckon'd amongst Hurts requiring Compensation. And indeed Deformity, if very remarkable, is in general a sad Unhappiness, rendring us disagreeable to others, and exposing us to the Contempt and Derision of proud and of satyrical Men. Yet Scars receiv'd in War pass for Marks of Honour and Valour by the common Vote of Mankind².

As to the Compensation after an Act of Maiming, this is farther observable, that in such Cases the Limb itself is not properly rated or valued, it being a Thing really incapable of a pecuniary Price; but the Design of these Proceedings is only to repair the Damage sustain'd by the Loss, or by the Disuse of such a Part, with regard to the Difference of Times, of Persons, and of Abilities; and whilst the Judge is settling these Points, 'tis necessary he should speak of the Members themselves^b.

IX. The next Instance produced by *Grotius*¹ of the Adulterer and the Adulteress, who he says are bound not only to save the Husband harmless, as to the Maintenance of the spurious Issue; but likewise to make good to the Legitimate Children any Damage which they shall sustain, in case so false a Sharer should be admitted with them into the Inheritance, falls under that kind of Damage, which Men are said to cause only indirectly, and by Consequence. For as to the direct Crime of Adultery, that does by no means belong to pecuniary Damage. On this Point Ziegler observes that Grotius is indeed in the right, when he asserts, that the Husband ought to be secured from the Burthen of keeping the adulterous Offspring: But that it will bear a Dispute, whether Restitution should be made to the Legitimate Children for what they suffer by such a Partner in the Inheritance. For he says the Question here is concern'd only about the Mother's Estate, to which the adulterous Children cannot be admitted, but by the Ordinance and Prescription of Law. And therefore when the Law of any Nation does thus actually allow them to share in the maternal Inheritance with the Legitimate, the Damage here given proceeds from the Law itself, and not from the Adulterers. To which might be added, that the Adulterers are not obliged to such Reparation for this farther Reason, That Children have not a perfect Right to the Goods of their living Parents; and no Necessity of Reparation can arise but from the Breach of a perfect Right. Thus a Parent cannot be said properly to injure the Children by passing to a second Marriage, though their Hopes of Inheritance may sink considerably by such a Proceeding. But the Truth is, the Instance alledged by Grotius abstracts both from the Provisions made by Civil Laws, about the Succession of adulterous Children to the Goods of their Parents, and also from the Penalties decreed against the Adulterers, if convicted; and 'tis but reason to affirm with him, that the Adulterers, tho' unconvicted or undiscover'd, do really owe such Reparation both to the Husband and to the Legitimate Children². For by the End and Design of the matrimonial Covenant, the Children had a perfect Right, that no one should thrust new Coheirs amongst them, besides the lawful Husband of their Mother. And by the same Covenant the Husband had a Right of refusing to maintain, not only out of his own proper and separate Goods, but likewise out of his Wife's Dowry, the base Progeny of his polluted Bed.

Mr. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on §. VIII.

¹ And the Reason, which the Roman Lawyers give, is, because Liberum corpus nullam recipit aestimationem, i. e. the Body of a Freeman is not capable of any Valuation, as the Body of a Slave is; but Mr. Titius as well as this Author disapproves of this Reason, and says, that though Freemen are not commonly bought and sold as Slaves are; it is not a good Inference, that a Freeman that is hurt may not reasonably require a Reparation by a certain Price of the Scars and Deformities, which are the necessary Consequents of the Wounds he has received. His Reputation, for example, is as little capable of a Valuation as his Scars; yet we allow, that a Man that is injured by Calumnies may demand, that the Offender be obliged to make a pecuniary Satisfaction for his impaired Honour. Some Men indeed through a Greatness of Soul, either real or affected, think it below them to take Money in Compensation of the Blows and Hurts they have received, but this hinders not, but that they have right to require such a Satisfaction, if they please, and that it may be made by Money; for as Grotius says, Lib. 2. Chap. 17. §. 22. Money is the common Measure of all Things, which are profitable to Man.

X. If a Man has either by Force or Fraud defiled a Virgin, he is oblig'd to pay her so much as she appears to be damnified in her hopes of Marriage, by the Loss of her Honour. For pure Virginity is a very valuable Possession, and as it were the common Portion which Nature gives her Daughters^a. And therefore he who robs a Maid against her Will of this Treasure, ought so largely to refund to her, that the Improvement of her Fortune may hide the Blemish of her Body. Though indeed the true Way of proceeding is, that he marry her himself; unless hinder'd by the Disparity of their Conditions, or some other extraordinary Circumstances^b. But she who by a lustful Compliance, voluntarily parts with her Chastity, is to thank herself for the Loss. Yet commonly speaking, the Man in these Cases is presum'd to be more faulty than the Woman. He who shall entice a Virgin to prostitute herself on the Promise of Marriage, should be bound to make good that Engagement. Nor will the Objection hold here, that Covenants about base or dishonest Things are invalid. For since the Law of Nature requires no Interval betwixt the Covenant and the Completion of Matrimony^c (all such Distance being introduc'd by Civil Customs and Constitutions)^d with regard to that Law, we can scarce call this a base Condition, "You shall be my Wife^e, provided you consent, that I shall immediately use you as such." Or if there be any Thing which seems foul in so over-hasty a Match, it is not judg'd sufficient to invalidate the Contract; because Marriage is, in this Case, the more favourable Side.

XI. A Thief or Robber is bound to restore the Thing taken away, with its natural Increase or Improvement^e; and to make good, not only the Damage^f actually ensuing to the Owner, but likewise the surceasing of his Gains; and this, although he be compell'd to suffer the just Punishment of his Crime. For 'tis the injur'd Party who demands Reparation, and it is the Commonwealth which requires Punishment for the publick Good; and the Judge can by no means reckon this as a Satisfaction to the private Person, so as to make him lose his Goods, without Remedy and Restitution. Therefore 'tis an absurd way of proceeding in some States, where^g the Magistrate claims the Goods found on the Robber, and commands the true Owner of them to content himself with seeing the Villain brought to publick Justice^f. Nor is it more agreeable to the Law of Nature, that the Charges of punishing the Thief should be laid on the Person he has robb'd, since the inflicting due Penalties belongs entirely to the Government; to effect which, if more Expences are requir'd, than the Estate of the Criminal amounts to, the Remainder is to be made up by the Publick; especially since at other Times the Treasury gains so considerably by Forfeits and Confiscations. For instance, if a State engage in a War, upon account of some private Members who have been injured, all are obliged to contribute to the Charges, as well as those whose Defence is particularly undertaken. The Case is otherwise, if the Judge puts it to the injured Party's Choice, whether he had rather recover his Goods, or see the Thief executed; for here if he prefer the latter Condition, he can lay no Claim to farther Satisfaction. Though the Judge cannot fairly propose such Terms, since the Punishment of Malefactors ought not to depend on the Pleasure or Humour of private Men, but on the publick Advantage of the State.

If the Thing stolen be spent and embezzel'd, Grotius will have it to be paid for according to a middle Valuation; not to the full Worth, nor yet considerably less. Which Direction Ziegler does not without reason dislike. For what Title has the Thief in this case to favour? If I can demand the full and highest Price, when, to oblige a Person, I sell a Thing otherwise not vendible, why should I here make any Abatement to the Thief, who seizes my Goods against my Will, and is my Chapman only upon Compulsion^g? And in this Case too Reparation is due from the Thief, or from his Heirs^h, yet not beyond the Value of the Inheritance, although he has suffer'd the corporal Penalty of his Crime. For it does by no means look

² See lib. 4. c. 13. §. 4. following near the end, and what Mr. Hertius says upon it there, and his Discourse De Superioritate territoriali, §. 56. Nevertheless Mr. Thomasius in his Treatise De Stat. Imper. potest. Legislat. §. 41. maintains, that such a Claim, Seizure, or Confiscation, although it is esteem'd by some People to be contrary to all natural Right, may be justified by very good Reasons, if long Custom, and express Law has settled it in that Country. As for example, The Intention of the People, or Legislator may be to make the Proprietors more watchful to preserve their Goods, or they may appoint such stolen Goods as they have recovered to bear the necessary Charges of the Officers of Justice, who are to punish Thieves, which otherwise must be born by the Publick. We will not enquire how far these Reasons may avail in Conscience, but shall only observe that it hath nothing contrary to natural Equity, among such People as have consented to submit to such a Law or Custom, which equally affects all. Yet when the stolen Goods fall into the Hands of a Stranger, the Maxims of pure Natural Right ought to take place, and then such an Usage can be no ways authorized. Mr. Thomasius pretends here to make use of the Opinion of such as are of a contrary Judgment, who acknowledge that stolen Goods may be confiscated, and given to such Subjects of the State to whom they are of use, for he says, in the Opinion of all our Doctors, the Right of Reprisals is not contrary to Law or Nature: Hereupon he alledges the Example of Theft and Adultery. But it is here much the same to put a Man to Death, or seize his Effects by way of Reprisal, which otherwise would be contrary to the Law of Nature, we do but defend ourselves against one kind of Enmity.

³ The Roman Law on the contrary will have that which is stole or lost to be valued at the highest Rate, for so it speaks. *Placet tamen id tempus spectandum, quo res unquam plurimi fuit, Digest. l. 13. like Injustice or Cruelty, that the Offender after he thus satisfied the Law, either by Death, or other bodily Pain, should likewise recompense the Person he has endamaged. The trite Objection of Mors omnia solvit^a, Death pays all, has no manner of Force in the present Business. Death indeed discharges personal Performances, but not proper Debts, which cleave as it were to the Goods and Possessions, and follow them to any new Master. And such is this Debt for Damage given.

The other Species of Hurt are more easy to be settled and decided; and some of them will hereafter be particularly insisted upon in their proper Places^b.

⁶ Our Author has collected several Examples more particularly in his Elements of the Civil Law, p. 453, &c. but before we end this Chapter, let us in a few Words after the Example of Buddens, make an Application of these Maxims, which we are about to establish for the Right of Nations, taken in the Sense our Author intends it, l. 1. c. 3. §. 23. People then may do ill to, or offend each other in respect either of the Body, or the Estate, which answers to the Life of Man, or of the Government, or of his Reputation, or perfect Rights; or lastly, some of the Members, or Citizens, who may be damaged either in their Persons, or their Goods, or Reputation, or their Rights. Moreover, one People may offend another, either directly, when by the Order of their Sovereign, who reigns in Chief, they cause a Damage to be done to another in any manner; or indirectly, when a Sovereign does not punish the Mischiefs done by his Subjects to another People, or if he could hinder them, doth not; as for example, If he does not use the best Means he can and ought to prevent or restrain Robberies and Pyracies; if instead of paying his Troops, he reduces his Soldiers to a Necessity of pillaging both Friends and Enemies; if he affords a Reception to those who have wronged and injured the State. (See Grotius, l. 2. c. 17. §. 20.) In all these Cases he is obliged to Restitution. And the other State has not only Reason to take Arms, if the Thing be troublesome, but to continue a War, till it can gain itself a Security for the future, which is not allowed to one Citizen against another. But of this we shall treat more largely, when we come to speak of the Rights of War.

CHAP. II.

That all Men are to be accounted by Nature equal.

The CONTENTS of every Paragraph of the second Chapter.

| I. Every Man is to account another his equal. | VI. Men offend against it by Pride. |
| II. What is a Natural Equality. | VII. And by Affronts offered to others. |
| III. The popular Reasons for it. | VIII. Whether any be Servants by Nature. |
| IV. The Opinion of such an Equality makes Men helpful to one another. | IX. Whence has proceeded that Inequality that is found among Men. |
| V. How Things are to be divided by it among many. | |

BESIDES that Affection which every Man maintains for his own Life, and Body, and Possessions, by which he cannot but resist and repel whatever threatens Destruction to those dear Concerns; we may discover likewise deeply rooted in his Mind, a most tender Esteem and Value for himself; which if any one endeavour to impair, he is seldom less (and sometimes much more) incens'd, than if a Mischief had been offer'd to his Person, or to his Estate. This Passion, though it may be heighten'd and improv'd by various external Causes, yet seems to lay its first Foundations in the very Constitution of human Nature. The word MAN is thought to carry somewhat of Dignity in its Sound; and we commonly make use of this, as the last and the most prevailing Argument against a rude Insulter, I am not a Beast, a Dog, but I am a Man as well as yourself^a. Since then human Nature agrees equally to all Persons, and since no one can live a sociable Life with another, who does not own and respect him as a Man; it follows as a Command of the Law of Nature, *that every Man should esteem and treat another as one who is naturally his Equal, or who is a Man as well as he*¹.

MR. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on Chap. II. §. I.

¹ This is a Consequence of the Maxim which was to be explained in the preceding Chapter; for every one having a perfect Right to expect that he be regarded and treated as a Man, he that doth otherwise with another does him a real Damage. This Duty being founded on an immoveable Condition, viz. That Men should be used precisely as Men, is not only general, but of perpetual Obligation; inasmuch, that notwithstanding all the Inequality by the Changes and Diversity of additional Titles and Degrees, the Rights of Natural Equality always remain unmovable, and agree to every one in relation to another, whatever Condition he is in. There are nevertheless some Superiors so insolent that they plainly violate this Duty, treating their Inferiors after an inhuman Manner, by exacting of them excessive Labours, slaying them, or exposing their Lives to danger without necessity, as if they were Beasts; for though it be common for Men to contemn each other, yet we ought to look upon such contemptible Persons, as of the same Nature with ourselves. We ordinarily content ourselves to account others as foolish and inconsiderable Persons, in a word, as Persons of no Merit or Accomplishments, in comparison of ourselves. Titius Obs. 172.

Brave Theseus, they were Men like all before,
And human Souls in human Frames they bore,
With You to take their Parts in earthly Feasts,
With you to climb to Heaven, and sit immortal Guests.

II. For the better understanding this Equality amongst Men, we may observe, that Mr. Hobbes^a restrains it to a Parity of Strength, and of other human Abilities which attend a ripe and perfect Age; and would from hence infer, that all Men have good cause naturally to fear each other¹. For he indeed can strike no Terror into me, whose power reaches not far enough to hurt me. But now amongst Men, he who is inferior to another in bodily Strength, may either by treacherous Contrivance, or by Art and Dexterity, take away the Life of the stoutest Mortal^b. Since therefore the greatest of natural Evils which can proceed from human Power, is Death, which any grown Person is able to bring upon another; since those may be term'd Equal, who can do equal Mischief to each other, and since to kill is equally (because in the highest degree) to mischieve, it follows hence that Men are by nature equal^c. When he subjoins that the present Inequality has been introduc'd by Civil Law, he seems to me very much to have forgotten himself. For he had been speaking before of the natural Equality of Mens Strength, to which it is a great Impropriety to oppose the Unequalness arising from politick Institutions, which does not affect or regard the Strength of Men, but their State and Condition; does not make one Man stouter than another, but greater in Quality and Honour. Nor has the same Author much better Success, when he pretends^d to discover in the Faculties of the Mind a greater Equality than that of Strength. He says indeed, that all Prudence is but Experience, which Nature in equal time equally bestows on all Men, in those things they equally apply their Minds unto. But do not we see one Man piercing more deeply than another into the Consequences of things^e, applying more dextrously what he observes, and distinguishing with more Perspicacity the likeness or unlikeness of Cases and Circumstances? And hence it frequently comes to pass, that of two Men who have been employ'd an equal Time in the same Business one shall grow eminent for Management and Address, whilst the other's natural Heaviness shall be little amended by so long a Course and Experience of Affairs. Nor does the great Disparity of Mans Prudence arise only from their own false and overweening Conceit of their particular Worth; every one thinking himself to have a higher degree of Wisdom than the Vulgar; that is, than all, except a few, whom by Fame, or for concurring with himself, he is wout to approve and admire. For this Disparity appears not only when a Man compares himself with others, but when he compares others amongst themselves, and is not concern'd as to his own Interest, which side carries the Advantage. Nor do we always favour and commend him, who conspires with our own Thoughts and Desires; but whom the fair Contrivance and the good Success of his Project, entitles to our Approbation. And although such is the natural Temper of Man, so greedy is he of Esteem and Applause, that every one disdains to be upbraided with Folly or² Imprudence, and is exceedingly incens'd against those who boast of much larger Talents, much higher Attainments than his Neighbours; yet it does not follow hence, that no one allows another to be wiser than himself. For what if we fancy two Men falling together into the same danger, one of whom by his dexterous Management comes cleanly off, whilst the other is basely hamper'd, and escapes not without considerable Hurt or Prejudice; will not the latter here acknowledge his Fellow to have had a better Head-piece than himself? This is indeed a part of that Freedom which Men equally enjoy, that a wiser Person shall have no Right to challenge the Government of one more simple, unless with his Consent; especially if the latter profess himself to be contented with his own little Sagacity, and not desirous of the Controul and the Direction of others.

But although the Consideration of equal Strength is thus far serviceable to our present Purpose, that it may restrain one Man from rashly insulting over another, in as much as all Contention with an Equal is of dubious Issue; and because it is extreme Folly to desire the hurting another by undergoing our selves the same Proportion of Mischief: Yet the³ Equality which we are now treating of is of a different Species, and the inviolable Observation of it is in the highest degree conducible to the common Benefit and Interest of Mankind. And here, as in all other things, may we justly admire the wise Contrivance of Nature, that whilst she distributes amongst Men the Goods of the Body and of the Mind, by unequal Parcels and Measures, she introduces this general Equality, to form an agreeable Harmony amongst all the other Varieties and Disproportions. For as in well order'd Commonwealths, one Subject may exceed another in Riches or in Honour, but all are equal Sharers in the common Liberty; so under this Regulation of Nature, how much soever a Man may surpass his Neighbours, as to bodily or intellectual Endowments, he

is still obliged to pay all natural Duties, as readily and as fully as he expects to receive them; nor do those Advantages give him the least Power or Privilege to oppress his Fellows. Nor on the other side, does the bare unkindness of Nature, or of Fortune, set a Man in a worse Condition than others, as to the Enjoyment of common Rights. But whatever one Man requires or expects from others, the same may others (all Circumstances being alike) demand from him; and the same Judgment one decrees against another, he is obliged in like Case to submit to himself^{a 4}. On this Account we can by no Means admit of Cicero's Rule, which he lays down in his third Book of Offices; *Lex ipsa nature, &c. The Law of Nature it self, which preserves and holds together the common Profit of Mankind, does decree, That things necessary for Life and Sustenance may be transferr'd from an idle and useless Person, to a Man of Wisdom, Goodness, and Valour, who, should he be suffer'd to perish, would exceedingly prejudice the Publick by his Death*⁵. Much more unworthy of Approbation is that Saying of the American, recorded by Montaigne^b, who coming to Roan in the Reign of Charles IX. and being ask'd what he observ'd that was singular in France, answer'd that amongst other things, he could not but wonder to see some Persons abounding in all manner of Plenty, and others oppress'd with the most grievous Want, begging at their Doors, and not rather choosing to invade and pillage them for their own Support. For as those who excel in the Goods of the Mind, of the Body, or of Fortune, ought not to treat Men of lower Condition with Haughtiness and Insolence; so neither ought these to envy or to rifle their Superiors.

And this Equality we may call an Equality of Right; the Principle from which it springs is this, that the Obligation to a social Life equally binds all Men, in as much as it is the inseparable Companion of human Nature, consider'd simply as such. Where we may observe farther, that between Obligations enjoy'd by a Superior, and those which arise from mutual Compact, there seems to be this Difference, that the latter immediately cease to a Man, when the other Party hath broken the Agreement; whereas the former may still engage us to some Performances towards a Person who is wanting in a natural return of Duty. And the Reason of this is, because the Author and Imposer of the Obligation is able to make up to us some other way what we lose by being more just than our Neighbours. But our Obligation to the Practice of natural Duty and Right, although imposed by the supreme Lawgiver, does thus far agree with Obligations of common Bargains and Covenants, that so soon as one Person recedes from it⁶, he can no longer require the same Offices from another; and besides, the other Party does hence acquire a Right of compelling him by Force to make Satisfaction. Though the Genius of Civil Society makes it necessary to abridge and allay this Liberty adhering to a State of Nature, for the support and maintenance of Government and Peace.

III. Other Reasons there are popular and plausible, which might give us no little Assistance in discovering, and in illustrating this Equality. Amongst which this is not the least considerable, that we all derive our being from one Stock, from the same common Father of human Race. On this Consideration Boetius checks the Pride of insulting Nobility: l. iii. metr. 6.

⁵ Our Author seems not sufficiently to have attended to the Connexion of Cicero's Discourse, if he imagines that the Orator lays it down for a general Maxim, That we may always take the Goods of Fortune from them who are not so worthy to enjoy them as we are, as if a Person of great Merit had a sufficient Title and Right to strip a Proprietor of the Goods he is lawfully possessed of; whereas Cicero speaks only of an extraordinary Case, viz. in extreme Necessity, and then, as rigid as he seems to be, builds his Determination not upon that Right which every one has to preserve himself, but upon the good of Society, whose Interest it is to preserve such a Person; for he says, that out of such a Case, the most honest Man in the World, tho' he be almost famished, may not take a Morfel of Bread from any Man, which may be of use to others. In a word, Cicero had taken such great Care to prevent any such loose Interpretation of his Words, that it is astonishing, how our Author could so strangely pervert his Meaning.

Passage, from the lowest of Mankind ^a. Our Growth and Nourishment is perform'd alike, and the gross Remainders of our Food are carried into the same Common Shore. Lastly, our Life hastens to the same general Mark; Death observes no Ceremony, but knocks as loud at the Barriers of the Court, as at the Door of the Cottage ^b; and after Death, our Bodies are resolv'd into the same Dust and Corruption ^c. Besides, wise Men are ever pressing it upon our Consideration, that we are alike obnoxious to the Sports of Fortune, to the endless variety of Dangers or Mischances; or rather, that the divine Disposer of all Things ensures no Man in his present State, or in the Possession of unshaken Felicity: But according to the secret Counsels of his Providence, exposes divers Men to various Changes and Troubles, as if he pleas'd himself in raising the Poor out of the Dust, and casting the High down to the Ground. (See (*) at the bottom of the Page.) Our Christian Profession suggests many Motives to the same Purpose; as that God does not esteem Men according to their Nobility, their Power, or their Wealth, but according to their sincere Piety and Goodness. And that at the last Day of Judgment, of the Distribution of Rewards and Punishments in another Life, no regard will be had to those who swell in Port and Figure, beyond their Neighbours of this World.

IV. This Equality being admitted, there flow from it several Precepts, the Observation of which bears a very great Force in the maintaining of Peace and Friendship amongst Men. And this in the first place is most manifest, that he who would use the Assistance of others in promoting his own Advantage, ought as freely to be at their Service, when they want his help on the like Occasions. One good Turn requires another, is the common Proverb. For he must certainly esteem others unequal to himself, who constantly demands their Aid, and as constantly denies his own. And whoever is of this insolent Temper, cannot but highly displeas'd and provoke those about him, and soon give occasion to a Breach of the common Peace ¹. It was a manly and gallant Reproof which Caractacus gave the Romans, Num si vos omnibus imperitare vultis, sequitur ut omnes servitutem accipiant? Because you desire to be Masters of all Men, does it follow that all Men must desire to be your Slaves ²? And indeed, it as much implies a Contradiction to determine differently in my own Case, and another's, when they are exactly parallel, as to make contrary Judgments on things really the same. Since then every Man is well acquainted with his own Nature, and as well, at least as to general Inclinations, with the Nature of other Men, it follows that he who concludes one way as to his own Right, and another way as to the same Right of his Neighbour, is guilty of a Contradiction in the plainest Matter; an Argument of a Mind unfound in no ordinary degree. For no good Reason can be given, why what I esteem just for myself, I should reckon unjust for another in the same Circumstances. Those therefore are most properly sociable Creatures, who grant the same Privilege to others, which they desire should be allow'd themselves; and those who on the other hand, are most unfit for Society; who imagining themselves a degree above vulgar Mortals, would have a particular Commission to do whatever they please; they give themselves a free Pardon for all things, and vouchsafe not to others the least Indulgence; they demand the principal Share of common Honours, and of common Goods; though their Right and Title is not distinguish'd by any peculiar Excellence or Advantage. For as in raising an Edifice, a Stone which by reason of its rough and angular Figure, robs others of more room than it fills it self, and upon account of its exceeding Hardness, cannot conveniently be cut into Regularity, and so hinders the whole Frame of Building from closing together, is thrown aside by the Workman, as unfit for all Use and Service; so those πλεονέκται, those greedy Churls, whose rough and savage Temper inclines them to heap Superfluities on themselves, and to deprive others of mere Necessaries, and whose violence of Passion makes them incapable of being reclaim'd, are indeed the great Impediments of Society, and the Plagues of Mankind. Hence it is a Command of Nature's Law, that no Man who has not obtain'd a particular and especial Right, shall arrogate to himself a larger share than his Fellows; but shall admit others to an Enjoyment of equal Privileges with himself^a. Therefore the Commissioner in Livy^b, who came to treat with the common People in Sedition, was guilty of Insolence, when he told them, Satis superq; humilis est, qui æquo jure in civitate vivit, nec inferendo injuriam, nec patiēdo. He is humble enough, and indeed too humble in a State, who is content to live upon equal Terms and Rights, neither doing an Injury, nor taking one. As if it were a hard Case, that the Privilege of Nobility should not be strong enough to dispense with that fundamental Law of Equity, Do as thou wouldst be done by^c! On this Principle is built that gallant Compliment of * Pliny to the Emperor Trajan, Unum ille se ex nobis, & hoc magis excellit atque eminet, quod unum ex nobis se putat: nec minus hominem se quam hominibus præesse meminit. He thinks himself one of us, and 'tis this makes him more our Superior, that he passes in his own Judgment for our Equal, and remembers himself to be no less a Man than the meanest Subject whom he governs. For that excellent Prince, when he accepted the supreme Command, had promised that private Men should find him such an Emperor, as he himself desired to find, whilst a private Man³. Galba in Tacitus^d, gives Piso an admirable piece of Advice to the same Purpose. Utilissimus idem ac brevissimus bonarum malarumq; rerum delectus est cogitare, quid aut volueris sub alio principe, aut nolueris. The best and the shortest Rule to obtain the true Art of good Government, is to consider what you would your self approve, and what you would condemn in another Prince; and accordingly to practise the former, and to avoid the latter. And Seneca^e joins in the same wise Direction; This (says he) is the Sum of my Advice, shew such Behaviour towards an Inferior, as you would have a Superior shew towards you^f.

V. The same Equality teaches a Man how to carry himself, in case he be appointed Arbitrator of any Right betwixt others, namely, that he treat them as Equals, and give no Favour or Indulgence to one above the rest, except such as can claim by virtue of some peculiar Right. For he that by a partial Preference of one Person to another, violates the Rule of natural Equality, is at the same time guilty of an Injury, and of an Affront, by denying a Man what is his just Due, and by detracting from that Worthiness, which Nature gives him in common with his Fellow¹. It follows as a Corollary from this Doctrine, that if the thing which is to be distributed amongst many, admit not of a Division, the Persons who have an equal Right to it, use it in common, and without stint, if the Quantity of the thing will allow it; if not that they then use it in a certain and limited manner, and with proportion to their Number. For it is not possible to find out any other way of observing an Equality in these Cases. But if the thing can neither be divided, nor possess'd in common, then the use of it shall either be taken by turns², or if this Course too fail of Success, and if likewise one of the Contenders cannot give the others an Equivalent to secure to himself the whole Enjoyment of the thing desired, then one shall carry it from the rest, by the fair Decision of a Lot; which is the most proper Remedy that can be applied to all Differences of this kind, in as much as it takes away the Notion of Contempt, by setting all the Parties on a Level; and if it does not favour a Man, yet does it not in the least disgrace him^h.

³ The excellent Saying of Seneca to this Purpose is very remarkable, Sic cum inferiore vivas, quemadmodum tecum velles superiorem vivere, Deal so with your Inferiors, as you would have your Superiors deal with you. Epist. 47. & de ira, l. 2. c. 28.

MR. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on §. 5.

¹ For as an antient Author (viz. Livy, l. 34. c. 4.) speaks, Quod ut alii liceat, tibi non licere, aliquid naturalis aut pudoris aut indignationis habet. That what is lawful for another, should not be lawful for you, creates a natural Shame, or a natural Indignation.

² When Things are enjoyed by turns, the Lot must decide who shall have the first Turn. Hobbes, c. 3. §. 17.

³ Thus the Tribune of the Commons speaks in Dionysius Halicarnassensis, Antiq. Rom. lib. 7. c. 41. "With regard to the underwritten Laws of Nature, O ye Senators, we demand that the People may thus far enjoy the same Rights with you. We grant that those of your Number who excel in Virtue and in Fortune, ought to possess the chief Offices and Honours of the State: But this Privilege we presume may be fairly challeng'd by every Member of a Commonwealth, to be secured from Injuries, and to obtain Justice against those who offer them. Lastant. Div. Instit. l. 3. c. 22. This my Lord Bacon calls a Gygantean Temper of Mind, possessing those great Disturbers of the World, who seem to aim at nothing less than to render all Men happy or miserable, according as they appear their Friends or Foes; and as it were to make all Nature bear their own Image; which is properly fighting against Heaven. De Augment. Scient. l. 7. c. 2.

Hobbes^a has divided Lots into two sorts, arbitrary and natural. The former is such as the Competitors agree upon, engaging to stand to the Event, whilst they cannot by any Art govern or foresee it; and therefore this kind of Lot, with regard to Men, depends entirely on meer Chance and Fortune. Natural Lot, he says, is either first Seizure, by which a Thing, which can neither be enjoy'd in common nor divided, passes to him who shall first lay Hands on it with a design to keep it; or Primogeniture, by virtue of such paternal Goods as can neither be divided nor possess'd in common by many Children, and are adjudg'd to the First-born. Yet if we accurately consider Things, there will appear to be no proper Lot but what we may call arbitrary. For 'tis not easy to assign a Reason why such an Event as a Man cannot procure by his own Industry, should give him a Right which should hold good against his Equals, unless this Right was assign'd or adjudg'd to this particular Event, by the arbitrary Appointment and Agreement of Men. Thus a Thing which no one has a particular Right to claim, belongs³ by Compact to the first Seizer; because when distinct Proprieties were introduced, there seems to have pass'd this tacit Agreement amongst Men, that those Things which were not peculiarly assign'd to any Owner, and yet could not without a Prejudice to Mankind be always left in common, should be the Right of the first Possessor. And thus too the Right of Primogeniture owes its Original to human Constitution and Compact. For otherwise, why should the younger Brothers, born of the same Parents, be placed in a worse Condition than the eldest, barely upon account of an Accident or Circumstance, which it was not in their Power to hinder^b? Now the Reason why these two Claims by Primogeniture, and first Seizure, are sometimes, tho' improperly call'd Lots, is this, because they cannot be foreseen or directed by any Power of human Industry, and because it reflects no real Disgrace on a Man to lose the Preference, for want of these Advantages⁴.

VI. This Rule of Equality is likewise transgress'd by ¹ Pride, when a Man² for no Reason, or without sufficient Reason, prefers himself to others, bearing a lofty Carriage towards them, as base Underlings, unworthy of his Consideration or Regard. How vastly distant this Temper is from the Virtue of Generosity and true Greatness of Mind, Des Cartes has most elegantly shewn in his Treatise of the Passions. He lays it down as a Principle, "that it is one of the chief Parts of Wisdom to know how and on what Accounts every one

"ought to esteem or disesteem himself; and then he makes out, that the only just Cause of esteeming ourselves, arises from the lawful Use of our Power of free Choice, and from the Command and Authority which we exercise over our Wills; since besides the Actions which depend on that Faculty, there is nothing in us that can properly merit Praise or Dispraise. Hence he concludes, the true Notion of Generosity, which prompts a Man to value himself as highly as in reason he ought, to consist in this, that he acknowledge nothing to be truly his own, but this free Disposition of his Will; that he be sensible he cannot purchase Blame or Commendation, otherwise than by the ill or the good Use of this Power; and that at the same time he feel within himself a full Purpose and Resolution of using it well. He proceeds to observe, that those who have such a true Sense of themselves are easily inclin'd to think, that every Man judges of his own Worth in the same manner, since there is nothing in this Notion which hath any Dependence on external Things or Persons. That for this Reason they never despise others, but are ready to excuse their Faults, as proceeding rather from Mistake than Design. That as they think themselves not much inferior to those who exceed them in Wealth, Honour, Beauty, Wit, or Learning, knowing that these Advantages ought not to come into the Account; so when they find themselves possess'd of the like Goods, they do not fancy they are much superior to those who want them. Hence, he says, there is discoverable in the most generous Spirits an honest Humility; a Virtue consisting in the Reflection which we make on the Infirmary of our Nature, and upon the Miscarriages which we either have formerly been guilty of, or may be hereafter, these being no less than we see committed by others; whence it comes to pass, that we prefer not ourselves to any Person living, wisely considering that all Men have the same Faculty of Free-will, and may all employ it to as good Use. He remarks farther, that those who entertain a good Opinion of themselves for any other Cause, are not endued with real Generosity, but puffed up with empty Pride, which as it is always vitious, so it is aggravated the more, the more unjust the Cause is on which the Self-conceit is founded. And the most unjust Cause of Pride is the being proud without Cause; that is, when a Man being conscious to himself, that he has no real Merit which should entitle him to Esteem, imagines Glory to belong to

⁴ This Point is more largely discours'd of, Lib. 4. c. 11. §. 8. & Lib. 5. c. 9. §. 2. & Lib. 7. c. 7. §. 11.

MR. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on §. VI.

¹ Pride taken in its most extensive Meaning does not always directly oppose the natural Equality of Men, as may appear from §. 1. Note 1. All that our Author says here refers only to Mens Reputation in general. For Pride in general signifies nothing else than a very high Opinion of a Man's self. See Titius, Observ. 179, &c. and Thomasius's Instit. Jurispr. Div. l. 2. c. 4.

² When any one has lawfully gotten a Right which gives him a Preheminence above others, he ought to value and maintain it, provided that he avoid all vain Ostentation, and all Contempt of his Inferiors. And on the other side Inferiors ought not in this Case to refuse them a Preference, but pay them the Honours which they may lawfully require, as our Author says in his Treatise of the Duties of Men and Citizens, Lib. 1. c. 7. §. 5. Our Author cites at the bottom of this Paragraph a Passage out of Euripides, shewing us, that if any one is arriv'd at a Degree of Distinction, he ought not to be proud, but on the contrary have the greater Affection for his Friends, by how much he sees himself in a better Condition to do them Service. Iphig. in Aulid. v. 343. He also recites a Passage out of Lucian, Tom. II. p. 14. Ed. Amst. Of Images. Οὐδὲν γὰρ εἰς θουσιότης, &c. No Man will envy Persons in Authority, if they use their Power with Moderation. 'Tis the Abuse of Power that begets Envy. Mr. Ablancourt delivers the same. What goes before, and what follows after, deserves Reading.

^b Therefore Aristotle says, Brothers are equal, except they differ in Age, Ethic. 8. c. 12.

“ every one that pleases to usurp it, and that the “ greater share a Man claims of it, the greater he “ really enjoys³. A Vice so extremely absurd, that “ ’tis scarce credible any should prostitute them“ selves to such a Baseness, were there not a Pack “ of idle Flatterers in the World, who, by their “ false Praises, swell Men of heavy Parts into this “ most stupid Degree of Folly, which the Poet^a “ calls a kind of Madness.

Nor does a Man’s Advancement to Honour, or Power, give him any just Reason to be proud; on which Point Menelaus in Euripides^b, thus admirably expostulates with Agamemnon:

Ἦϊδ’ ἔτ’ ἐσπέδαζες ἀρξεν Δαυίδαίς, &c.

*You know when with ambitious Aim you strove,
 To lead the Greeks to Troy, and rule the War,
 How meek you look’d, how low you stoop’d to reach
 The meanest Hand; your hospitable Gate,
 Free of Access, let in the vulgar Tide;
 You, as in order thro’ the Ranks you pass,
 With courteous Arts of popular Address,
 Saluted, Man by Man, the gaping Crowd,
 And forc’d your Honours on unwilling Crowns:
 That low Compliance might advance your Pride,
 And in the common Market purchase Praise.
 But Master of your Wish, and voted Chief
 Of our united Force, lofty you grew
 In Manners, as in Place; your Doors were barr’d, Four Friends (once Friends, but now intruding Slaves)
 Drove back with Scorn; yourself, like some rich Gem, Deeply encas’d, and veil’d from vulgar View.
 But a good Man, if Wealth or Dignity
 Exalt his State, should keep his Soul unmov’d
 From Virtue’s Centre, and elude the Charms
 Of swelling Insolence; should freely smile
 On Friends beneath, and serve them with more Will,
 When his improv’d Condition gives more Power.*

Lucian^c has left an excellent Observation to the same purpose; No Man, says he, *will envy one advanced to Eminence and Grandeur, if he see him bear

VII. A much heavier Breach of this Equality is it, for a Man to shew his Contempt of others by outward and open Signs, whether by Actions or Words, by a Look or a Laugh, or any such Affront; one kind of which is often express’d by troubling another with a ridiculous or a disagreeable Present^d. Which Sin is to be reputed so much the more heinous, as it gives the highest Provocation imaginable, and inflames the Sufferer with the greatest Violence of Anger and Revenge. For we find many Persons who will expose their own Life to present Danger, and much more break the Peace with others, rather than put up such a grating Indignity: Inasmuch as every Act of this Nature is a Wound to a Man’s Glory or Reputation, of which Goods we are more proud, and more tenderly fensible, than of any Thing else we possess; and in the safe and flourishing State of which, almost the whole Pleasure of our Mind consists.

VIII. From what has been offer’d on this Head, it is easy to discover the Absurdity of that Opinion, derived from the ancient Greeks, of some Mens being Slaves by Nature. Which if taken in the same Crudeness of Sense, as it bears in the Expression, is directly repugnant to that natural Equality, which we have been endeavouring to establish^e. Thus much indeed is most evident, that some Men are endued with such a Happiness of Wit and Parts, as enables them not only to provide for themselves and their own Affairs, but to direct and govern others.
 And that some again are so extremely stupid and heavy, as to be unfit to govern themselves, so that they either do mischief, or do nothing, unless others guide and compel them. And farther, that these last being commonly furnish’d by Nature with strong and hardy Bodies, are capable of bringing many notable Advantages to others by their Labour and Service. Now when these have the Fortune to live in Subjection to a wise Director, they are without doubt fix’d in such a State, as is most agreeable to their Genius and Capacity. If therefore these two Parties of Men voluntarily consent to the Establishing of some common Government amongst them, it is consonant to Nature, that the former be invested with the Power of Commanding, and the latter with the Necessity of Obeying, by which Method the Interests of both will be best promoted and secured. And in this Sense we may without Danger admit of Aristotle’s Aphorism, laid down in his first Book of Politicks, c. 2. τὸ μὲν συνάμεινον τῇ διαύσια προωξάν, &c. which according to ² Heinsius his Paraphrase runs to this purpose; Nothing is more suitable to Nature, than that those who excel in Understanding and Prudence, and are able to judge of Things at a Distance, should rule and controul those who are less happy in these Advantages; on the other hand, those whose bodily Strength and Vigor enables them to put the Commands of wiser Men in Execution, are by Nature framed and designed for Subjection and Obedience. From this Constitution of Things the So-

³ This Vice is not only ridiculous in itself, and with relation to him that is guilty of it, being so foolish as to value himself without any Ground, but is very injurious to others; since he must at least imagine, that the rest of Mankind are such Sots and Fools, as to pay their Respects to Persons of no manner of Merit.

MR. BARBEYRAC’S NOTES on §. VII.

¹ There is a Passage in Mr. De la Bruyère’s Characters in the Chapter, Of Man, worthy of our reading, because it confirms and illustrates the Notion of our Author. ’Tis this: They who take away our Goods by Force or Injustice, and rob us of our Honour by Calumny, shew their Hatred to us sufficiently; but yet they do not equally prove that they have no Esteem for us. On the contrary, Mockery is an Injury, which least of all deserves Pardon; it is the Language of Contempt, and such an one as is casiest understood; it attacks a Man in his last Entrenchments, i. e. the Opinion of himself; it renders a Man ridiculous in his own Eyes, and convinces him that he has the worst Disposition to him possible, and so renders him irreconcilable.

MR. BARBEYRAC’S NOTES on §. VIII.

² There is a Letter of Dan. Heinsius’s in the various Readings of Janus Rutgersius, l. 4. c. 3. wherein he shews, that Aristotle did not speak of the natural Condition of such as are naturally disposed to be Slaves, but of their natural Servitude. And he endeavours to reconcile the Maxims of Philosophy with the Civil Lawyers, who say, that Slavery is contrary to Nature. See Note 6. following, and Lib. 6. c. 3. §. 2.

^e And therefore Strabo, l. 1. speaking of those who advised Alexander to treat all Grecians as Friends, and all Barbarians as Enemies, wisely observes, that the Distinction ought rather to have been founded in the Goodness or Badness of the Persons, many Grecians being wicked and cruel, many Barbarians virtuous and obliging.

sovereign and the Slave receive equal Advantage, the Benefits and the Conveniencies are alike on both Sides^a. Yet it would be the greatest Absurdity imaginable to believe, that Nature actually invests the Wife with the Sovereignty over the Weak and Imprudent, or with a Right of forcing them to submit and obey against their Wills. For no Sovereignty can be actually establish'd, unless some human Deed or Covenant precede. Nor does a natural Fitness for Government presently make a Man Governor over another, who is as naturally adapted for Subjection; nor, supposing a Thing to be profitable for another, is it therefore lawful for me to force it upon him against his Inclination. For all Men enjoy a natural Liberty in the same Measure and Degree, which before they suffer to be impair'd or diminish'd, there must intervene either their own Consent, Express, Tacit, or Interpretative, or some Fact of theirs, by which others may obtain a Right of abridging them of their Liberty by Force, in case they will not part with it by a voluntary Submission. 'Twas therefore well urged by Quintilian's Declaimer^b: What hath Nature produced amongst all her Works which she hath not set in a State of Freedom? I forbear to speak of Slaves, whom the hard Chance of War hath deliver'd up as a Prey to the Conquerors, though they were born by the same Laws, by the same Necessity, by the same Accidents contributing to their Original. They draw Breath out of the same free and common Air; and 'twas not the Decree of Nature which gave them Masters, but the Unkindness of Fortune. 'Tis a Maxim of Ulpian, that all Men by a natural Right are born free^c; which Grotius interprets, "To be such as is only a Privation of Servitude, not a Contradiction to it; that is, it provides that a Man shall not be by Nature a Slave; but it gives him no Right that he shall not become a Slave afterwards; for no Man is in such a Sense free, as that it shall be impossible for him to lose his Liberty." The same Truth may be thus explain'd in other Words; since Nature hath produc'd all Men equal, and since Servitude cannot be conceiv'd without Inequality (for Servitude necessarily brings in a Distinction of Superior and Inferior; whereas in the Notion of Liberty, it is not requisite that we should have an Inferior; but 'tis sufficient that we are subject to no Superior) it follows that all Men naturally, and antecedently to any human Deed, are conceiv'd to be free. But natural Ability, or the Possession of such Qualities as are requisite for any State, do not immediately set a Man in that State. Every one who hath Capacity enough to rule a People, or to command an Army, is not without more ado a King or a General. Nor can such an accomplish'd Man as Horace's Lollius presently challenge to himself the Consular Fasces; tho' he fully answer that fine Character,

— *Est animus tibi
Rerumque prudens, & secundis
Temporibus dubiisque rectus,
Vindex avaræ fraudis, & abstinentis
Ducentis ad se cuncta pecuniæ;
Consulque non unius anni, &c.* Lib. iv. Od. ix.

Not Consul of a single Year, &c.

And what Plutarch reports of Pelopidas, that he held the Supreme Command longer than the Laws allow'd of, lest his Successors, thro' Idleness or Mismanagement, should prejudice the Affairs of the State, must be look'd on as an Instance, not of any standing Right, but of an extraordinary Indulgence^d.

And here too we have an Opportunity of interpreting that Saying of Albutius in Seneca^e, which is commonly cited on this Subject. By Nature a Man is neither Bond nor Free; 'twas Fortune that afterwards introduc'd these Names: That is, so long as all Men were equal, they could not be distinguish'd in our Mind by such a State as is opposite to their natural State of Equality. But afterwards, when those who lost or quitted that natural State, got the Appellation of Bondmen, in like manner those who retain'd it did now entirely engross the Title of Free. The Thing may be explain'd by this familiar Instance in a like Case; so long as there are no military Men in a State, the Subjects all keep the same common Name and Condition; but when part of the Subjects are list'd into armed Troops, the Distinction of the Soldiery and the Country immediately arises. And according to this Explication may we admit of that Notion, which Aristotle^f cites and rejects, that Bondage and Freedom owe their Original to Law. For were not Servitude introduced by human Compacts and Constitutions, such a Difference would be unintelligible, all Men being placed by Nature in the same equal State; as the Emperor speaks in the Institutions^g, Whereas before all Men enjoy'd the same general Name, the Law of Nations brought in three kinds of Men, Liberti, Servi, and Libertini; Men that are born Free, Men that are Slaves, Men that being at first Slaves have obtained their Freedom. Or it may be enough to justify that Saying, which Aristotle dislikes, to give it this Sense, the Rights of Liberty and Servitude, as they are consider'd in Men living under settled Governments, are defined by Civil Laws.

Many other Considerations there are of sufficient Strength, to overthrow that vain and gross Opinion of Slaves by Nature. For there is scarce any Man so dull and stupid, but he fancies it will be more proper and convenient for him to live according to his own Inclinations, than to submit himself to the Command, and to the Pleasure of another. This natural Desire appears more evidently in whole Nations, none of which are ever so low-spirited, as to prefer a Foreign Governor to a Prince of their own Country and Race. Lastly, Since Nature does not actually constitute any Superiority or Government, and since those natural Slaves, whom Aristotle speaks so much of, are commonly Men of strong ^a Apuleius in Philosoph. delivers the same Opinion. It is most agreeable, says he, that a Man who is neither by Nature nor Industry prepared for a right way of living, should not govern, but be govern'd; should be a Servant, not a Master; should upon account of his own Weakness and Incapacity be under the Controul of others; should sustain the Part of Obeying, not of Commanding.

Hands and able Bodies, there would be a hard Scuffle betwixt them and their wiser Neighbours for the Mastery; in which Contention the latter Party with all their Sagacity could not promise themselves any infallible Success. Aristotle's Argument borrow'd from the Poets, deserves likewise to be thrown out as most arrogant and unreasonable. Therefore, says he^a, the Poets tell us, 'tis just ^b the Greeks should rule the Barbarians; as if to be a Barbarian, and to be a Slave were naturally the same Thing^b. For according to this Doctrine, if we had a mind to destroy any Nation differing from us in Customs and Manners, it were only to brand them with the reproachful Name of Barbarians, and then to invade them without farther Colour or Excuse. It is manifest, that this absurd Notion of the Grecians arose chiefly from hence, that they were wholly inclin'd to a Democratical Government: Whereas their mighty Neighbours the Persians were constant Maintainers of a Monarchy, whom for this and other Reasons they mortally hated beyond all Bounds of Justice or Humanity. On this account Isocrates^c calls the Persians ἔχθροι πολέμιοι, Enemies by Nature to the Greeks, "and says, that in the general Councils or Assemblies, before any Business was transacted, a solemn Curse was denounced against those who should desire Peace or Friendship with the Persians;" and that at the great Feast of the Mysterics, the publick Heralds forbid all of that Nation, as Murderers, to be present at the holy Ceremony.

As for Aristotle's whole Discourse on this Subject, we shall put a more respectful and a more favourable Construction on his Words, if we say that by making two kinds of Servitude, natural and legal, he means the former to be when a Man of more Strength than Wit, serves another, whose Parts and Genius dispose him for Command; in which Case both enjoy a Condition most agreeable to their Nature and their Necessities. And that the legal Servitude which he speaks of, is when a Person of good Endowments and Abilities of Mind, is, thro' the Meanness of his Birth, or the Hardness of his Fortune, compell'd either by his own Fear, or by publick Constitutions, to serve a Master inferior to himself in those Accomplishments of Mind; and whenever this happens, 'tis scarce possible but that the Vassal should hate his Lord; whereas on the other hand, these Relations produce a firm Love and a kind of Friendship, when each Party bears that Character which is most suitable to his Disposition and to his Power. But still this must be fix'd as a most undoubted Principle, that the bare Force of such a natural Aptitude does neither give the one a Right of imposing a Condition of Servitude, nor oblige the other to receive it.

IX. It will be proper to add somewhat in short, concerning the other kind of Equality, which differs from the former, in that it is rather a Consequent, than an Ingredient of the State of Nature; we may call it an Equality of Power, or of Liberty, by which all Men are reckon'd naturally equal in this respect, that antecedently to any Deed or Compact amongst them, no one hath Power over another, but each is Master of his own Actions and Abilities. This Equality is taken away, when Men enter into a Civil State, where whilst one or more are invested with the Power of Commanding, and all the rest enjoind the Duty of Obeying, there arises the greatest Inequality imaginable between the Sovereign and the Subject. But since there still appears some Inequality, even between the Fellow Subjects, not only with regard to Honour and Esteem^d, but likewise as to the Power which one obtains over another; we may observe that Part of this Inequality proceeds from the State of Fathers of Families; who being the chief Rulers before the Institution of publick Governments, brought into such Governments the Power which they before held over their Wives, their Children, and their Servants^e. So that this Inequality being more antient than the Erection of Civil States, can by no means owe its Original to them; nor do they give this Power to the Fathers of Families, but leave it in their Hands as they found it; though in some Places it is thought convenient very much to abridge, and to restrain it. If any further Inequality, as to Power, be discoverable amongst Fellow Subjects, it is plain the Fountain and the Occasion of it must be the supreme Civil Authority. For those whom we suppose to have pass'd into a publick State, did at their Entrance on it, make over to their common Sovereign, so much of the Power which they before possess'd, as was necessary to support this new Constitution. And therefore in case any Person had before this Change transferr'd to another, any Right over himself, that Right would either cease and be extinct in the present Regulation, or it must submit to the Pleasure and Disposal of the superior Authority. But after a Man hath once join'd himself as a Member to any Civil Community, he cannot on any Account give another such Power over himself, as shall hold valid against the Right acquired by the chief Ruler; since this would be to ad-

³ This Notion proceeded partly (as our Author observes) from hence, that the Greeks were passionately in love with the Liberty of a Democracy, whereas the Persians were devoted to Monarchy; partly from the excessive and inhuman Hatred which the Greeks had to the Persians. Hence it is that Isocrates says in his Panathen. that the Greeks are by Nature Enemies to the Persians. We may also observe, that the Greeks in their publick Assemblies, before they made any Decrees, pronounced an Anathema or Curse against all those Citizens who should seek to make Peace, or have any Friendship with the Persians; and in the Celebration of their Mysterics, the Eumolpides and publick Heralds excluded from that Ceremony, in hatred to the Persians, all other Barbarians as Murderers, Panegy. In fine, the illustrious Algernoon Sidney says, that the natural Liberty of Man is a Principle received by Greeks, Romans, Spaniards, French, Germans, Britains, and in a word, by all Nations, who profess'd any Generosity, long before the Nativity of our Saviour; inasmuch that the Asians and Africans, a lazy and effeminate People, because they never attempted to preserve their Liberty, nor were able to govern themselves, deserved the Name of Slaves by Nature, a Name given them by Aristotle, and the Philosophers of his Time, who made a very little Difference between them and Beasts. See §. 1. in the Notes. Nevertheless, 'tis hard to excuse Aristotle altogether for those false Notions which he had about the manner how those Nations ought to respect and treat one another. See the Place cited in my Preface out of Plutarch, Strabo, and Aristotle himself at the Letters (kkk) and (lll.)

mit two independent Masters, whom'tis impossible to serve both at once. Whatever Inequality therefore amongst Fellow Subjects commences, after the Settlement of the Civil State, must take its Rise, either from the publick Administration, on account of which the Sovereign conveys by Delegacy, to some of the Subjects, a command over others; or from some certain Privilege granted by the same supreme governing Power. But disparity of Riches does not of it self cause any In-quality amongst Fellow Subjects; only as great Wealth affords Men matter of actual Hurt or Benefit to others, on which Score the poorer sort are wont to seek the Favour of the rich, by the most submissive Methods of Address, either to obtain Advantage, or to secure themselves from Injury^a. But there is nothing in this Civil Inequality any ways repugnant to those Precepts, which we have before deduced from a natural Equality^b.

MR. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on §. 9.

^a People are obliged the more to respect one another as Equals, because they are always in an estate of natural Liberty, and consequently in a perfect Equality of Right one towards another; whereas if we come to Particulars, there are divers civil Inequalities, which set Bounds to our natural Liberty and Equality. Nevertheless, we may observe some Inequality among People in respect to their Reputation, either simple, or with distinction. Simple Reputation is lessened, or entirely lost, when any People violate the Maxims of Civil Right with a wilful Design, and thereby render themselves worthy to be treated as the Enemies of Mankind. For a People that deals in such a manner must be looked upon only as a Body of Thieves and Pirates. See Lib. 8. c. 4. §. 5. As to our Reputation with distinction, see what is said in the same place at §. 15, &c.

CHAP. III.

Of the Common Duties of HUMANITY.

The CONTENTS of every Paragraph of the third Chapter.

- I. Every Man ought to promote the Interests of others.
- II. And that either indefinitely,
- III. Or definitely by common Humanity.
- IV. A lesser sort of Example, viz.
- V. Of allowing a way through another's Land,
- VI. And for Carriage of Goods.
- VII. Whether Toll may be required for such a Passage.
- VIII. Of our touching upon a strange Shore.
- IX. Of entertaining Strangers.
- X. Of allowing a Settlement to Foreigners.

- XI. Of granting a Market.
- XII. Whether a Man be bound to buy a Stranger's Goods.
- XIII. Of permitting Marriages.
- XIV. Whether any single Person may be denied what is common to all.
- XV. Of Beneficence.
- XVI. Of a grateful,
- XVII. And ungrateful Mind.

IT is but a poor thing not to have hurt another, or not to have robb'd him of his just Esteem^a: This negative Kindness to a Man will barely hinder him from having any fair Reason to hate, but can give him little Encouragement to love us. To knit Mens Minds more strongly together, it is necessary to add to this Forbearance of mutual Evil, the real Practice of mutual Good. The Debt which I owe upon account of my being a sociable Creature I have not yet discharg'd, whilst I have not estrang'd a Man's Affection from me by any mischievous or distastful Deed; but I ought farther to promote his actual Profit and Benefit, that I may shew it is a Pleasure to me to see others Partners of my Nature, and Sharers with me in the Goods which we possess. The near Relation which Men naturally bear to one another, is lost, unless it be cherish'd and kept up by a constant Commerce of kind Offices betwixt them^b. It was a noble Saying of Plato^c. Ἐκείνος ἡμῶν ἔχ' αὐτὸν μόνον χέρονεν, ἀλλὰ τῆς γενέσεως ἡμῶν τὸ μὲν πῖ ἢ πατεῖς μερίζει, τὸ δὲ πῖ οἱ γονήσαντες, τὸ δὲ οἱ λοιποὶ φίλοι. Which Passage Tully has thus borrow'd and enlarg'd upon in his Offices: Non nobis solum nati sumus, &c. We are not born for our selves alone; our Country, our Parents, and our Friends have all a Share and an Interest in our Being. 'Tis a Maxim with the Stoicks, that as the Earth and all the Productions of it were created for the Use of Men, so Men themselves were, for the sake of Men, brought into the World, that they might assist and benefit each other. In this we ought to follow the Guidance of Nature, to bring common Goods together, and freely lay them in common, and by an Intercourse of giving and receiving kind Offices, by Art, Industry, and by all our Faculties, to cement the Society of Mankind^d. Now

Laert. Infr. 1. 6. c. 10, 11. Phil. Jud. Declam. 19.* When I do but speak the Word Man, I imply Mercy, Courtesy, and Kindness. Add. Philost. de Vit. Apol. 1. 5. c. 1. Marc. Anton. 1. 3. f. 4. The good Person considers, that whatever partakes of Reason is of Kin unto him; and that to care for all Men generally is agreeable to the Nature of a Man. Idem 1. 4. f. 3. Men are born for the sake of each other. Add. id. 1. 4. f. 4. Seneca Epist. 95. We are all Members of a great Body. Nature produced us under a mutual Relation, from the same Principles, and for the same Designs. This inspired us with a Love one for another. She taught us the Lessons of Equity and Justice; it is upon account of her Constitutions, that

Now if the Law of Nature engages us to concern our selves with so much earnestness for the good of our Fellow-creatures, it must on the contrary condemn it, as a thing vile and unworthy of a Man, to rejoice in the Afflictions and Calamities of others, especially of innocent Persons; or on the other side to grieve and repine at the Prosperity of his Neighbours.

II. Now we may promote the good of other Men, either indefinitely, or definitely, and this either so as to part with somewhat of our own, or not. A Man indefinitely advances the common Benefit, when he so polishes and prepares his Mind or his Body, as to render them useful to the publick; particularly by Sagacity of Parts and Judgment, he discovers such Inventions, as may serve the Necessities or the Conveniencies of human Life. Columella^a observes with great Wisdom, "That it would be a thing of the highest Value and Advantage in the World, if every one were sensible of his own Ignorance, and always desirous to learn what he knew himself at present to be defective in."

Hence it appears, that those Persons are guilty of a Sin against Nature's Law, who neglect to exercise themselves in some honest Art or Employment, by living unprofitable to themselves, and troublesome to others, use their Soul only for Salt, to keep their Body from stinking.

— Numerus tantum, & fruges consumere nati;
Born only to increase the Number of Mankind, and to help to rid and devour the superfluous Fruits of Nature. For the rooting such useles Animals out of their State, the Egyptians had a Decree, obliging all Men to give in their Names to the Magistrates, and withal to intimate by what Calling or Profession every one got his Livelihood. He that brought in a false Account, or practis'd an unlawful way of Gain, was punish'd with Death^b. In the same Rank we may justly place those, who having a sufficient Fortune left them by their Ancestors, think their own Industry would be an unnecessary Trouble, since they have gain'd so fair a Subsistence by the Industry of others; and accordingly sacrifice their Time and Thoughts to Sottishness and Sloth. Nor does Virgil without good Reason assign a Station in Hell, to those useles and unmerciful Wretches, — *Qui divitiis soli incubuere paratis,

Nec partem posuere suis*^c.

— Who to Lucre fold,
Sit brooding on unprofitable Gold;
And dare not give, and ev'n refuse to lend

we ought to esteem it a greater unhappiness to do Hurt than to receive it: It is by her Orders that our Hands move so readily to the Assistance of our injur'd Neighbour. Let that good old Verse be ever in your Mind and in your Mouth:

Homo sum, humani nihil à me alienum puto.

I am a Man, and I esteem nothing a Stranger to me, which is of kin to Humanity. Let us lay our natural Powers in common. Human Society is built like an Arch of Stones, which is by this means only supported and upheld from Ruin, that each part hinders the fall of the other. Add. Bacon's Ess^d 13.

¹ The People of Sardis had a Law to the same effect, as Ælian relates in his Var. Hist. l. 4. c. 1. where see also Perizon. To this we may add, that the Senate of the Areopagus was obliged by Solon to enquire how every Man got his Livelihood, and punish them who had no Business. The same Lawgiver also made a Law, that no Son should be obliged to maintain his Father, who had not in his Youth took care to bring him up to some Trade. See the Life of Solon in Plutarch.

It was a Law amongst the Milesians, that he who had spent his Father's Estate, should be denied the Benefit of his Father's Sepulchre^d. Such an extravagant Spendthrift Manilius describes:

*Ille patri, natisq; reus, quas ceperit ipse,
Non legabit opes, censumq; immerget in ipso.
Tanta fames animumq; cibi tam dira cupido

That he devours himself, yet is not fill'd;
And whilst his Appetite proceeds to crave,
He eats his Funeral, and he spends his Grave.
Mr. Creech.

The Apostle amongst the Reasons obliging a Man to Labour, sets down this as no inconsiderable one, "ἵνα ἔχη μεταδίδουαι τὰ χεῖρα ἔχοντι, that he may have to give to him that needeth^f. And Horace could ask the covetous Man,

Cur eget indignus quisquam, te dicite?

Why should any one undeservedly reduced to Poverty, continue to want, whilst you abound? Such great Churls are like Swine, good for nothing till they are dead. The old Greek Epigram rallies them very pleasantly, and represents them very justly:

^a Πλαστὴν θαρσύνει πάντες, ἐγὼ δὲ σε φημι πένετος,
Χρήσις γὰρ πλάττει μάστιγος, Ἀπολλόφρατες.
^b Ἄν μετέχης αὐτῶν σὺ, σὰ γίγνεθ' ἄν τ' ἐφελάπτης
Κληρονομίαις, ἀπὸ νῦν γίγνεθ' ἀλλόβρια.

The World may think you rich, I'll say you'r poor;
None e'er was rich, but he who us'd his Store.
Use it, and 'tis your own; but if you spare
Till Death, you're only Steward for your Heir.

In my Opinion we ought not to judge more favourably of those useles Burthens to the Earth, who under the Pretence of Religion study only the Improvement of a fat Carcase, and in a lubberly Laziness consume the Fruits of other Mens honest Labour. Zozimus the Historian, though in other things as Profane as Paganism could make him; yet has pass'd a Censure just enough on some of these Monastick Brethren; they abstain (says he)

from lawful Wedlock^a, and fill City and Country with numerous swarms of Men, useful neither for War, nor for any other Service of the Commonwealth. Yet they have pursued their Designs with so much Success, from those times to the present Age, that they have engross'd to themselves the greatest part of the Lands and Estates, and under Colour of communicating all things with the Poor, have almost reduc'd all others to Poverty. To these we may add such begging Strollers, as they tell us are found amongst the Chinese, who fight with their Heads like Rams, till you part them with some piece of Bounty; or such as threaten to lay violent Hands on themselves, unless you give them what their Laziness craves^b. Valerius Maximus justly commends the Custom of the old Massilians, who as he reports the Matter, "used to shut up their Gates against all such who made the Plea of Religion a Cloak, and Shelter for Idleness; thinking it highly worth their Care to remove by all the Methods of Discouragement, such a false and drone-like Superstition. (Lib. II. Cb. VI. §. 7.)^c

On the other hand, those worthy Persons have been ever celebrated with the highest Praises, whose happy Parts and Study have invented new Arts, and Advantages of living; and then have not kept the Benefit of them to themselves, but communicated them freely to all Mankind. For as Horace observes,

*Paulum sepulchæ distat inertie
Celata virtus, L. iv. Od. 9.*

Conceal'd Virtue, or Worth, has little Advantage above the dullest Idleness.

Virgil has wisely placed in his Elysian Paradise,
*Inventas—qui vitam excoluere per artes,
Quiq; sui memores alios fecere merendo*^c.
Æn. vi. 663.

Those who by Arts invented, Life improv'd,
Or by deserving made themselves remember'd.
Sir William Temple^d.

Thus Antiquity advanced many^e to divine Honours, who had rendered human Life more commodious, by being the Authors of useful Discoveries, or of wise and wholesome Institutions^d⁶. Hence the Retirement of great Men, whilst they are capable of serving their Country in publick Employments, is an Humility not altogether commendable. And therefore it was too high a Strain of Philosophy in Similis, chief Minister to the Emperor Adrian, when quitting all his Honours and Offices, and spending his last seven Years in the Country, he left this Sentence for his Epitaph: Here lies Similis, whose Life was so many Years long, but he lived only Seven. Xiphilin.

By these and the like Methods then may we promote the good of others indefinitely, and in general; or without proposing to serve particularly such or such a Person; but by laying, as it were, our Benefits in common, and offering them to the publick Use⁷. But some on this Point will have the Curiosity to enquire, whether, supposing a Man to find such a famous secret, as what they call the Philosopher's Stone, the Art of changing, with little Trouble, the meanest Materials into the richest Metals; whether I say, he ought to communicate so rich a Discovery? And if any one ask so nice a Question, we may venture to resolve it in the negative, since were it possible to bring this grand Invention into ordinary Practice, Trade would be ruin'd, Inheritances and all kind of Riches would lose the good Force and Authority which they now bear in the World; and the whole Method and decent Orders of Life would be changed into endless Tumults and Confusion⁸.

III. We may be said to serve or benefit others, more definitely and expressly, when we confer on particular Persons any thing that may be useful and profitable to them. And this we may often perform, not only without our own Loss and Prejudice, but likewise without giving our selves any Labour or Trouble. To deny, or to grudge another a Kindness of this easy Nature, is justly censured as most detestable Malice and Inhumanity. For such a Power, by which we may oblige others, and not injure our selves, unless it be on due Occasion, put into Action and Effect, appears to be Vain, and only turns to the Reproach of him that has it. Hence it is usual to compare such unreasonable Churls to the Dog in the Fable, who refused that Provender to the Oxe's Hunger, which was so improper to satisfy his own. Therefore when we dispense this kind of Benefits, we regard only Man in general, or the common Nature which we all enjoy. Thus Aristotle, when some reproved him for bestowing an Alms on a vicious Person, wisely answer'd, ὃ δὲ τρέφου

⁷ On the other side, when any one labours to make himself a general Benefactor to Mankind, others ought, as much as in them lies, to encourage such a noble Attempt, or at least not hinder his Success by putting a Bar in his way thro' Envy. And if Men can't make any other better Acknowledgement, they should not forget to publish their Commendations, and make their Memory immortal, which is indeed the principal Reward of such as devote themselves to the Service of the Publick, and for which others are encouraged to imitate their Example, as our Author speaks in his Duties of a Man and Citizen, l. 1. c. 8. § 3.

But supposing me to be unwilling to keep a thing any longer; either because I am overstock'd, or because the Possession of it is some way troublesome, how barbarous would it look in me, not rather to leave it safe and entire, that it might prove serviceable to others, than to embezzle and destroy it? The case indeed is otherwise in War, where we ruin what we cannot keep, lest the Enemy should employ it to our Prejudice.

In like manner we are to allow freely to others, those things which they call res innoxie utilitatis, things of innocent Profit, or of harmless Use. Let us hear Tully settling this Point: As to those things, says he, which Men ought to hold in common, we may apply to many Cases the Instructions which Ennius gives us in one Instance:

*Ut Homo qui erranti comiter monstrat viam,
Quasi lumen de suo lumine accendat, facit:
Nihilominus ipsi luceat, cum illi accenderit.*

To set a wandering Traveller in his way,
Is but to light one Candle with another:
Yet put not out your own; let that no less
Shine clear, and not be loser by its Bounty.

From this one Example we may sufficiently apprehend, that whatsoever we can part with to another, without any Damage to our selves, this it is our Duty to give, though to a Stranger. Of which kind are these cheap and common Benefits, to afford Water from a River, Fire from Fire, good Counsel¹ to a Man that is in Doubt or Distress. All these things are profitable to the Receiver, without any Loss or Trouble to the Giver. Wherefore we ought both to use them our selves, and likewise to exhibit them to the common Good. But in regard, that particular Persons have not much to give, whereas the number of those that want it is almost infinite, in exercising this Duty of common Bounty we must have a respect to Ennius's wise Caution, NIHILOMINUS IPSI LUCEAT; that is, we must keep enough to have the Means of being liberal to our own Relations and Dependents^b.

Of these Favours then none is to be debar'd, unless such an one, as by his abominable Villany has rendred himself detestable to Mankind, and unworthy the common Privileges of his Nature. Thus their Service, whilst going to our Repose, we for some time lose the Use of them ourselves^a.

¹ Plato says truly, that Counsel is a sacred thing, λέγεται γὰρ συμβουλὴ ἱερὸν χρῆμα εἶναι. In Theagen. Tom. I. The Pythagoreans also held the same Maxim, and obliged those of their Sect to give their best Advice they could to such as desired it. See Jamblich. de Vit. Pythag. c. 18. §. 85.

² For according to the Maxim of *Terence, 'tis by no means the part of an ingenuous Man to expect our Acknowledgements without his Merit. Nor ought we to think that we lay a great Obligation upon others by such a Present as the Latin Poet † Horace ingeniously banters. The Calabrians when they present their Fruits to such as come to visit them, say, Eat, spare not. If their Friends answer, We have eat enough, they say, Take them, put them into your Pockets, they'll be an acceptable Present to your Children. If they reply, We are as much obliged to you as if we carried them all away. They again say, If you will not take them, we'll give them the Hogs. Who sees not that they can't tell what to do with what they so prodigally give? Such Prodigality has and does make many Persons ungrateful.

Prometheus, in Lucian, chargeth the Gods with Envy, and Narrowness of Spirit, that they should resent so highly his Action of communicating Fire to Mankind: "Since this could not be the less for being made publick, nor be itself extinguish'd by lending its Light to others.

To the same Head belongs the Use of running Water, for the ordinary Occasions of Life. For tho' Rivers may be the Property of whole States, or of private Persons, yet Humanity enjoins us to allow the Privilege of drinking, or of drawing for other Uses to any one, not actually engag'd in Hostility against us. We think the Point is settled with more Clearness this way, than if we should say with Grotius, that the River¹, as a River, is the peculiar Right of such a People, but as running Water² it remains in common. For it seems less agreeable to call the same Thing in different Respects, Proper and Common, than to affirm that the Use of a Thing ought by the Laws of Humanity to lie freely open to all, tho' the Thing itself may be really a Propriety or Peculiar³. Now to impute this as a Loan, which would otherwise be lost, and will be immediately repair'd by the Springs, would look most ridiculously fordid^b. Thus Latona argues with the Lycian Clowns in Ovid. Metam. VI. 349.

Quid prohibetis aquas? usus communis aquarum est, Nec solem proprium natura, nec aera fecit; Nec tenues undas: ad publica munera veni.

What Rudeness Water for my use denies,
Whose endless store the common World supplies?
Nor Light, nor Air did Heaven create for one;
Nor gentle Streams: I crave a publick Boon.

For tho' the Use of Water is common, yet the Possession of them may no doubt be turn'd into a Propriety. On this Account we find the Israelites offering to pay for what Water they or their Cattle should drink, in passing through the Country of Edom^c. However, if the Waters are in great Plenty, what the Current throws out at random, we ought freely to afford to all; so far as our Indulgence brings no Trouble or Inconvenience on ourselves^d.

We see then that Duties of this kind do originally belong to the Law of Nature; yet 'tis not unusual to have many of them further confirm'd and enjoin'd by Civil Constitutions. It may not be improper to set down an Instance or two. Solon's Law about Wells we find thus recorded by Plutarch: Because the Country hath but few Rivers, Lakes, or large Springs, and most use Wells, which have been dug, he made a Law, that where there was a publick Well within four Furlongs, all should draw at that; but when it was farther off they should search after a private Well. And if upon digging ten Fathoms deep they could find no Water, that then they should fetch from their Neighbours to the quantity of about ten Gallons every day. For he thought it prudent to make Provision against Want, yet not to encourage Idleness. "The same Author tells us, that Plato in his Laws, permits none to borrow Water from their Neighbours, but such as having first dug in their own Ground as deep as the Clay, could find no Spring." For he would have those only come in for a share with others, who could not provide for themselves. And the Spartan Legislator Lycurgus, allows a Person in necessity to make use of the Servant, the Beast, and even the Food of another Man^d.

This is not properly Love, or any personal Esteem and Reverence; but a provident Fear of the like Accidents, and a religious Apprehension of common Dangers. When we relieve a famish'd Wretch*, we do but as it were pity ourselves. Hence in a Siege we lay our Provision in common. Hence in a Distress at Sea the Food of one Passenger hath supported the whole Company. And hence too ariseth that Affection which puts us on covering with Earth † the dead Body of a Stranger; and how hasty soever our Journey be, we never fail stopping to perform, in some sort or other, this pious Office.

V. Amongst the same Duties of Humanity, Grotius, L. ii. c. 2. “reckons the granting free Passage thro’ any Lands, Rivers, or Parts of the Sea, which have fallen under our Propriety, if any have just Occasion to desire it; as suppose when any People expell’d out of their own Country, are going to find a new Seat; or when they desire to trade and correspond with a Nation which we divide from them; or when they are marching to recover what is their own in a just War; or when, being at a distance from home, they are hastening to the Defence of their Country, at present under some extraordinary Danger or Distress.” But we ought to allow this Point a fuller Discussion. Thus much then is clear beyond all doubt, that in case the Request be made by a small Number of Men unarm’d, and willing to live at their own Charge, Passage is to be granted them, provided they ask it upon an honest and necessary Account. But the Case of great Armies is not so easily to be decided; since the admitting of them may create just Fears and Suspicions in us, not only on their own Account, but in respect of the People whither they are bound. Grotius maintains, that notwithstanding any such Fear, their Petition is to be complied with for this Reason; “Because in that grand Division of Things, by which the Primitive Community was abolish’d, and distinct Proprieties introduced, all may be suppos’d to have reserv’d to themselves so far the use of each other’s Possessions, as should be serviceable to their Wants, and not injurious to the Owner; and that therefore when any stand in need of such a Use, they have a Right to demand it.” If any dislike this Argument, a plainer Reason may be thus offer’d, that the Law of Humanity obliges every Man to allow another the harmless use of his Goods or Possessions; which upon urgent Necessity may be challeng’d in a forcible manner, inasmuch as the Denial of it is presum’d to spring, either from groundless Diffidence, or from wicked Perverseness of Mind. Yet in such Cases, Leave is first to be ask’d fairly and peaceably, and Violence must not force a Passage, whilst it is yet uncertain, whether the Lord of the Place grounds his Refusal on any just Reason, or acts only out of a barbarous and inhospitable Temper. When Cimon the Athenian General going to assist the Lacedaemonians, with his Troops, broke thro’ the Territories of the Corinthians, without giving notice to the State, Lachartes the Corinthian gave him that handsome Reproof, καὶ ὃ ἕρσαν κώφαντας ἀλλοτρίαν, ἐκ εἰσέναι πρότερον ἢ τὸν κύριον κελεύουσι^a, That when a Manknock’d at another’s Door, he forbore in Civility to enter, till the Master had him come in^b.

Those who take the same Side of the Question with Grotius, add, that a Fear upon account of the Numbers of those who would enter, doth not seem a sufficient Reason to deny Passage; since a Multitude as well as a few Persons may inoffensively use this Privilege, and not trespass against the Law of Nature. However, the same Law empowers us to take Security of the Men whom we admit, to engage them to do no Damage, or to repair what they do. For the common Proverb tells us, that Opportunity makes the Thief; and he is a very unwise Matter of a House, who lets in so many Strangers, as to be turn’d out himself. Nor are there wanting Instances of several Cities, which have lost their Liberty, by unwarily receiving too great a Number of armed Guests. And what should make us more cautious is, that few Generals deserve the Encomium, which Tully^c on this score hath given of Pompey the Great, that he march’d his Legions thro’ Asia, in such a manner, as to keep not only the Hands, but even the Feet of so vast an Army, from committing the least Trespas on any peaceful and friendly Person. When the Helvetians, or Swiss in the Gallick War, sent Deputies to Cesar, to beg a Passage thro’ the Roman Province, we find Cesar rejecting their Petition on this very good Account, “He remember’d how the same People had formerly defeated and kill’d L. Cassius the Roman Consul, and forced his Soldiers to pass ignominiously under the Yoke; and he imagined it scarce possible, that Men who were Enemies in their Hearts should pursue their Way fairly, and without launching out into some Injury or Disorder^d.”

Many ways of taking Caution or Security in this Case are propos’d; as first, that they shall pass thro’ without their Arms; but ’tis very hard to get this Condition accepted of by military Men; ask them to part with their Weapons, and they take it as if you desired Leave to cut off their Hands^e. It may be a more proper Expedient, that the Forces make their Passage in small and separate Bodies, or that Hostages be given for their peaceable Behaviour. For what some propose, that those who grant the Passage, shall hire sufficient Guards at the Charges of those who desire it, would take up too much Money as well as too much Time.

It is farther said on the same side, that it will not justify us in denying this Favour, to alledge, that Passage may be had elsewhere, upon taking a larger Circuit; because should this pretence always be used, the Request would never be granted, tho’ in the most reasonable Case, and so the Right would utterly cease and come to nothing. It is sufficient therefore, in their Opinion, if without any fraudulent Design, Passage be there desired, where it lies most ready and convenient.

Some there are who maintain the Right of free Passage, on this Argument^f, that Highways are common to all Mankind, and do not come under the Propriety of those, in whose Territories they lie. As if at the first Creation of the World, the Roads had been chalk'd out immediately by the divine hand, and left as universal Benefits. A Notion too ridiculous to deserve a serious Refutation.

MR. BARBEYRAC’S NOTES on §. V.

¹ The Carthaginians, to shew that they had a Right to a Country which Massinissa King of Numidia contested about with them, alledged among other Reasons, that Massinissa himself had granted it; because when he pursued Cipbircs, who had escaped out of his Kingdom, and took his Rout round Cyrene with a Party of Numidians, he begged leave of the Carthaginians to pass thro’ that very Country, as then depending upon Carthage without Contradiction. the

On the other side there have been good Arguments offer'd, to evince that this ⁴ Liberty of Passage for an Army of Strangers is not owing to a mere natural Right, without any Compact or Concession intervening; especially when the Case is, that an Enemy to some of our neighbouring States desires leave to carry his Troops against them, thro' our Territories. For it seems to be part of the Duty, which we owe to our Neighbours, especially such as have been kind and friendly, not to suffer any hostile Power to march along our Country to their Prejudice, provided we can hinder the Design with no great Inconvenience to our selves ². And it is indeed one express Article in most Leagues, that neither Party shall grant Passage to the Foes of the other ^b. Nor will it solve the Difficulty, to say that we ought to allow Passage, if the War which is undertaken be just; not, if it be unjust. For there is commonly much Time and much Thought requir'd to make such a Judgment; and besides it is look'd upon as a piece of Rashness, to thrust in our Arbitration between two armed Parties, without their desiring it, and to constitute ourselves Judges of so great a Cause. But farther, supposing we grant the Request, it is very possible, we may by this Means fix the Seat of the War in our own Country. For what if the other Party should meet and stop his Adversary, whilst yet in our Borders? And I do not see how we could blame him for this Proceeding, since he is by no means oblig'd to receive the Foe into his own Dominions, on purpose to rid us of the Burthen and of the Trouble. It seems therefore the safest way of acting in this Case, if we can without any considerable Prejudice to our own Affairs, to deny the Enemy Passage, and actually to oppose him, if he endeavour to force it without our Consent. But if we are either too weak to hinder his Progress, or must on this Score engage in a dangerous War; the Plea of Necessity will fairly justify us to our Neighbour ^c.

Ziegler in his Observations on Grotius asserts, that in this Case no one can naturally have a Right of passing through the Lands of another, but all such Right must be obtain'd by Compact; just as no Man has the Liberty of going through the Fields of a private Person, unless such a Service is imposed on the Fields by Virtue of their particular Tenure. He says this will especially hold good, when we have just reason to apprehend Danger from such a Concession ⁶. And this Point too he illustrates by a parallel Case between private Persons. You may have a Right of making a Thoroughfare of Titius's Yard; but if you appear there often with Fire and Torches, so as to endanger the Buildings, Titius's Fear cannot indeed in this Case

⁴ In this Case the Benefit desired is not a Service without hurt: for there is a present Damage, and a great hazard of a future. For if an Army in its march causes sometimes Waste and Disorder in an Allies Country, and among their own Countrymen themselves, what will it do in a strange Nation? History, both antient and modern, and present Transactions furnish us with many Examples. See Tacitus's Hist. l. 2. c. 12. §. 87. Plin. Panegy. c. 20. numb. 4. Phil. de Comines l. 6. c. 2. Farther, a great number of Men, which pass through a Country, must of necessity make Provisions dearer, by which means the greatest part of the Natives suffer; but the Consequences, which may be apprehended, are far more burdensome, which we shall hereafter discourse of, when we come to supply the Defects of the Author, according to the Sense of Gronovius in a large Note upon Grotius, l. 2. c. 2. §. 13. numb. 1.

⁵ This is not the only Danger. For he to whom Passage is granted, may be overcome, and put to the worst; and if so, let the Cause of making War be just or not, he will certainly revenge himself upon those who did not keep his Enemy from invading him. But supposing there be nothing to fear from the strange Troops which are suffered to pass, the Abettors of the contrary Opinion agree, that many Precautions ought to be observed. The Men that are always in Arms are easily tempted to abuse them, and commit great Outrages. Moreover, if they are very numerous, and find an Opportunity to seize on a considerable Prey, how often have we seen Armies of Strangers ravaging or seizing to their own Use the Estates of a People who have called them to their Succour? nor have their solemn Oaths and Treaties been able to deter them from this foul Perfidiousness. See Just. l. 4. c. 4. n. 5. & l. 8. c. 3. Tit. Liv. Lib. VII. chap. 38. and what Wittikind says concerning the Saxons, l. 1. Annal. What then may we expect from such as are under no such strict Engagements, but only barely promise to do us no Injury? Furthermore, as in the Bodies of living Creatures the most tender Parts, and subject to be dangerously affected, are the inwards called the Vitals; so all States almost have this in common, that the further Men advance into the heart of a Country, they find it more weak and unarmed. The Carthaginians, otherwise invincible, were conquered near Carthage by Agathocles and Scipio. Hannibal said he could never beat the Romans but in Italy. It is then a very dangerous thing, considering the Covetousness of Men, which are never satisfied, to lay open these Secrets to Strangers, who having Arms at hand, may make an Advantage of our Weakness, and punish our Imprudence. To this we may add, that in all States there never want Men turbulent and disaffected, who are ready to stir up Strangers either against their Fellow-citizens, Sovereign, or Neighbours, as we are told by Francis Beaucaire in his Commentaries on the French Affairs; and Phil. de Comines, l. 7. c. 7. speaking of the Inhabitants of Pisa, to whom King Charles VIII. gave Liberty, when he passed through the Kingdom of Naples, to conquer it; and by Tacitus about the People of Lyons, Hist. l. 1. c. 65. These Precautions are always necessary to be observed, unless where such a Passage can't be prevented, for we may be often deceived, tho' we use all imaginable Circumspection. And whoever allows a Stranger to enter his Country, he gets either a Master or an Equal. But if we have no Reason to fear any thing either from him that would pass, or from him against whom he marches; yet he certainly deprives his Subjects of the Advantage of the Commerce, which his Subjects might have with that Neighbour, upon whom they let in an Enemy. See what is farther spoken according to Gronovius, Note 9.

^a And therefore 'twas unreasonable for the Romans in Livy, B. 21. c. 20. to desire the Gauls, that they would not grant the Carthaginians a free Passage into Italy, because they would thereby turn the War upon themselves, and expose their own Country to be wasted for the Security of another, to which they had no Obligation. We have not (say they) received any Advantage from the Romans, nor Damage from the Carthaginians, which may oblige us to take up Arms for the one, or against the other. ^b See the League of the Romans with the Carthaginians in Livy, B. 38. c. 38. and with the Etolians, Polyb. Excerpt. Legat. 28. ^c 'Tis remarkable what Plutarch reports in his Life of Lysander, that when the City of Athens was oppress'd by the Thirty Tyrants, the Thebans pass'd a Law, that whoever should carry Arms through Boeotia against the Athenian Tyrants, should be free from the Notice of the Theban Eyes or Ears.

absolutely take away your Right; but he may hinder you from going in so dangerous a manner, and consequently may abridge your Privilege, though he cannot annul it. But as to this way of arguing we must observe, that in the Question now before us, we do not by the Liberty of Passage understand any settled and constant Service; but only an occasional, and as it were a momentary use of another's Territories or Possessions, to which we are driven, either by Necessity, or by the Prospect of some extraordinary Advantage, when it would be Inhumanity in the other Party, not to comply with our Wants, and with our Request.

Examples, which are of so great Weight in determining other Questions, have little Force as to the Decision of this. For generally as People have been stronger or weaker, they have required Passage with Modesty, or with Confidence, and have in like manner granted, or refused it to others⁷. “Agefilaus in Plutarch, when the *Trallians*² demanded an hundred Talents, and as many Women for the Price of his Passage through their Country, ask'd them pleasantly, Why the Commissioners were not there ready at hand to receive them? and without further Delay march'd forward, encounter'd, and routed them. He sent to the King of Macedon, to desire the same Favour, who answering, that he would take time to consider of it; Let him consider of it, says Agefilaus, and in the mean while we will go forward. The Macedonian admiring, and fearing such Spirit and Reluctation, humbly requested him to pass at his Pleasure.

But the chief Example produced on this Point, is that of the Israelites, when desiring to pass thro' the Edomites Country, they voluntarily offer'd the following Conditions: “That they would march along the King's Highway, without turning into the private Fields or Vineyards, and would immediately tender Money for every thing of theirs which they should have occasion to use.” The Edomites rejecting these Terms, and endeavouring in a hostile Manner to hinder their Passage, they did not think it justifiable to obtain it by Force, but took a large Compass round about their Borders; and when at length they were oblig'd just to touch on⁸ some part of their Coasts, they did not take occasion from the former most inhuman Treatment, to commit any Violence or Trespas in their march^b. As to the same People, when Sibon King of the Amorites, not only refused them the like Privilege, but came out arm'd to oppose them, probably before they had reach'd his Coasts, and therefore set upon them without any Reason or Provocation, we find he was overthrown in the Combat; but he seems to have suffer'd this Fate, not so much for denying them Passage, as for rashly encountering them upon so little Colour or Pretence. For otherwise it would have seem'd too hard to punish the Neglect of a piece of Humanity with the ruin of a whole Nation; since it appears that these Amorites were seated without the Borders of the⁹ Land of Promise, the Inhabitants of which God Almighty had by a special Decree adjudg'd to utter Extirpation and Destruction. “Nor will it alter the Case to say with some that the Amorites here, to make their Fear justifiable, ought not to have rejected so fair Conditions, but should have immediately treated about accepting and regulating them; but that now by refusing all peaceable Conference and Commerce, they had rendred themselves liable to be dealt with as the most unjust and most unfaithful of Men:” For by the common Right and Privilege of Mankind, a Breach¹⁰ of the Law of Humanity does not deserve the utmost Rigor and Extremity of Proceeding.

VI. Amongst these Matters of harmless Profit, which Nature engages us to allow freely to all Men, Grotius reckons the permitting Goods and Merchandise to be carried through our Dominions. Ziegler accuses Grotius of a Contradiction on this Point, whilst in one place he says, That no one can have a Right of hindering any Nation from maintaining Traffick and Commerce with any other¹ Nation that is remote from them; and yet in another place of the same Chapter he grants, That it is lawful for one Nation to contract with another for all the Goods of one kind not to be found elsewhere; so that no other People shall have the Liberty of buying them. But

⁸ They never entred into Ilumea, but marched upon the Borders of it, and bought their Provisions of the Idumeans. See Mr. Le Clerc upon Deut. 2. 9.

⁹ It is a wonder that our Author, contrary to several expres Passages in Scripture, should exclude the Amorites from the Number of the Seven Nations which God had ordered to be destroy'd, viz. Deut. 7. 1. and 20. 17. Nevertheless, it is true, that those whom he here speaks of were not in the Land of Promise properly so called, which contained all the Country between Jordan and the Mediterranean Sea; and consequently if King Sibon had granted the Israelites a quiet Passage, they had not executed the Sentence which God had pronounced upon that part of the Amorites. See Mr. Le Clerc upon Gen. 10. 16. and Numb. 21. 22.

¹⁰ See Mr. Thomastius's Institut. Jurispr. Div. Lib. 2. c. 6. §. 16. in fine. Mr. Buddeus in his Elements, Phil. Praet. Part II. c. 4. §. 8. §. 3, &c. maintains, that supposing the War which that Prince, who desires a Passage through our Country, makes, is just and necessary; and on the other side we have no reason to fear any thing either from him that is to pass, or him against whom he marches, we are under an indispensable Obligation to allow him a Passage; and his Reason is, because the Law of Nature obliges every one to assist those who are unjustly oppress'd; and with much greater Reason ought we to be no hindrance to such as undertake their own Defence. See Lib. 2. c. 5. §. 6. Note 3. above.

MR. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on §. 6.

¹ Grotius seems to understand, either mediately or immediately. This appears from the Restraints that he puts upon the Traffick which he supposes to be allowed between the two Estates, of which the one engages to sell the other a certain sort of Wares which grow no where else; it being meant, as he adds, that the People who have obtained the Privilege of buying these Wares only, are ready to sell them again to others at reasonable Rates. For granting that we have Necessaries of Life sufficient to satisfy Nature, it matters not of whom we have them. So that our Author's Distinction might have been spared.

² Or the Troades, as we find them called in the Lacon. Apophthegm. of the same Author.

now by this Contract of Engrossment it is plain other Nations are thus far hinder'd from trading in the same Country. Yet it is easy to bring off Grotius, by saying, that in the former Passage by binding he understands, not hindering them by virtue of some precedent Bargain or Covenant, but binding them by open Methods of Violence. Yet on the Whole it must be confess'd, that he has not brought the present Question to a full and clear Decision. For truly speaking, the Law of Humanity does not seem to oblige us to grant Passage to any other Goods, except such as are absolutely necessary for the Support of their Life to whom they are thus convey'd. But as for those who import such Commodities as improve and encourage Luxury, or from which those who deal in them do not seek any Supply of real Wants, but rather an excessive Gain, and an Indulgence to covetous Desires, I do not see what Right they have to demand Passage thro' our Coasts for this kind of Traffick, or on what Pretensions they can claim such a Privilege as their Due. I confess, there scarce appears any probable Colour on which we should deny unarmed Vessels the Liberty of an open Sea, which we are Masters of, whilst they are bound to a third People, with whom we are at Peace. And to this Point, chiefly relate all those Authorities and Testimonies of Authors usually produced in the main Dispute. But thus much we may reasonably do, we may stop the Vessel in such a Case, and force them to leave their Cargo in our Territories, that we may have the Benefit of the first Purchase. For besides that the frequent Passage of Strangers may some time create Danger, or at least may give Suspicions to our State, what should hinder us from deriving that Profit on our own People, which would otherwise be made by Foreigners? since in Matters of Favour we ought constantly to prefer the former to the latter. And tho' in Strictness it be indeed no Damage to us, if we permit the free Transportation of these Commodities, and tho' the third Party who receives them, does not properly injure us by making a Gain, which 'twas in our Power to have secured before him; yet since he has no Right of excluding us from such a Gain, why ought we not to love ourselves best, and to be before-hand with him in the Advantage? Which we shall be, if whilst we lie thus in the midst between two People, we take care not to let such Goods pass from one to the other, without going first thro' our own Hands². And unless this be admitted for fair and equitable Dealing, I see not on what Grounds we can defend those Staples, and other Rights which we find in some Countries, by virtue of which Foreign Commodities are stopp'd, and carried to the publick Place of Sale; and Strangers are permitted to traffick, not immediately betwixt themselves, but at second-hand with the natural Subjects.

VII. From what has been said, there may well arise this farther Question, Whether the Law of Humanity will permit us to require Toll, or Custom for Goods transported thro' any Land, River, or narrow Sea, subject to our Dominion? For at first Sight it seems inhuman, not to grant such a Privilege without Price, which the Law before-mention'd allows freely to all Mankind

Now why Custom should be imposed on Goods carried over Land, there is this manifest Reason, because such heavy Conveyance sometimes trespasses on the Fields adjoining to the common Roads; and because the Sovereign of the Country is put to charge, both in repairing the Ways, and in securing the Passengers¹. And farther, if it be necessary to erect Bridges for this Purpose, it is plain in Equity that the Sovereign may set up a Toll to reimburse himself for those Expences; and at the same time, he who does require such Toll, is oblig'd not only to let the Bridges stand, but likewise to keep them in constant Repair. Grotius on the 1 Kings x. 19. observes, that a great Toll was paid to Solomon for the Horses brought thro' Judea from Egypt, to the Syrians, or to the Hittites; and thus too no Frankincense was transported without Custom. The like Impositions are reasonable in those Places, where by the Industry of the Natives, the Roads are render'd more short or more easy; as by the filling up of Pits and Ditches, or by other useful Labours, for the Convenience of Passengers and of Goods. Thus of old, had any one cut thro' the Isthmus, and join'd the Ionian and Egean Seas, he might fairly have required some moderate Toll of the Merchants and Sailors; which they would

² As the Duties of Humanity are reciprocal, and he that has received a Benefit ought to make some Acknowledgment of it, Strangers have no just Reason to complain that they are obliged to put their Goods to Sale in the Country, provided they'll buy them at a reasonable Price, because by that means they will get by them, tho' perhaps not so much as they would have done, if they had carried their Merchandizes farther. But if the Merchandizes or Wares be such as we are well stored with, or trade with ourselves, we may positively refuse them coming in; because 'tis evident, that so much Profit as these Traders make in passing thro' our Country, 'tis so much Loss to ourselves. But if in refusing a Passage, we deprive the Strangers that demand it of that Profit they might make, without any Advantage to ourselves, 'tis inhuman to envy others the Benefit which we can't obtain ourselves; and so much the more, if the other People to whom they would carry these Merchandizes, can't have them any where else, but at an exorbitant Price. See Mr. Buddeus, as above, §. 4. 5. Mr. Hertius in his Note upon this Place of our Author agrees, that nothing hinders but the Right of Staple may take place among Citizens of the same State, either with relation to Strangers, who come to sell their Merchandizes and Wares in their Country, i. e. they may not allow them to set them to Sale but in a certain Place; but he does not see why such Persons as bring Foreign Commodities, whether of their own Growth or Manufacture, to carry them into a third Country, should be obliged to put them to Sale; especially if the People thro' whose Country they are carried, have no great need of them. For my part, there seems to me to be no Injustice in it, provided we are willing to furnish these Strangers with such Things as they are seeking elsewhere, when they have passed our Country, whether of our own Growth or Manufacture, at a reasonable Rate. For why should they go far for what they may have near at hand? And why should they not accommodate themselves among us, who are nearer than others? So long as they may make a tolerable Gain, tho' not so great as if they were suffered to go farther. So that in this Case it is at our Liberty either to allow Passage, or not, for Foreign Commodities; all that we are to beware of is, that in denying we do not prejudice the Commerce of the Inhabitants of our own Country, or bring some other Inconvenience on them; but this is a matter of Prudence only.

MR. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on §. VII.

not have been unwilling to give, the Voyage being now perform'd with more Expedition and more Security. And tho' this Project was never set on foot, Strabo informs us, "That the Merchants of Asia and Italy, rather than pass out of one of these Seas into the other, by the tedious and dangerous Coast of Malea, were extremely well satisfied to put in at Corinth, and so carry their Effects over Land; notwithstanding the Duties to be paid there for all imported or exported Goods." Another Reason which some bring to assert the Equity of Impositions on Land-Carriage, is this, that by so perpetual Confluence of Strangers the Price of Provisions is exceedingly rais'd. To which we may add in Conclusion, that a Sovereign, on this account, requires some Acknowledgment from the Goods of Foreigners, because he suffers them by passing thro' his Territories, to receive such Goods immediately from a third People; whereas should he erect a Staple, the Gain and Benefit would be fairly intercepted by his own Subjects.

As to the River Tolls, this amongst other Arguments may be offer'd to justify them, that since the Water by continually preying on the adjoining Lands, and sometimes by overflowing them, is the Cause of no inconsiderable Damage, for the prevention of which it is often necessary to secure them with Banks and other Works of great Charge and Labour; it seems by no means unreasonable, that towards the making up of these Losses, some moderate Consideration should be allowed by those who gain Advantage by the River, without being concern'd in its ordinary Mischiefs. It is true in the Capitularies of Charles the Great^a, one Order forbids to take Toll in those Rivers, Ubi nullum adiutorium præstatur itinerantibus, Where no Assistance is given to the Passengers^b; but this Constitution seems to have been made in favour of the natural Subjects, and there is no Necessity of extending it to Foreigners^c.

It is a more difficult Point, to state the Equity of Tolls demanded in Seas. This indeed is beyond dispute, that the Sovereign of a Sea may impose Duties answerable to the Charge which he bestows about it; as for the setting up of Marks near Rocks and Quick sands, for the keeping of Fires to direct Vessels in the Night, or for scowring the Coasts of Pirates. But whatever is demanded farther than upon these Accounts, will not admit of so good Defence; inasmuch as the Passage of unarmed Ships is plainly one of those harmless Benefits which Humanity lays in common. Yet where such Pretensions are made, the Pleas which support them do not seem altogether absurd; as that no one ought to be blamed for making the best of his Dominions, or for raising such Profits from his Waters as others do from their Land. That, since he who enters the Territories of another, is for that time his Subject, we may compel the Ships of Foreigners, whilst they pass thro' our Sea, to let our Subjects have the first Purchase of their Goods; and that if we give up this Claim, we may require some reasonable Consideration in lieu of it. That altho' we cannot perhaps set up a Staple in such a Sea, because the third Nation whither those Ships are bound, may not have the Use of Sailing, and therefore cannot fetch the Goods from us, neither have we, it may be, the Liberty of carrying them thither; yet it ought not to be thought hard, if we put in for some little share in the Gain; since we permit Strangers to sail thro' our Water, with so much Expedition and Convenience. But upon the whole, it must be confess'd, that since this Toll by Sea is, for I know not what Reason, accounted more odious than what is demanded by Land, it ought to be exercised with great Prudence and Moderation, and without the least Appearance of Extortion or Avarice. And after all there may, 'tis very likely^d, be a Sovereign or two, who shall claim an Exemption from the common Duty, and build his Pretensions on good Reason; as that his Dominions bordering on the same Sea^e, inclose it so at both Ends, as to give him a fair Title to its Use; or that on such a Use of it, his Commerce with Foreign Nations, and consequently the Good and Safety of his own People almost entirely^f depends. For in these Cases it would be unreasonable, that to obtain the Liberty of a harmless Passage by Sea, he should be reduc'd to a kind of^g tributary Condition; nor will any ² Either in taking care that the Commodities be not endamaged, or for the Safety of their Persons.

⁵ Suppose that the People be so poor, that a moderate Tax laid upon their Goods and Merchandizes which they transport, would disable them from trading, and providing themselves the Necessaries of Life. In this Case the Master of the Streight will be obliged to suffer the Vessels of that People to pass without exacting any Customs of them. But yet he may take them of Foreign Merchants for their Passage; because, tho' it seems to be lessening their Profits, yet they know how to indemnify themselves in selling their Merchandizes, without which their Fellow Citizens, to whom they sell them, must either want some of the Necessaries of Life, or buy them at an exorbitant Price. And tho' perhaps, if the Master of the Streight should altogether refuse them a Passage, they would be in great Want of several Things, yet it does not follow, that they must therefore be exempted from such Customs, because that open Passage procures a flourishing Trade, and a great Abundance of all Things they have need of, and much more.

⁶ That Prince is no more tributary to the Master of a Streight for paying a Custom, than a Traveller in a strange Country, paying the Toll of a Bridge or River is tributary to the Lord of the Country who receives it. It is not (as an English Author, viz. Mr. Molesworth in his Memoirs affirms) a servile Acknowledgment of the Sovereignty of that Prince over the Seas, of which the Streight is a Key. We may as well say, that by paying the Toll over a Bridge or River, which are on the Border of a Prince's Country, we attribute to him the Sovereignty over all the Country.

one be much inclin'd to censure him, if upon so odious a Provocation he endeavour by any possible Means to free himself from such Exaction and Oppression. Nor will it render his Resentments less justifiable, to alledge on the other side, that other Nations have agreed to pay the Imposition: because their Support and Safety is not so immediately concern'd in the use of such a Sea, and therefore they may afford to allow the Sovereign of the Sea a share in their Gains, without grudging or repining. As the Case is very different ⁷, whether a Man desires Way through my Grounds, because without this Privilege, he would be as it were excluded from the World, and confined to Solitude, or because he could not otherwise carry off the Fruit of his own Land; and whether he makes the same Demand, purely to shorten his Passage, and imposes a Burthen on my Estate, not to relieve his own Necessity, but to promote his Convenience and Ease.

They tell us, that the King of Abyssinia, or Ethiopia, pretended of old to a certain Tribute from Egypt; upon account that the River Nile, to which that Country owes its Fruitfulness, took its Rise in his Dominions; and that afterwards when the Turks had seiz'd on Egypt, and used great Severities towards the Christians, the Abyssinian Prince made an Attempt to have turn'd the Channel of the Nile into the Red Sea, but without Effect. These Pretensions and these Proceedings, which bear some Relation to the Case before us, we cannot but look upon as unjust ⁸.

Some would determine this whole Business by the means of Compact and Covenant, which Method we think not to be altogether accurate and decisive. For it remains still in Question, what was the original Reason of these Covenants; and whether the Master of the Sea may deny Passage to others, until such time as they shall enter into the same Articles of Agreement. Though indeed when such a Covenant has once pass'd without any natural Flaw or Weakness, which might render it invalid, both Parts are obliged strictly to observe it; so that the People who use the Passage desired, ought on no account to deny the settled Imposition, and the Master of the Sea shall not raise the Duty higher than what has been thus establish'd by joint Consent ⁹. Nicephorus Gregoras ^b reports, that the Caliph of Egypt obtain'd by Covenant of the Emperor of Constantinople, Licence for the Merchants of his Country to pass through the Thracian Bosphorus. Which Privilege was therefore so easily granted at first, because it seem'd a Matter of little Importance. But when in course of time it appear'd to be a Point of very considerable Consequence, it was found impossible to revoke the Grant, after it had been by long Custom enforced and establish'd ².

⁹ What does this prove?

¹⁰ But our Author elsewhere acknowledges, viz. Lib. 4. c. 5. §. 8. that whoever has settled himself first upon one of the Coasts of the Streight, and has taken possession of the whole Streight, he that comes afterward to inhabit on the other side is Master only of his own Ports and Shore. So that in this Case the first Occupant has a Right to require Customs of the Vessels of the other, as if he had both sides of the Streight, unless he be dispensed with by any Agreement.

But in Case the opposite Shore is possess'd by another People, so that the Sea is either held in common by both, or else as a middle Point divides the Confines of the two Dominions, though here perhaps one of the States only may by Compact or Concession require Toll of Passengers, yet the Subjects of the other State shall by no means stand liable to the same Imposition, since they sail in their own Water ¹⁰.

VIII. Under the same Head of common and innocent Privileges Grotius ^c likewise reckons the liberty of Sailors, to touch and to rest a little on any Shore, for the sake of Health, or of fresh Water, or on any other just Account. Thus the Trojans complain in Virgil ^d:

Quod genus hoc hominum? quæve hunc tam barbara morem

Permittit patria? hospitio probibemur arcæ,
Bella cicut, primâq; velant consistere terrâ.

Si genus humanam & mortalia temnitis arma,
At sperate Deos memores fandi atque nefandi.

What Men, what Monsters, what inhuman Race;
What Laws, what barbarous Customs of the Place,
Shut up a desert Shore to drowning Men,
And drive us to the cruel Seas again?

If our hard Fortune no Compassion draws,
Nor hospitable Rights, nor human Laws;
The Gods are just, and will revenge our Cause.

Mr. Dryden.

But 'tis observable that they profess'd before,

Non nos aut ferro Libycos populare Penates
Venimus, aut raptas ad littora vertere prædas;
Non ea vis animo, &c.

We come not with design of wasteful Prey,
To drive the Country, force the Swains away:
Nor such our Strength, nor such is our Desire.

Mr. Dryden.

Whence we are taught that the Party who desires this Favour, ought to appear on such Coasts with most innocent Intention, so as neither to create any Danger to the Inhabitants, nor any probable Grounds of Fear. And therefore Dido's Answer to this Speech is exceedingly wise and proper:

Res dura, & regni novitas, me talia cogunt
Moliri, & late fines custode tueri:

—————My cruel Fate,
And Doubts attending an unsettled State,
Force me to guard my Coasts.—————

Mr. Dryden.

For before we grant any thing of this kind, we ought to be well assured whether the Persons approaching come as Friends, or as Enemies, what Appearance the Fleet makes, what Force and Figure the Men bear who are to land; and farther, whether they are free from all contagious Distempers^a. When there arises no Obstacle on either of these Accounts, as it would be then most barbarous Inhumanity, to deny the Liberty of harmless Access to Shore, so that Favour being once granted, calls for one more, altogether as reasonable, the Privilege of erecting little momentary Huts for present Shelter, which is neither any prejudice to the Shore, nor any Abridgment of our Right and Property. Indeed Reason forbids that any one should raise a lasting Structure or Edifice on the Strand, without express Allowance from the Sovereign^b, especially if it could not be done but by endamaging others^b.

Altho' some Nations have by formed Compact settled the Point of Access to Shores and Ports², yet this does not hinder the like Kindness from being due by natural Right; since many Duties arising from those Virtues which impose only an imperfect Obligation, are frequently strengthen'd and confirm'd by civil Covenants and Laws³. Besides, our present Assertion regards chiefly this extraordinary Case, when Persons contrary to their Intentions, are driven by some Violence on a foreign Coast; whereas these Covenants which sometimes pass betwixt Nations, usually have for their Subject the Point of constant and continual Access on common Occasions. Therefore for this latter Indulgence, it is on no account absurd to require some moderate Consideration. But in the former Case it would be extremely base and fordid, to charge as a Debt so small a Relief of Persons in Distress, and as it were to set a Price upon our Charity.

IX. Another Duty of Humanity is the Admission of Strangers, and the kind Reception and Entertainment of Travellers. Some of the Antients carried this Point to the height of Ambition and Ostentation, conceiving the Right of Hospitality to found the strictest Relation, and the most sacred Friendship^c. But to give a natural Right to these Favours, it is requisite that the Stranger be absent from his own House on an honest, or on a necessary Account; as also that we have no Objection against his Integrity, or Character, which might render our Admission of him, either dangerous or disgraceful; and farther, that he cannot at present hire Lodgings for his Money. And therefore in antient Times, when publick Inns either were not in use, or else accounted scandalous, and unworthy to receive a good and virtuous Guest, the Necessity of this Duty was greater and more strictly binding, than it is now in most parts of Europe; where we meet with so many of these Houses exactly fitted and furnish'd, not only for all Use and Convenience, but even for Ornament and Splendor.

Now although Inhospitality be commonly, and for the most part justly censured, as the true Mark of a savage and inhuman Temper, yet the Point will now and then bear a dispute, especially as to the Case of those who wander into foreign Countries purely on account of Curiosity; whether or no such Persons may claim free Admission by any natural Right^d. The Spartans to justify themselves in driving all Strangers from their Coasts, thought this one Reason sufficient, Lest the Converse of Strangers should introduce a Corruption, or a Contempt of their receiv'd Manners and Customs^d. In answer to which it is well urged by some, that what we practise at home is not always the best, nor what others do abroad the worst; if then a foreign Custom be really better, it is absurd to despise, and to reject it on the Score of its being foreign. That this is the Temper and Property of Curs to fawn on domestick Slaves, and to bark at the most noble and excellent of Strangers. That those Men usually contract a Roughness and Clownishness of Behaviour, who never breathe out of their native Air, and see no more of the World than what passes under their Nose^e. As to the Que-

² Sometimes, on the contrary, as our Author observes a little below, one People agree with another that they will not come into the Ports, nor on the Coasts one of another, as appears from two Treaties made long ago between the Romans and Carthaginians. That the Romans and their Allies shall not sail beyond the fair Promontory, unless they are driven farther by a Tempest, or by the Pursuit of their Enemies; and if thro' these Means they passed their Bounds, they should buy nothing, nor meddle with any thing but what was either necessary for Sacrifice, or to repair their Vessels, and set sail again to return within five Days. Polyb. l. 3. This was their first Treaty. The second was, that no Roman should trade into Sardinia or Africk; that they should not build any City there, nor land, unless to get Provisions, or repair their Vessels; and if they were driven ashore by a Tempest, they should depart within five Days. Ibid.

Of all kinds of Friendships that seems to be the firmest which is express'd in the courteous Entertainment of Strangers; because the Persons here havin' not the same Ends and Interests to propose, cannot so easily fall into Contention, as those who are Members of the same State. Homer says, the Poor and Stranger are the Care of Jove; and again, the suppliant Stranger craves a Brother's Love. In Lucian (de Dea Syria) amongst the Crimes which brought Deucalion's Flood upon the World, we find these which follow. They practis'd all kinds of Injustice; for they neither kept their Oaths, nor receiv'd Strangers, nor gave a patient Hearing to the Request of the Miserable. The Decree of the Achaëans, by which they forbid the Macedonians to enter their Territories, is call'd, exsecrabilis velut desertio Juris Humani, as it were a detestable Desertion of the Law of human Nature. 'Tis a Saying of Periander in Plutarch (Sympos.) I commend those States and those Magistrates which first give Audience to Strangers, and then to their own Subjects.

tion before us then, thus much is certain, that if our People are kindly receiv'd by any Nation abroad, we ought to entertain the Men of that Nation with an equal return of Civility. As on the other hand, those who drive us from their Coasts, cannot without the most stupid Impudence petition us for a more courteous Treatment. But supposing that any one Nation, contented with what it finds at home, utterly refrains from all foreign Travel, it does not appear what Obligation such a State can have to admit those who would visit it, without a necessary or weighty Cause. The Case is somewhat like that of a private Man, who in his House or Gardens, possesses some rare Curiosity, or other valuable Sight; such an one does not apprehend himself tied freely to let in all Spectators; but whoever is thus gratified either rewards, or at least acknowledges, it as an extraordinary Favour. And this seems the more reasonable, because the Grounds of prudent Caution and Suspicion are so numerous, that we may easily make use of one or other of them, to justify us in keeping such Persons at a distance, as would too curiously examine and pry into our Affairs.

Therefore the Spanish Casuist^a has not made many Converts by the Reasons he lays down to justify his Countrymen in their Proceedings against the Indians. The first Right on which he founds their Title, is that of natural Society and Communication, which he draws up into this Assertion, The Spaniards had a Right of travelling and of living in those Countries, provided they did the Natives no harm, and from this Privilege none could restrain them. In reply to which it is well urged, that this natural Communication does not hinder a just Proprietor from communicating his Goods by such Methods, and upon such Considerations as he finds necessary. And farther, that it seems very gross and absurd, to allow others an indefinite or unlimited Right of travelling and living amongst us, without reflecting either on their Number, or on the Design of their coming; whether supposing them to pass harmlessly, they intend only to take a short view of our Country, or whether they claim a Right of fixing themselves with us for ever. And that he who will stretch the Duty of Hospitality to this extravagant Extent, ought to be rejected as a most unreasonable, and most improper Judge of the Case. The second Principle he lays down is, That it was lawful for the Spaniards to traffick with those People, and the Sovereigns on either side could not hinder their Subjects from such Intercourse. But here Men of more sober and moderate Judgments confess themselves unable to find out any such Liberty of trading, as Princes may not abridge their Subjects of, for the good of the Commonwealth; much less such as shall force and obtrude Strangers upon us, whether we will or no. His third Reason is this, If the Indians had amongst them any Rights and Privileges allow'd in common to Natives and Fo- reigners, in these they ought not to hinder the Spaniards from their Share: For Example, If other Strangers were permitted to dig Gold, the Spaniards might fairly claim the same Liberty.

On which Point some have judged it worth considering, first, whether those Privileges were granted to others, by way of Debt, or by way of free Gift and Favour. For of those things which Men cannot claim from me as strictly their Due, I may be more liberal to one than to another. And in the next place, whether these new Comers will behave themselves with the same Justice and Modesty as the former, who made use of our Goods without our Prejudice or Inconvenience; and whether these late Guests propose no other End of their Visit. Suppose I give one or two of my Neighbours leave to come into my Garden, as often as they please, and to gratify themselves with tasting my Fruit; it may be, there breaks in afterwards a rude Hector, who is for tearing up my Trees, and would kick me out, to plant his own Body in my proper Land; my Case is bad if I may not be allow'd to shut the Gate against such an intruding Villain^b. But let others settle this Controversy. As to our main Question, it is look'd on by most as the safest way of resolving it, to say, That it is left in the power of all States, to take such Measures about the Admission of Strangers, as they think convenient; those being ever excepted, who are driven on the Coasts by Necessity, or by any Cause that deserves Pity and Compassion. Not but that it is barbarous to treat in the same cruel manner, those who visit us as Friends, and those who assault us as Enemies^c; The free Admission of Ambassadors is deduced from another Head^d.

But having once admitted Strangers and foreign Guests, to turn them out again, unless by good Reason, is usually censured as some Degree at least of Inhumanity^e. From the number of these good Reasons, St. Ambrose and with him Grotius^f excludes the Case of grievous Scarcity and Dearth afflicting a People. To whose Judgment we subscribe with this Supposition, That there are still Means left, though perhaps very hard and pressing, to save both Natives and Strangers, and if the latter have been formerly, or may be hereafter useful and serviceable to us, and of such only St. Ambrose speaks. But in case we are not obliged to the Foreigners amongst us, and there be no Necessity of their perishing, should we send them off, there seems to be no Reason why the Subject on their Account should be content to struggle with a Famine^g.

X. In the same Class of Duties Grotius^h places the allowing of a perpetual Habitation to Strangers, who being driven by Violence out of their own Country, are forced to seek out a new Seat; provided still, that they submit to the establish'd Government, and behave themselves with such Prudence and Decency, as to administer no Occasion to Factions and Seditiousⁱ.

Humanity,

So among the Articles of Peace proposed by Aeneas in Virgil, Æn. xii. 192. we find this for one:

Humanity, it is true, engages us to receive a small number of Men expell'd their Home, not for their own Demerit and Crime; especially if they are eminent for Wealth or Industry, and not likely to disturb our Religion, or our Constitution. And thus we see many States have risen to a great and flourishing Height, chiefly by granting Licence to Foreigners to come and settle amongst them; whereas others have been reduced to a low Condition, by refusing this Method of Improvement.

But no one will be fond of asserting, that we ought in the same manner to receive and incorporate a great Multitude, especially if now in Arms, or naturally addicted to War; since it is scarce possible, but that their Admission should highly endanger the Natives. Therefore every State may be more free or more cautious in granting these Indulgences, as it shall judge proper for its Interest and Safety. In order to which Judgment, it will be prudent to consider, whether a great increase in the Number of Inhabitants will turn to Advantage; whether the Country be fertile enough to feed so many Mouths; whether upon Admission of this new Body, we shall be straitned for room; whether the Men are industrious, or idle; whether they may be so conveniently placed and disposed, as to render them incapable of giving any Jealousy to the Government. If on the whole, it appears that the Persons deserve our Favour and Pity, and that no Restraint lies on us from good Reasons of State, it will be an Act of Humanity to confer such a Benefit on them, as we shall neither feel very Burthensome at present, nor are likely to repent of hereafter. If the Case be otherwise, we ought so to temper our Pity with Prudence, as not to put ourselves in the ready way of becoming Objects of Pity unto others. Farther, since whatever we bestow on such Petitioners, we may justly reckon as a Matter of free Bounty in us, hence it follows, that they are not presently to lay hands on what they please, nor to fix themselves as it were by some Right, in any Spot of Waste-ground they find among us; but that they ought to rest satisfied with the Station and Privileges we assign them^a.

XI. The next Office of Humanity mention'd by Grotius, is that we allow every Man the Privilege of procuring for himself, by Money, Work, exchange of Goods, or any other lawful Contract, such things as contribute to the convenience of Life, and that we do not abridge him of this Liberty, ei-

^a See Parthasiana, Tome 1. p. 265, &c. and a Discourse De conscribendo Milite, §. 18. among the Select Discourses, Jur. Nat. & Gen. of Mr. Buddeus.

^a What hath been said may be illustrated by these historical Examples. Latinus, in Virgil Æn. 11. ver. 316. offers the Trojans this Condition:

*Est antiquus ager Tusco mihi proximus amni,
Aurunci Rutulique ferunt, & vomere duros
Exercent colles, atque horum asperima pascunt.
Hæc omnis regio & celsi plaga pinea montis
Cedat amicitie Teucrorum, & fœderis æquas
Dicamus leges; sociisque in regna vocemus.*

A Tract of Lands the Latines have possess'd,
Along the Tiber, stretching to the West,
Which now Rutulians and Auruncans till,
And their mix'd Cattle graze the fruitful Hill;
Those Mountains fill'd with Firs, that lower Land,
If you consent the Trojans shall command,
Call'd into part of what is ours; and there
On Terms agreed the common Country share.

Mr. Dryden:

Servius on this Passage observes, from Cato's Origines, that the Land here mention'd contain'd 100 Acres. He tells us likewise, for fear we should think that the King was liberal of what did not belong to him, that to those Words Aurunci Rutulique ferunt, we must join mibi in the preceding Verse; the Auruncans and Rutulians having that Country allow'd them in a way of free Stipend, or else being placed there by the King as his Husbandmen, to manage the Crown Lands. The Story is told more at large by Dionys. Halicarnass. L. 1.

The Cimbrians in Florus (l. 3. c. 3.) petition the Roman Senate, that so brave and warlike a People would give them a little Portion of Land as a kind of Pay, promising in return, that their Hands and their Weapons should be ever employ'd in the Cause of Rome. But (as the Historian there reflects) what Land could the Romans give them without quarrelling amongst themselves, on the Point of such arbitrary Distributions? And how could the Senate without manifest Injustice dispose of the Property of private Men? Besides, possessing so many things as were likely to raise the Appetite of needy Strangers, they judg'd it unsafe to admit so strong and so fierce a Nation into their Limits.

In Cæsar (de B. G. l. 4.) the Tencteri and Usipetes petition'd in this boasting manner: That they did not voluntarily leave their own Country to seek a foreign Seat; that if the Romans would accept of their Service, they were able to shew themselves no unprofitable Friends; only they desire some Lands to be assign'd them, or to have the Privilege of keeping what they had already gotten by their Arms. The Answer which Cæsar sent them was to this purpose; That 'twas unreasonable in those Men to invade another Country, who could not defend their own. That there were no vacant Lands in Gallia; especially not to hold so vast a Multitude, without Prejudice or Danger. Though indeed he had still another more secret Reason, why he would not have those new Neighbours.

In Tacitus (A. xiii. c. 55.) the Antibarii being at a Loss for a Dwelling, having therefore seated themselves in some Lands beyond the Rhine, belonging to the Romans; excus'd themselves, not altogether unreasonably, in these Words: That the main part of the Land was useless; being only employ'd now and then by Chance in feeding Beasts for the Army. That the Romans ought to resign a Place which was fill'd only with Beasts, when they might relieve the Distress of Men; and prefer Friends and Subjects to Deserts and Solitudes. That as Heaven was possess'd by the Gods, so the Earth was given to Mankind; and what Parts were void of Inhabitants, lay in common to all the World. (Which Principle Sir Thomas Moore establisheth amongst his Utopians, l. 2.) This Message deserv'd a more favourable Answer than those most haughty Words of Avitus, That they ought to submit to the Pleasure of their Betters. That the Gods, whose Assistance they now implore, had chosen the Romans to be Commanders of the World, and to dispose of it as they should think convenient, without suffering any other Judges but themselves.

The Emperor Probus settled an hundred Thousand of Bastarnæ in the Roman Territories; who all proved fruitful and quiet. But he using the same liberty of Transplanting vast Numbers from other Nations, as from the Ge-

* These Tyrants were such as revolted from the Emperor then reigning, and caused themselves to be proclaimed Emperors by the Soldiers. See Salmasius upon the Thirty Tyrants of Trebellius Pollio.

So likewise in Ammianus Marcellinus, the Goths deserting their Seat for fear of the Huns, begg'd leave of Valens to fix themselves in Thrace, promising to live quietly, and to lend him their Service when he should have occasion. Soon after other barbarous People put up the same Request, to whom Valens granted the like Favour, hoping that from these Numbers he might draw Men for his Troops, without any great Charge. Yet this Indulgence proved afterwards his Ruin; as the Historian demonstrates at large. Add. Socrat. Hist. Eccles. l. 4. c. 28.

ther by any civil Ordinance, or by any unlawful Combination, or Monopoly. For that as Trade and Commerce highly promote the Interest of all Nations, by supplying the unkindness of the Soil, which is not every where alike fertile, and by making those Fruits seem to be born in all Places of the World, which are to be found in any one^a: So it cannot be less than Inhumanity to deny any Son of the Earth the use of those good Things, which our common Mother affords for our Support; provided our peculiar Right and Propriety be not injured by such a Favour. And therefore the Megarensians (in Plutarch) when the Athenians had forbidden them entrance to all their Ports and Mart-Towns, complain'd that this was done παρά τὴ νόμῳ Διῶνα, contrary to the Law of Nations.

But this Assertion will admit of many Restrictions. For we do not seem in Duty obliged to communicate to others such Goods, as belong not to the Necessities, but to the Pleasure and the Superfluity of Life. And then, if Scarcity lies upon us, we may justly keep what we have to our selves. Could Joseph have discover'd that the Corn of Egypt was not sufficient to support the Natives, under the seven Years Famine, he might with good Reason have forbid the Exportation of it to Foreigners^b. So the Athenians once decreed it to be capital for any Subject of that State, to carry Corn for Sale any where but to Athens^c. Besides, we may fairly exclude others from trafficking with us for things not absolutely needful for the Support of Life, when by such a Permission our own Country would lose a considerable Advantage, or sustain (though by indirect Consequence) some notable Evil. For Example, one Kingdom, suppose, produces admirable Horses; what should hinder the Government there from passing an Act to prohibit the carrying into foreign Parts, any that are fit for breed? For should the fine Strain grow common, the Country would lose its greatest Profit, and its greatest Ornament. And this beautiful Race is affected abroad, not for necessary Use, but for Pomp and Pride, for Elegance and Ease^d. In one of the old Roman Constitutions it is made capital to carry Wine, Oil, or Arms to the barbarous Nations. They thought the Prohibition about the Wine and Oil no less necessary, than the other about the Weapons, fearing lest the Barbarians by tasting such generous Productions of the Empire, should endeavour to make themselves Masters of so rich a Soil. And we find in Livy^e, that when Aruns of Clusium invited the Gauls into Italy, he made them a Present of Italian Wines, as the Encouragement and the Reward of their Expedition^f.

Lastly, there lies no Restraint on a State, why, in reference to the Exportation of Goods, it should not favour its own Subjects more than Strangers; as by demanding less Custom of the former, than of the latter, or by giving them the Right of first Purchase.

XII. Though, as has been shewn, we are oblig'd in many Cases to sell, yet as Grotius^g observes, no Law ties us to a necessity of buying. In as much as every Man is naturally free to accept, or to refuse what Purchase he pleases; and no one has just Reason to complain, because another is content to want somewhat which he could supply him with. And therefore we find it forbidden in many Places, as well antient as modern, to import some particular Commodities: either lest any Damage should by this Means arise to the State; or to excite the Industry of our own Subjects; or to hinder our Money from passing into foreign Hands.

Therefore the Spanish Casuist, lately mention'd, is widely mistaken, when he asserts, that by the Law of Nations, every one has a Right of trading into foreign Parts, of importing what the People there want, and of exporting Gold, Silver, and other Goods in which they abound. For supposing I declare myself well satisfied with what I possess of my own, with what Face can another force his Things upon me, whether I will, or no?

When the contrary is enacted, for Example, when in some Places, every Householder is obliged to buy yearly such a Quantity of Salt, this arises from the Power of Princes over their Subjects, and that Necessity of buying is a kind of Tax or Tribute. Thus too a Ruler may enjoin his People, that if they want such a particular Commodity, they shall buy it only of such a Person. Which kind of Laws are very just, when they promote the Interest of the Commonwealth. In the same manner we find it often commanded by Authority, that the Subject do immediately buy up Corn and other Necessaries, even in remote Parts, when there is danger of a Scarcity (especially upon Apprehension of a Siege) or to bring down Provisions to a more reasonable Price amongst us. But that I should go about to compel a Man, over whom I have no Power, to the purchase of my Commodities, this is what no Reason will justify, or excuse^h. For upon what Pretence can I assume such Authority over the Purse of another, who is not my Subject, as to prescribe the Matter, and the Measure of his Expences, and to teach him how he should provide for his Necessities, or for his Pleasures? And though my Gain be in the mean time hinder'd, or lessen'd, yet this Consideration can by no means abridge the other Party of his natural Liberty. Or, if I would have him thus contribute to my Advantage, I ought to encourage him by mutual good Offices, and render myself worthy of the Favour. But if a Man being

^b Liban. Orat. 3. God hath not enriched every Place with all his Blessings; but hath divided his Gifts according to the difference of Countries, that he might incline Men to Society, by the want of mutual Assistance; and he discover'd to Men the way of Trading, that what was the Product of any particular Soil, might by this Means be enjoy'd in common by the whole World.

^c Quintil. Declam. 12. Whilst we were selling to the neighbouring Nations, and urged on by the hopes of ready Gain, we neglected a due Regard to the publick Safety; and having emptied our Stores abroad, brought a Famine upon our selves at home.

^d Lycurg. Orat. contra Leocrat. ^e In Livy (l. 43. c. 5.) Upon the Request of the Gallick Ambassadors, it was order'd, that they should have the liberty of buying Ten Horses, and of carrying them out of Italy. L. 5. c. 33. ^f Add. Numb. 13. 24. ^g Judith 10. 20. ^h L. 2. c. 2. §. 20. Plato de L. L. 8. Let no Man import Frankincense, nor other foreign Things used in Sacrifices, nor Purple, nor any Colours which are produced at home; nor in short, any Commodity, but such as is absolutely necessary; and on the other side, let no Man export what is of necessary use in our own Country. Casar de B. G. l. 2. reports of the Nervii, that they allow no Entrance to Merchants, suffer no Wine or any other Incitement to Luxury to be imported; imagining that the use of these Delicacies must needs weaken Mens Minds, and unbend the stiffness of their Courage. The same Author tells us of the Suevi, that if Beasts be brought from other Parts for their Assistance, they refuse to make use of them; and as for Wines they absolutely forbid the Importation of them, being of Opinion, that those Liquors soften and effeminate the Spirits of Men, and render them unfit for laborious Employments.

stock'd with such particular Commodities, offers to vend his Abundance, where-ever he can find Chapmen, it would, in this Case, be most inhuman, and unjust to hinder him from thus furnishing himself with other things, which he wants for the necessary Occasions of Life ^a.

XIII. Another Duty of the same Rank, is the giving Licence to Men of other Nations, especially if seated in our Neighbourhood, to solicit, and contract Matrimony with our Subjects, when they are at a Loss for Women amongst themselves ¹. As for Instance, if a People compos'd only of Men, either being expell'd their own Country, or upon some other necessary Account, are fix'd near us, and design to form a new State. For to live without the Assistance of the other Sex, is what the Frame and Temper of few Men can bear. Celibacy in a healthy Constitution is the Gift only of excellent Souls; and to seek other Satisfaction in this Case, than Nature advises or allows, would be foul and brutal. Besides, as Florus observes, Res tantum unius ætatis est populus virorum ², A State made up of one Sex, viz. Men, can last but one Age. Upon this Principle many are willing to defend, or at least to excuse, the famous Exploit of Romulus, the Rape of the Sabine Women. Authors indeed are divided about the Reason and the Manner of this Proceeding. Dionysius Halicarnassens reports, that the main design of Romulus was to obtain the Friendship, and Alliance of the neighbouring Nations, by joining with them in Marriage; and that, though he began this Project in an injurious Way, yet he imagin'd that in time this ill Beginning would produce a good Conclusion, and that a fair Correspondence and Familiarity would be establish'd, so soon as they should have clear'd themselves to the new Brides, by the Plea of Love, and to the Fathers and Relations by urging that the Stratagem was set on Foot, not out of Affront and Abuse, but as a necessary Relief to a desperate Condition. Yet it must be confess'd, this seems a very preposterous way of gaining Friendship. See Tacit. An. l. I. c. 55. What he reports of Segestes, that when Arminius had stolen his Daughter against his Consent, Gener in-visus, &c. The Names of Son-in-Law, and Father-in-Law, which when there is a mutual Consent of Parties used to be a Band of Love and Endearment, prove now the Seed of Hatred, and the Incitement to mortal Discord.

Others pretend, that Romulus by this Attempt only sought an Occasion of quarreling with his Neighbours, which seems very improbable. The common Defence of the Fact is to alledge the want of Women, and so to have Recourse to Necessity; but then Authors take care to tell us, that Commissioners were first sent about to treat with the People on the Affair, and to beg that they would not think it hard to let Men like themselves mix with them in Race and Blood; and that when these Agents were dismiss'd after a reproachful manner, it was then at last thought proper to gain Relief, by the joint Application of Cunning and of Force. And what makes the thing still carry a better Force, is, That this way of catching Wives was in those Times, not only a common, but a laudable Practice; Dionysius calls it, An Antient and a Grecian Custom, and the most renowned Method of obtaining Maids in Marriage. L. 2. c. 30. Add Judges XXI. 22. It is true, Violence can seldom be necessary in this Case, since it is never difficult to find Women enough, who shall be ready, of their own accords to accept of any Husbands that are not abominably vile and scandalous.

To reject those who seek our Alliance by such Proposals, would be very hard Dealing. And tho' the denying of a Woman for a Wife be not, in it self, a just Cause of commencing a War, yet is it, if the Refusal were accompanied with Reproach. As the Inhabitants of Rhegium, when Dionysius of Sicily sent to desire a Wife amongst them, returned in answer, That they would grant him none but the Daughter of their common Executioner. See Diodor. Sic. l. xiv. c. 108. & Strab. l. vi. a like Instance is to be met with in Paulus Venetus, l. I. c. 52. On the other hand, should a Prince, by Virtue of his sovereign Authority, compel the Women of his Country to accept of such Husbands as have nothing in them to deserve Affection, this would look like Inhumanity; especially in Case the Fortunes and Conditions of the Parties were unequal. The Speech of Canuleius in Livy, where in the Name of the Populacy ³, he intreats the Senate, that they would allow them the Privilege of Marriage, a Favour granted to Foreigners, and to Neighbour Nations; and that they would not exclude them from the Number of Mankind, does not belong to the Question before us, although produced as an Instance by Grotius. For the Plebeians did not then feel a Scarcity of Women, but the Aim and Design of this Petition was to raise themselves to an equal Pitch with the Nobility, by Means of marrying into Patrician Families. Otherwise, when Women are plenty, there is no occasion of winning a Bride by main Force of Arms: Invenies aliam, si te hæc fastidit. As for those civil Laws which forbid Marriage with Foreigners, or between Subjects of different Ranks, they always presuppose, that every one is able to find out a Match suitable to his Condition; and they are generally founded on such Reasons as these; that the Splendor of great Families may be preserv'd; that our Women may more easily get Husbands at home, whilst our Men are not allow'd to get Wives abroad; or that the ⁴ Riches and the Affections of our People, may not by the Means of Inter-Marriages be estrang'd from us, and settled on a foreign State.

³ Canuleius's Words are, Connubium petimus, quod finitimis, externisque dari solet. — ut hominum — numerosimus. Liv. Dec. 1. Lib. 4. c. 3.

⁴ This Clause in Mr. Hertius's Edition, with his Notes, is thus rendered, Ne opes aut effectus nostrorum in alias Civitates per Connubia transferantur; whereas other Editions have it, as it ought to be, affectus. This renders it credible, that 'tis not a Fault in the Impression, but as Hertius remarks, by way of Supplement, a thing contained in the Author's Expression. For fear (says he) a Citizen in respect to the Alliance and Riches of some powerful Stranger, should exalt himself above others, or on the contrary, for fear a powerful Stranger should make use of his Alliance to a Citizen to become a Master of the State. For so Aristotle observed, that Dionysius the younger, having married a Woman of Locris, found a way by means of that Alliance to possess himself of the Government of that Republick, Polit. l. 5. c. 7. But all this is not comprehended in the Word affectus, of which Mr. Pufendorf speaks.

XIV. Lastly, Grotius adds, that any Right common to all, and consequently an Obligation to a Duty to be perform'd towards all, arises from this Supposition, that we grant such an Indulgence promiscuously to every Stranger; because then, if any one be excluded from the Privilege, he is manifestly injur'd. For it is an Affront and Reproach to debar a Man, without particular Reason, from a common Advantage; this being to make him unequal and inferior to others. Hence Grotius concludes, that if it be in any Place permitted to Strangers, to hunt, to fish, to hawk, to gather Pearls, to receive Legacies, to sell Goods, to contract Marriages (even without being compell'd to it by scarcity of Women) no Nation can be deny'd the same Liberties, except they have forfeited them by their own Default. But this Assertion will scarce hold. For the Concessions here spoken of must be made either expressly, or tacitly. When we grant a Thing expressly to another, we do it either precariously, or in the manner of a Pact, or perfect Promise. Now that any one should give a perfect Right over a Thing of his (not due by the Law of Nature) to all Nations, known and unknown, without Limit or Restraint, is a Case which I believe never did, and never will happen. For every one is desirous to know at least, on whom he bestows his Benefit, and in what Measure. But when a Man either by Pact, or free Favour, has granted such a particular Privilege to all that come under his Friendship or Acquaintance, for a meer Stranger to pretend a Right to the same Indulgence, would be very impudent and very wicked. As for those Things which we permit tacitly, or as it were overlook, they are reckon'd of Course to be of the same Nature with precarious Favours; and such may be fairly revoked, either upon the Change of our Affairs and Circumstances, or because the Persons who enjoy'd them did not make so prudent and modest a Use of them, as they ought. Bæcler. ad Grot.

XV. What we have hitherto touch'd on, are but vulgar Degrees of Humanity, the Omission of which implies a most base and abject Temper of Mind. A much higher, and more illustrious Strain of the same Duty, is when a Man out of pure Benevolence and Inclination, arising either from a native Generousness of Soul, or from Pity and Compassion to a Person in distress, is at some Pains or Charge in bestowing freely on another, what may relieve his Necessity, or procure his Advantage. Kindnesses of this noble Rank are by way of Eminence stiled Benefits; the Manner and Measure of dispensing which are commonly to be adjust'd with regard to the Condition of the Given, and of the Receiver. And these are the Things which open to Mankind the largest Field of doing good, and of acquiring Glory, if they are temper'd and regulated by true Prudence and Greatness of Mind. For to throw about Favours without Reason and Judgment, ought, as *Pliny*¹ observes, to be call'd Ambition or Ostentation, or any thing rather than Liberality. Wise Men have made it their chief Business to prescribe Rules for the guiding and perfecting of these Obligations: And the antient Books of Morality are not on any Subject more copious; or more clear.² Tull. Off. l. c. 14. Beneficentia, qua nihil est naturæ humane accommodatius, multas habet cautiones, &c. The Duties of Liberality or Bounty, than which there is nothing more agreeable to the Nature of Man, fall under many Limitations³. For in the first place it should be our Care to see that our Bounty prove not a Prejudice, either to the Person we would oblige, or to any other Body; and then that we do not give above our own Ability, nor above the Merit of the Receiver. As to this last Point, we are principally to regard those, to whom we ourselves already stand obliged, and then others, as they have more or less need of our Assistance. We are likewise to consider the several Degrees, by which we stand related in the World. Of these the first and most extensive, is the universal Society of Mankind. Nearer than this is the Alliance between Persons of the same Nation, of the same Province; of the same Language, of the same City. There is yet a nearer Tye of Kindred. And here the first Society is in Wedlock, the next in Children; the Relation of Brothers comes afterwards, and then of Brothers and Sisters, Children and Men, the Matches and Alliances between different Families. But the most excellent and strongest of all Alliances is, when good and virtuous Men join in familiarity upon account of the Agreement of their Manners.

Idem de Finib. l. v. c. 23. In omni honesto, &c. In all the Compass of Honesty there is nothing so illustrious, or of so great a Latitude, as the Conjunction and Society of Men with Men, including a mutual Communication of Conveniences, and general Love for Mankind. This Dearness begins immediately upon one's Birth, when the Child is most affectionately beloved by the Parent; from the Family, it by degrees steals abroad into Affinities, Friendships, Neighbourhoods; then amongst Members of the same State, and amongst States themselves, united in Interests and Confederacies; and at length stretcheth itself to the whole Extent of human Race. In the Exercise of all these Duties, we are farther to observe what every Man hath most need of, and what with our Help he may, what without our Help he cannot attain; so that in some Cases the Tye of Relation must yield to the Point of Time; and some Offices there are which we would rather pay to one Relation than to another. Thus you ought sooner to help a Neighbour in with his Harvest, than either Brother, or a familiar Acquaintance; but on the other side, in a Suit at Law, you ought to defend your Brother, or your Friend, before your Neighbour. See Seneca's Treatise of Benefits, which it would be tedious here to abridge. Plutarch (in Sympof.) tells us 'twas a Rule amongst the Pythagoreans, not to take a Burthen from their

Lib. 5. c. 6.* with Gataker's Notes, and Pliny the younger, Lib. 9. c. 30. But above all, I must commend to your reading a little Book, wherein Mr. Le Clerc gives a fine Description of Liberality, and wherein he shews excellently well the false Notions which Men ordinarily have of that Virtue. 'Tis the 12th Chapter of his Book, which he entitles, Reflections upon our good or ill Luck, as we commonly call it, in the Business of Lotteries. A Work printed at Amsterdam in 1696.

³ Under the Notion of Beneficence we may comprehend all the Services we do to others in averting the Dangers they are threaten'd withal. 'Twas a Precept of the antient Gymnosophists, as appears from a Saying of Charicles in Heliandus, which our Author cites above, Οὐδὲ γὰρ ἄν μοι δευρὸν ἐν κινδύνῳ ἄρχω δὲ τῆς ἐνανθρωπισσαυαν περιεὶν. ἐν γὰρ τῷ τῷ παρῆντι ἐν τῷ γυμνῶν περὶ ἡμῶν σωθῆναι. We must not leave any Soul that is enter'd into an human Body in danger, as the Gymnosophists instruct us, Lib. 2. c. 6.

Fellow, but to help him to bear it; and this they did to exclude all Idleness and Ease. Tho' S. Paul could have taught them a better Reason, 2 Cor. viii. 13. Not that other Men be eased, and you burthen'd, but by an Equality, &c.

Add Ambros. Offic. l. i. c. 30. and from him Gratian Dist. lxxvi. c. 14, &c. & Caus. i. Quest. 2. Chap. 6, 7. Socrates in Xenophon (Ἀπομν.) lays down this as a Rule in our Assistances, to our Friends or to Strangers, and in almost all the Concerns of Life, *To do according to our Ability*⁴.

XVI. The Virtue answering to Benevolence in the Giver, is Gratitude in the Receiver, by which he demonstrates, that the Kindness was acceptable to him, and upon this score entertains a hearty Respect for the Author of it, seeking all Occasions of making a Requit, as far as his Abilities will give him leave. For it is by no means absolutely necessary, that our Return should be precisely as much in Value, as the Courtesy amounts to; but good Will and earnest Endeavour are frequently allow'd to satisfy an Obligation. Ovid. de Ponto l. iv. El. 8. ver. 37.

*Sed qui, quam potuit, dat maxima, gratus abunde est;
Et finem pietas contigit illa suum.*

He that repays to his Extent of Power,
Were not more grateful with the noblest Store.

The Reason of this Duty ceases, when ever we have a just Exception against the Donor, and are fully assur'd, that his Bounty was more in Pretence than in good Will⁵. But here wise Men give us an excellent Caution, that we should not be too curious in enquiring upon what Grounds and Motives a Man has been our Benefactor; because this Niceness of Examination will ever afford a Plea, and a Colour to Ingratitude.

The more apt in their own Nature Benefits are to unite and to engage the Minds of Men, the more strictly does Reason enjoin us to apply ourselves with Vigor and Industry to a just Requit. When a Man has express'd so much Dependence upon me, as to confer the prior Obligation, I am bound at least not to suffer him to be the worse for his Kindness, and I ought never to receive a good Turn, but with a Resolution to hinder the Author, if possible, from repenting of what he has done. If upon some particular Reason we are unwilling to be oblig'd to a certain Person, in this Case it is lawful for us to refuse the Benefits he offers. But then great Care must be taken to do this without giving the least Suspicion of Contempt; since otherwise, to reject a voluntary Favour³, carries in it a manifest Affront.

Take away the Necessity of returning Kindnesses, and no Man will ever begin them; for then it would plainly be acting against Reason, to part with our Bounty, whilst we know it would be thrown away. And thus all Benevolence, all mutual Trust and good Will must be banish'd out of the World; there must be no such Thing as free Help, or antecedent Merit, no way of endearing and engaging one Man to another. *Comp. Hobbes de Cive, c. iii. f. 8. Aristot. ad Nicom. l. ix. c. 2*⁴. It will hold good for the most part, that we are rather to return a Benefit, than to serve a Friend in the way of Gratuity; as we ought likewise rather to pay a Debt, than give away our Money to our dearest Confident. In general, what we owe of any kind is first to be made good; yet if a free Gift to another Person would at the same time plead more Honesty, and more Necessity, it is then to have the Preference in our Disposal. Add Socrates, his Discourse of brotherly Love, in Xenophon. Ἀπομν. 2. ⁵ Tully is admirable on this Point of Gratitude: It is, says he, of all Duties, the most indispensibly necessary. If Hesiod bids us restore what we borrow, if we can, in a larger Measure; what ought we to do when we are as it were challeng'd by a prior Obligation? Are we not in this Case to imitate fruitful Fields, that still return more than they receiv'd? For if we make no Scruple to oblige those whom we hope to be the better for hereafter, how then should we behave ourselves towards such as we are the better for already? Since there are two sorts of Liberality, the one of bestowing a Benefit, the other of returning it; it is at our Choice whether we will give or no; but an honest Man is not at Liberty in the Point of returning, provided it can be done without Injury.

It is observable, that Cicero here makes Gratitude a part of Liberality, and consequently, hints, that it is not tyed up to Laws altogether so strict as those of Justice, which commands us to repay what we owe upon Contract most punctually and precisely⁶. It may be remark'd farther, that when he says the former kind of Liberality, the bestowing of Benefits, is in our Choice, he ought not to be understood in an absolute Sense; for it is plain we ⁴ To these rare Passages of the Antients, we may add a small Sentence taken out of our Author himself in his Abridgment of the Duties of a Man and Citizen, l. i. c. 8. §. 5. The manner of exercising Benevolence and Liberality much enhances the Value of Benefits, as when a Man does a good Office with an Air of Cheerfulness and Briskness, and with all the Signs of a good Will.

MR. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on §. XVI.

³ Our Author in his last Editions interrupts the Thred of his Reasonings with this Remark, That when one refuses a Benefit, we should take care that we give no Suspicion of Contempt to him who civilly offers us his Service, otherwise such a Refusal is a kind of Injury.

⁴ Aristotle maintains, that as it is a greater Duty to restore what one has borrowed, than to lend to a Friend; so it is ordinarily to make an Acknowledgment of a Kindness, than to do one to a Friend; at least there is a greater Reason drawn from Honesty and Necessity to engage us to the Duties of Gratitude, than Friendship, according to the Passage our Author quotes out of Aristotle, Καὶ τὰς μὲν εὐεργεσίας ἀντιποδοτέον ἐπὶ τὸ πολὺ μᾶλλον, ἢ χάριστον ἐπιτέλει, ὡς πρὸς δάνειον, ὃ ὀφείλει ἀποδοτέον μᾶλλον, ἢ ἑταίρου δωτέον — ἐὰν δὲ ὑπερτείνῃ ἢ δόξῃ τὸ καλῶς, ἢ τὸ ἀναγκαίως, πρὸς ταῦτ' ἀπικλιτέον.

are under some Obligation even to antecedent Beneficence; but the Point is, that this Obligation does not carry so much Strictness in it, as that which binds a Man to Gratitude; or to endeavour the approving himself by all good Will, and good Service to his Benefactors.

It happens, 'tis true, very frequently that in the doing a Kindness there is more true Love on the Part of the Giver, than of the Receiver. The Reason of this is enquired into, by Aristotle in his Ethicks, Book ix. c. 7. There being too much Ground in fact, for that politick Remark of Tacitus, Beneficia eo usque laeta sunt, dum videntur exsolvi posse; ubi multum antevenero, pro gratia odium redditur, An. iv. 8. Add Hobbes Leviathan, c. 11, &c. Where he tells us, that the receiving great Benefits from a Superior inclines to Love, but the receiving of the like from Equals or Inferiors does not, unless there is Hope of being able to requite them. "Good Turns do so far yield an agreeable Satisfaction, as we fancy ourselves able to repay them; when they much exceed this Measure, the Debt grows desperate, and so produces a sullen and a secret Hatred, instead of a real Kindness and Affection.

XVII. But tho' the bare Notion of Ingratitude does not imply a real Injury, inasmuch as it is not the Violation of any full and perfect Right, yet it passes in common Censure for a Vice more foul, more odious, and detestable, than Injustice itself. For it is look'd on as an Argument of a most abject and degenerate Soul, for a Man to declare himself unworthy of the fair Opinion which another entertain'd of his Honesty, to be proof against Benefits, and consequently past all Sense of Humanity.

The Account which Des Cartes (in his Discourse of the Passions, Artic. 194.) gives of Ingratitude, is very rational and very elegant. "It is the Vice, says he, of Men, who are either madly proud and vain, and so imagine every Thing to be due to their Merit; or else senselessly stupid, and so unable to reflect on the Benefits they receive; or lastly, pitifully weak and abject, who sue with the meanest Submission for the Af-sistance of others; which if they chance to obtain, they immediately hate the Persons to whom they have been oblig'd, because either wanting Will to make requital, or despairing of Ability, and at the same time fancying all the World to be mercenary, and that no good Turn is done without hopes of Retribution; they apprehend themselves to have exceedingly baulk'd and disappointed their Benefactors."

Learned Men have disputed, whether or no there ought to lie an Action against this Vice, in Courts of Civil Judicature. Seneca takes the negative Side of the Question, and the Reasons he proceeds upon are chiefly these; "First, That if a Benefit be strictly to be repaid like a Sum of Money, or as if it were let out to him, it then loses the Name of a Kindness, and becomes a Loan or Debt: Secondly, That whereas the requiting of a good Turn is esteem'd an Act highly virtuous, it must cease to be virtuous, were it once made necessary: Thirdly, That there must needs arise more Causes on this Head, than all the Courts in the World would be sufficient to try, Themist. Orat. iii." By the Persian Constitution, there is a settled Penalty decreed against Ingratitude; as being the readiest Incentive to Hatred, and ill Will. And where this Vice is not punishable by Law, it produceth more desperate Enmity, and more fatal Contention. Add Xenophon Cyrop. l. i. And M. Antonin. l. ix. c. 42. & Val. Max. l. ii. c. 6. f. 6, 7. & l. v. c. 3. f. 5. To these Instances and Arguments, other Authors have answer'd at large. See Bacler's Actio Ingrati. Our Design leads us no farther, than to observe, that from every Transgression of the Law of Nature it does not presently follow, that there must lie an Action (or the Resemblance of an Action) against a Man in Nature's Court. This is certain, that the Divine Justice hath reserv'd severe Punishments to be inflict'd on ungrateful Persons in another Life; and in this present World they ought to suffer the Hatred and Detestation of all Mankind, and to be adjudg'd unworthy of the least Benefit or Favour. But why a Man cannot be sued in an Action, at the Civil Bar, for simple Ingratitude,

MR. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on §. XVII.

¹ The Reason that Tully gives of the evil Eye of Ingratitude is this: Omnes immemorem beneficium oderunt, eamque injuriam in deterrenda Liberalitate sibi etiam fieri, eamque qui faciat, communem hostem tenuiorum putant, (i. e.) The Ungrateful is hated by all the World, for their Proceedings discourage them who are inclined to Liberality, which is an Injury which every Man shares in; inasmuch that the ungrateful Man is accounted the common Enemy of all those who need Help from powerful Persons. Cicero. De Offic. l. 2. c. 18.

Lucian also speaks to the same purpose, as in (a). See also the Reflections which Mr. De Evremont makes upon ungrateful Persons, Tom. III. p. 79. and in his Miscellanies. Printed at Amsterdam 1706.

⁵ In fine, Besides, that there is hardly any Man but complains, that he has been ungratefully dealt with, it is very hard to weigh exactly the Circumstances which increase or lessen the Value of any Benefit. See what Seneca says of this that is, forgetting a good Turn, or for neglecting to requite it, when he had Opportunity, there seems to be this plain Reason; that the very Cause of my conferring the Kindness (that is, of my giving somewhat without taking Security for its return) was to afford the Party an Opportunity of shewing himself grateful out of pure Honesty, not out of fear of Compulsion; and on my own part to demonstrate that what I bestow'd was not done out of a fordid Desire of Gain, but out of Humanity and good Nature, since I required no Caution, or Insurance of being repaid. *Antoninus*⁶ will teach us better Philosophy. When thou accusest a Man (says he) of Falseness or Unthankfulness; turn the Censure upon thyself. For the Fault is without doubt thine; that thou didst not confer the Favour freely and undesignedly, without looking for any farther Fruit, than the Action itself. Is it not sufficient Satisfaction to have relieved and assisted one that is a Man as thou art? Dost thou demand a Reward for doing what thy Nature obliges thee to do?

But when a Man is guilty of mix'd Ingratitude, or when he not only neglects to requite a Courtesy, but answers it with Injuries and Abuses; the Injury thus offer'd founds an Action in Nature's Court, or a Cause of War; and its being accompany'd with an ungrateful Mind, as it highly aggravates the Fact, and renders it more vile and odious, so it engages the Sufferer more speedily to seek redress; and to punish the Villain the more severely, in regard, that Benefits themselves could not reclaim him⁷.

⁶ Όταν (says Antoninus in the Greek) ως απίσω ή άχρείσω μέμφοι, εις έαυτὸν επιστρέφει, προσήλως γὰρ σὸν τὸ άμαρτία, είτε πει τὸ ποιούτω τὴν διάδοσιν έχρησθί επισείουσαι, ὅπ τὴν πίσιν φυλάξει, είτε τὴν χάριν διδῶς, μὴ καταληκτικῶς ἔδωκας, μηδὲ ὡσεῖς ἐξ αὐτῆς σῆς προσέξως ἐυδὲς ἀπειληθῆναι πάντα ἢ καρπὸν. CHAPTER IV.

Of the Duty of keeping Faith, and the Diversity of Obligations to it.

The CONTENTS of every Paragraph of the fourth Chapter.

- I. There must be Covenants and Agreements in all human Societies.
- II. Covenants are to be kept.
- III. Obligations are natural, or adventitious.
- IV. Atheism destroys all natural Obligations.
- V. A natural, or civil Obligation.
- VI. What is the Force of each of them.
- VII. A perpetual and temporary Obligation.
- VIII. Obligations not mutual.
- IX. Obligations perfectly, or imperfectly, mutual.

THE Duties hitherto explain'd, are mutually owing upon account of that common Relation, which Nature has establish'd amongst Men; altho' we suppose no antecedent Act to have pass'd between them¹. But it would be unreasonable to confine within these narrow Limits, all the Offices that Men are to exercise towards each other. For in the first place, all are not of so good and honest Dispositions, as to perform every Thing, whereby they can benefit their Neighbours, out of pure Humanity and Charity; without being secure of Retribution. And then, many Things which we should be glad to receive from others, are of such Value and Consequence, that we cannot in Modesty desire them gratis. Or perhaps it does not become our Fortune or Station to be beholden to another, for such a Benefit. Therefore unless an Equivalent be paid, commonly the other Party is unwilling to give, and frequently we are unwilling to receive. Again, others are many times ignorant, how they might serve and oblige us. Lastly, Inasmuch as the Power of Man, being finite, cannot in the same manner extend itself to all Persons, it is agreeable to Reason, that such Acts as are not already bespoken by an antecedent Obligation lying on us, should be made sure to those, who by entering into Covenant with us, first obtain a Right to receive them². Therefore, that the true Fruits of a social Nature, the mutual Offices of Mankind, might be practis'd with more Frequency, and more Regularity, it was necessary for Men to bargain, and agree amongst themselves, that they would perform to each other such and such Services, as they could not be absolutely secure of by the bare Law of Humanity. So that their Business must be to settle before-hand what every Man ow'd to another, and what he should by virtue of his Right accept and challenge in return³.

Hence it is easy to apprehend how the Offices of Humanity, or Charity, differ from those which are requir'd by full and proper Right, and which are the Objects of strict Justice. The former are not owing upon any Covenant, either express or im-

¹ See Chap. 1. §. 1. Note 1. foregoing, and Chap. 9. §. 8. with the Note on it.
³ I have added the following Sentences to compleat our Author's Reasoning, as he has done himself in his Abridgment of a Man and Citizen, Lib. 1. c. 8. §. 2. This is what is done by Agreements or Promises: For since our Abilities are so limited, that they can't extend at the same time and in the same manner to the Necessities of all Men, Reason tells us, that he that has acquired by an Agreement or Promise any particular Right to the Actions of another, which were not before, as we may say, engaged to any other, has a Power to dispose of these Actions according to the Agreement.

plicit; but purely by force of that common Obligation which Nature has laid upon Mankind. But what I owe another upon Pact, or Agreement, I therefore owe him, because he has obtain'd a new Right, holding good against me by virtue of my free Promise or Consent. Farther, whatever I transact with another by way of Covenant, is design'd not for his Profit, but for my own. Whereas in Duties of Humanity the Case is quite otherwise. For, although the Performance of these be in general necessary, for the rendering the Life of Man comfortable and commodious, and consequently be an Advantage to the Performer, by giving him good Grounds to expect fair Treatment; yet with regard to particular Acts of Kindness, a Man does them not for his own sake, but for the sake of the Party who receives them. For a Benefit, if conferr'd upon a Principle of private Interest, loses its Nature and its Name.

Thus then the Duties of Humanity, or Charity, and those arising from Covenant, do afford a mutual Assistance and Supply to each other; whilst those things which Charity either cannot, or does not ordinarily procure, are obtain'd by Pact; and in Matters about which no Pacts have pass'd, Charity comes in, and serves our Turn as well. And although to fix the Subject, and the Conditions of Covenants, be left to the Pleasure of particular Persons; yet that there shall be some such Agreements, the Law of Nature does (indefinitely, and in general) command; in as much as without these Transactions there would be no possible Means of preserving Peace and Society in the World. So speaks Isocrates advers. Callimach. So great is the Force of Leagues and Covenants, that scarce any Affairs, either of Grecians or Barbarians, are transacted in any other manner. By means of these we traffick abroad, and bargain at home. By means of these we terminate private Dissentions and publick Wars. These we all make use of, as an universal Good to be enjoy'd in common by Mankind.

II. When Men have once engaged themselves by Pacts, their Nature obliges them, as sociable Creatures, most religiously to observe and perform them. For were this Assurance wanting, Mankind would lose a great part of that common Advantage, which continually arises from the mutual Inter-course of good Turns. Aristot. Rhet. l. I. c. 15. Take away Covenants, and you disable Men from being useful and assistant to each other. Tull. Off. l. II. c. 11. So great is the Force of Justice, that even those who live by Outrage and Villany, cannot subsist without some Shadow and Semblance of this Virtue. Which he shews in the Instances of Thieves and Pirates. Farther, were not Men more strictly and necessarily tied to keeping their Promises, we could not with any Certainty build on the Assistance of others, in the ordinary Affairs of Life. And then breach of Faith is the aptest thing in the World to found an endless Succession of Quarrels and Complaints. For in case I have actually perform'd my part of the Contract, and the other Person fails, whatever I have done, or given, is absolutely lost. And if I have not as yet proceeded to any actual Performance, it is however a Trouble, and it may be a Prejudice to me, to have the Course of my Designs and Business overturn'd; since I could have settled things by other Ways and Measures, had not this Man offer'd to transact with me. And 'tis most unreasonable, that I should be expos'd to Scorn and Censure, for entertaining a kind Opinion of a Person's Goodness and Honesty. We are therefore to esteem it a most sacred Command of the Law of Nature, and what guides and governs, not only the whole Method and Order, but the whole Grace and Ornament of human Life, that every Man keep his Faith, or which amounts to the same, that he fulfil his Contracts, and discharge his Promises.

III. But in as much as Pacts or Covenants, those especially which are express, do impose an Obligation on us, which Nature did not before enjoin, at least not in so precise and determinate a Manner; it may not be here inconvenient to run over the principal Kinds, and Divisions of Obligations. Obli- gations then in the first place, are distinguish'd into connate and adventitious ^a. Vid. Sander. de Oblig. Jur. Prælect. I. c. 11. The former are such as all Men fall under by Virtue of their being Creatures endued with Reason, or such as necessarily attend and accompany the rational Nature, consider'd in that simple and general Notion. Altho', in regard that all Men are born Infants, and as yet incapable of the exercise of Reason, these Obligations do for some time lie without Act, or Force; and do then at length exert their Power, and render Men capable of contracting Guilt, when the Understanding, improving by Age and Use, makes us sensible of them. And from this Period they date their Influence, and produce their penal Effects, should a Man be never so negligent in weighing and considering their Authority. Therefore Ignorance of the Law of Nature is an insufficient Plea, to excuse a Person of mature Years; tho' he should urge that it never came into his Head to reflect whether this Law had settled such a Point, or not. Adventitious Obligations are such as fall upon Men by the Intervention of some human Deed, not without the Consent of the Parties, either express, or at least presumptive.

³ We must add, Of what Condition or Religion soever he be, to whom we engage our selves for any thing. It is a Precept of the Scholars of Zoroastres, a sort of Men in this not so loose, and more honest, than many Christians: Cum quocunque feceris pactum, id ne frangas. — Nec putes tecum dicere, Quamvis pactum fragero, id tamen non erit mihi peccatum, & sicut sit cum aliquo in Religione nostra, sive extra eam, res perinde est. (i. e.) The Pythagoreans to accustom themselves to keep their Words in Matters of Importance, shewed the greatest Exactness in Things of a trifling Nature. And of this they tell a pleasant Story. "One Lyfis, a Philosopher of that Sect coming one Day out of Juno's Temple, met "one of his Fellow-Disciples, named Euryphamus, going into it, who desired him to stay till he had payed his Devotions. "Whereupon he sets him down before the Temple; but Euryphamus having unhappily fallen into a deep Meditation, forgot "his Promise, and departed at another Door. Nevertheless Lyfis, without Discouragement, staid patiently all that Day, the "next Night, and good part of the next Day, when being in their School, and hearing some talking of Lyfis, as if they knew "not what was become of him, he called to mind what he had promised, and went to relieve this scrupulous Observer of his "Word. Jambl. de Vita Pythag. c. 30. §. 185. Ed. Kust. Doubtless this is an over-nice Exactness; but 'tis better to offend on this side, than to suffer ourselves to be guilty of the least Negligence.

⁴ The Author begins here to distinguish between Agreements or Contracts, and Promises, whereas in other Places he uses the Word Contract in such a general Sense, as to comprehend Promises, whereas a Promise is an Engagement made by him, who makes the Promise; and therefore to avoid all Equivocation, and not to make things obscure without Necessity, it is better, when we speak so in general, to use the Word Engagement.

IV. Amongst connate Obligations, such as are planted, as it were, in our Being, the most eminent is that which lies on all Men with respect to Almighty God, the supream Governor of the World; by Virtue of which we are bound to adore his Majesty, and to obey his Commandments and his Laws. Whoever wholly violates and breaks through this Obligation, stands guilty of the most heinous Charge of Atheism; because he must at the same time deny either the Existence of God, or his Care of human Affairs. Which two Sins, with regard to their moral Consequences and Effects, are equivalent to each other; and either of them overthrows all Religion, representing it as a frightful Mockery, introduced to awe the ignorant Vulgar into some Decency and Duty ^a. Therefore we ought in Justice to discard and explode, as most foul and scandalous, that Notion of Hobbes ^b, in which he would rank Atheism amongst the Faults of Imprudence, or Ignorance; as if it were not properly Sin, but a Mistake, or Folly, more worthy of Pardon than of Punishment. The Argument he makes use of runs thus, The Atheist never submitted his Will to the Will of God, in as much as he never believ'd there was such a Being. But now it is impossible any one should have a sovereign Power over us, unless he obtain'd it by our Consent. Therefore since the Atheist was never under the Kingdom of God, it follows that he is not obliged by the Laws of that Kingdom. But here it is most grossly false, that all Sovereignty is constituted by the Consent of the Subject; for this will hold only with regard to human Dominion; where unless by our own Contract and Consent, we cannot lose the Power of resisting another, who is by Nature our Equal. But who will pretend to assert that GOD has not a Power of commanding his Creatures, unless they voluntarily agree to invest him with such Authority? Nay, Hobbes ^c has sufficiently confuted himself, by deducing the Right, which God has of ruling and of punishing in his Kingdom of Nature, from his irresistible Power; but did any one ever imagine that an Atheist was able to resist the Power of God? And therefore Atheists are not, strictly speaking, God's Enemies (as Hobbes defines Enemies, who are neither under a common Sovereign, nor under each other) but his rebellious Subjects, and consequently guilty of Treason against the divine Majesty, as Hobbes himself has elsewhere ^d expressly acknowledged. And agreeably to this he defines Treason against human Power to be: "When one either by Word, or Deed, does in general manifest and declare, that he will no longer submit to that Man or Council of Men, in whom is lodg'd the supream Administration of the State, or when a Man wholly throws off the Bond of civil Obedience." It is no such obscure Matter therefore to assign the particular Species of Sin, to which Atheism belongs. Nor is the following Assertion built on better Grounds, That Atheists cannot be punish'd any otherwise, than by the Right of War; as the Poets represent the Gods, routing by force of Arms the old Giants that assaulted Heaven. On the contrary, that Evils inflict'd in martial Encounters are not properly Punishments, we shall hereafter have Opportunity to shew. A Sovereign must not presently be said to make use of the Right of War, when he reclaims his refractory Subjects. For the bare Right of Sovereignty includes thus much, That the Person invest'd with it shall have the Power of reducing those to Obedience by Force, who refuse a voluntary Submission. Much less are those rebellious Opposers of lawful Authority to be accounted just Enemies, or such as have a Right of making Resistance.

It does not excuse Hobbes to alledge that Passage of the Psalmist, The Fool hath said in his Heart, There is no God. As if there was any such Nicety in the Scripture Language, to call those only Fools who sin out of Mistake, and not those who offend wilfully: Or, as if this too were not the highest Folly, by a wilful Sin to incur the most intolerable Torments, for the sake of a very slender Pleasure, or perhaps no Pleasure at all. Again, it is by no means a matter of such Difficulty, to discover the Being of a GOD by natural Reason, as to find out the Proportion between a Sphere and a Cylinder; the Instance which Hobbes makes use of. It may not be indeed in the power of every unlearned Person to form, or to apprehend an artificial and philosophical Demonstration of God's Existence; but he cannot thence claim a Privilege of securely doubting or denying it. For in as much as the whole Race of Men in all Ages have constantly held this Persuasion, whoever would attempt to assert the contrary, must of Necessity, not only solidly confute all the Arguments produced on the other side, but also alledge better and more plausible Reasons for his own particular Opinion. And farther, since the Safety and Happiness of Mankind have been hitherto thought to depend chiefly on this Belief, it is requisite, that he likewise prove Atheism to contribute more to the Interest and the good of all Men, than the Acknowledgment of a Deity. Which being a Task manifestly impossible, the Atheists are to be judg'd Offenders, not only against the Divine Majesty, but against all Mankind. And they deserve the less Favour on this Account, because these very Men who would reverse the Judgment of all People and of all Ages, do arrogantly assume to themselves a deeper Sagacity, and a clearer Light of Understanding than the World was ever acquainted with before. And consequently, tho' their Unbelief be indeed an Error, and a most fatal and destructive one; yet it is such as they did not fall into thro' Imprudence or Simplicity, but by a vain and impudent Pretence of more than ordinary Degrees of Wisdom^a.

It will be a very easy Labour to refute those Arguments, which Spinoza^b has alledged in defence of this Notion of Hobbes. The Thesis he lays down to work upon is this, Every one who cannot govern himself by Reason, may by the highest Right of Nature live according to the Laws of his Appetite. And foreseeing it might be here objected, That the Assertion was contrary to the Reveal'd Law of GOD, he answers, That a natural State is both in Nature and Time antecedent to Religion; which with regard to natural Religion is as absolutely false, as what he subjoins, That no Man knows by Nature any Obligation lying on him to obey GOD; and that no Reason can obtain this Knowledge, but such as is confirm'd by the Signs of Revelation. Therefore the Consequence he draws is most absurd, That before Revelation, no Man was bound by any such Divine Law, as it was impossible for him to be ignorant of; and, That a natural State is to be conceiv'd without Religion, or Law; and for that Reason without Sin, or Injury. In all this he only ridiculoussly confounds the natural with the positive Divine Law. He proceeds to assert, That Man consider'd in a State of Nature, is free from all Religion, not only upon account of Ignorance, but by virtue of that common Liberty, in which all are born. For, says he, if Men were by Nature bound to the Divine Law, or if the Divine Law were a Law by Nature, it would be superfluous that GOD should afterwards enter into a Contract with Men, and oblige them by Oath and Covenant. Now it is clear that these Pacts or Covenants pass between GOD and Men in reveal'd Religion, not in natural, to which a Man immediately stands obliged upon account of his being created by God a reasonable Creature. So that Spinoza's Conclusion is most vain and senseless, That Divine Law began from that time, when Men by express Compact promised to obey GOD in all things; by which Deed they receded, as it were, from their natural Liberty, and transferr'd their Right upon GOD, just as Sovereignty is conferr'd in civil States. For the Support of which Doctrine it is necessary to suppose, that Men in a State of Nature had not their Existence from God Almighty.

From this Obligation, by which Men are bound to pay Obedience unto GOD, springs the Obligation of all Men towards all Men, as such; by virtue of which they are engaged to lead a social Life. How this is to be discover'd, it has been formerly our Business to shew.

V. There is another famous Division of Obligation, into natural and civil; but such as is by different Authors differently stated^c. Grotius observes, that the Lawyers sometimes call a Thing of natural Obligation, the doing of which Nature shews

MR. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on §. IV.

^a Mr. Bayle in his Thoughts about a Comet (Art. 177.) distinguishes between two sorts of Atheists, the one which begins to doubt, and the other which have pass'd all doubting. Of the first Sort are ordinarily all those who bear the Name of Learned, but falsely; and glory in their Reason and their Contempt of bodily Pleasure; as also those whose Souls are subject to all sorts of Vices, which are capable of the worst Aggravations, and perceiving that the Fears of Hell cause them no small Disquiet, and imagining that 'tis their Interest that there should be no God, endeavour to persuade themselves that 'tis so. Others become Atheists because they have been great Sinners, and are full of as much Malice as can crowd into any Man's Soul. The second Sort are Infidels without design, and moral Men. Mr. Bernard in his News about the Republick of Learning, November 1701, calls them both Atheists by Reflection; but he after distinguishes them thus, giving the Name of Atheism in Fancy to him who begins to doubt, and of Atheism in Heart to him who is past doubting. According to this Author, 'tis undeniable, That there are Atheists in Heart in the World; for, says he, Perhaps, 'tis hard to maintain, that there are Atheists in Mind in the World, who are confirm'd in Atheism; but there are such perhaps as labour under so many Scruples concerning the Being of a God, that they think it a Thing so very dubious, that they can have no Certainty of it. But the same Author says, There are Atheists without Reflection, who believe no God, because they have never thought of it, but being so wholly taken up with sensible Objects, it never came into their Minds to suspect that there is any Thing in the World but what they see, never enquiring after the Principle of their Being. There is no doubt but there are such Atheists, without returning to the fabulous Relations of the Chinise and Caffres. In my Opinion, there is nothing more judicious than these Reflections, and this System of the different sorts of Atheists. The Notion of our Author above-mention'd is not much different from the common Hypothesis of Divines, who with regard to common Experience determine a Matter of Fact by metaphysical Reasons. I can't then but wonder, that he gives such a careless Solution of the Question, which he touches by the bye, viz. Whether Atheists ought to be punish'd? He maintains elsewhere (viz. in his Book, Of the Duties of a Man and Citizen) that they ought to suffer the most severe Punishments, Gravissimis poenis est coercenda eorum impietas. But on the contrary, Mr. Titus says, that such Men ought not to be treated so severely. For, says he, that Method of Punishment and Force is not proper to cure a Man of Atheism; the only Punishment of such as are in Error, if they will not be instructed, is to leave them to God's Judgment, Observ. 95. on Pufend. For my part, I profess, that if an Atheist makes an open Declaration of his Opinion, and labours to get himself Followers by misleading such weak Judgments as are not able to answer his Sophisms and Subtilties, or by encouraging those vicious Persons, who are ready thro' the Wickedness of their Hearts to embrace his Tenets, such a Person may with as much Justice be punish'd as he that teacheth others to thieve, murder, or cheat. In this Case our Author's Reasons are very good: For those who disturb a Society by endeavouring to destroy an Opinion so universally received, and which is look'd upon as one of the strongest Props of it, deserve as much to be treated as Criminals, as an Atheist, consider'd as such, for perplexing the common Belief of a God. Let him be content that he has found out the unhappy Secret of shaking off all Tyes of Religion, and applauding his own Impiety, and not hope that others should follow his Example, but be easy, that they resolve to continue in the common Opinion for the Advantage of human Society, knowing how strong Impressions the Fear of God has made upon most Men. (See the Philosophick Comment. &c. Tom. II. p. 482. 483.) But if Atheists either in Mind or Heart do not pretend to propagate their Opinions, why should they be punish'd purely as Atheists? The Nature and End of Punishments as they are used in human Judicatures, does not, in my Judgment, require that they should be used upon such. Their Impiety will be sufficient Punishment, if they continue in it to their Death; but 'tis possible they may see their Error, and by Consideration remove the Sophisms by which they are at present blinded. These Arguments will have a stronger Force, as to Atheists, by Reflection, and therefore need not be enlarged on here.

to be good and honest, altho' it be not strictly a Debt: As for an Executor to pay the entire Legacies, without reserving to himself what the Falcidian Law allows him; to requite a Courtesy receiv'd; to pay Debts which the Creditor has in Law forfeited; or to the exacting of which the Macedonian Decree may be oppos'd². When any thing of this kind is voluntarily paid³, a Man cannot recover it again, on pretence that it was not due⁴, tho' he might at first have refus'd to pay it.

Sometimes we call that a natural Obligation which truly binds us; whether it cause in the other Party a perfect, or whether only an imperfect Right. In like manner by a civil Obligation we sometimes mean such, as is void by the Law of Nature, but depends purely on a civil Law, of which the Obligatio literarum (when a Man confesses a Debt in writing, which he really never contracted) is commonly brought as an Instance; at other times it signifies such as is grounded on both Laws, natural and civil; or such as will bear a good Action in Courts of civil Judicature.

Others with more Clearness assign three Species of Obligation, purely natural, purely civil, and mix'd. The first depends entirely on *natural Equity*⁵; and in such a manner, as not to found an Action in civil Courts. The second arises merely from the Force of civil Law, in the Strictness and Rigor of which it will bear an Action; tho' such an Action will always in point of Equity be invalidated⁷ by the Judge⁶, as the Obligatio literarum before-mention'd. The third is such as is at the same time supported by natural Equity, and confirm'd by the Autho-riety of civil Constitutions. This is the Distinction commonly made by the Interpreters of the Roman Laws.

VI. This Division of Obligations into natural and civil, is a Subject which we ought to insist farther on in our present Enquiry; yet not so much to derive thence the Original of such Tyes, but the Efficacy or Force, which they bear in common Life. So that by natural Obligation we mean such as binds us only by virtue of the Law of Nature; and by civil Obligation, such as is supported and assisted by civil Laws and civil Power. The Efficacy of both is consider'd with regard either to the Subject, the Person in whom the Obligation inheres; or the Object, the Person in whom it terminates, or to whom it is directed. In the first respect, the Efficacy or Virtue of natural Obligation chiefly consists in this, That it binds a Man's Conscience; or that every Person at the same time when he fails of performing it, is sensible that he has displeas'd Almighty God; to whose Mercy as he owes his Being, so he knows he ought to pay all possible Obedience to his Laws. And altho' we cannot indeed, in the Law of Nature, discover any precise and determinate penal Sanctions, yet we ought on all Accounts to acknowledge, that it is enforced by some such due Fruits and Consequences; and that the Author of Nature will infallibly inflict great Evils on those who violate this Obligation, which the just Performers of it shall as infallibly escape. For the Truth of which Belief, amongst many Arguments, one very considerable Presumption is that remorse of Conscience, which attends the Actors of

MR. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on §. V.

² Our Author adds this Sentence to explain Grotius's Words above-mention'd, which Gronovius interprets otherwise. For he says, the Debt is discharged by the Punishment of the Creditor, when the Debtor is excus'd from paying what he owes to a Man who is disfranchis'd, or condemn'd to perpetual Banishment; but Grotius's Quotations, and the following Discourse shew, That the Discharge granted by virtue of the Punishment of the Creditor was made by the Macedonian Law. Now this Decree was so called from a certain Usurer, who was the Cause of it, call'd Macedo, and forbad lending to an Heir, and declares all Obligations void that were made by him. Insomuch, that they who had lent Money, could not in justice require any Thing. See the Digests, Lib. 14. Tit. 6. §. 4. See also the Interpreters of Suetonius in the Life of Vespasian, Chap. 11. There was also a Law like it among the Lucanians, Ἐάν τις ἀσπίτω δανείσους χρεῖσθ' ἐλεγχθῆ, εἰρεται ἄπθ. If any shall lend Money to a Prodigal, he shall lose it. Nicol. Damascen. de Meribus Gent.

³ We ought to take particular Notice of this word Voluntarily, which our Author adds to expound Grotius's Opinion, who doubtless suppos'd it. Nevertheless, Mr. Hertius, both here and in his Dissertation of an Action for a Debt due naturally, but not by human Laws, which is in Tom. III. of his small Tracts and Comments, criticises upon Grotius and our Author, as if they had spoken of a Payment by mistake. He must suppose that they had forgot the Principles of Law, and did not remember what the Roman Lawyers had laid down as an essential Condition of requiring again a Thing not due. He that pays a Thing which he knows not to be due, must be supposed to give it. Et quidem, si quis indebitum ignorans solvit, per hanc actionem condicere potest, sed si sciens se non debere solvit, cessat Repetitio. Digest. Lib. 12. Tit. 6. De Condit. indeb. Leg. 1. Cujus per Errorum Dati repetitio est, ejus consulto Dati donatio est. Lib. 50. Tit. 17. De Divers. Reg. Jur. Leg. 53.

⁷ Among the Romans that only was call'd a Law, which was enacted by the Votes of the People, upon the Proposal of the Head of the Senate. They had also Plebiscita, which were the Decrees of the People, made upon the Proposal of the Officer, chosen out of their own Order. The Laws and Plebiscita, with the Senatus Consulta, or Decrees of the Senate only, the Constitutions of their Princes, the Edicts of their Magistrates, and Determinations of their Lawyers, make up the Body of the Civil Law. For every Prætor, or Judge, when he enter'd upon his Office, put out an Edict, in which he intert'd not only what he thought just and equitable in the Edicts of his Predecessors, but he added new Constitutions, and sometimes made void some old ones. This is what is call'd, Jus Prætorium, The Law of the Prætor; or Jus Honorarium, The Honorary Law, because the Prætor had the Title of Honoratus, i. e. a Person honoured. Hence it is, that the Prætors explain'd and correct'd the Decisions of the Civil Law, and supply'd some Defects. See the Institut. Lib. 1. Tit. 2. De Jur. Nat. Gent. & Civil. §. 3, &c. I can't here but advertise the Reader by the bye concerning the Rescripts of the Emperors, that Mr. Skulting, Professor at Franker, publish'd there not long since, viz. in 1708, a good Discourse to shew the Force they were of.

⁸ See the Institut. Lib. 4. Tit. 13. §. 9.

Wickedness, even whilst they are in fair hopes of escaping human Discovery, and human Punishment. A Disquiet, which no good and wise Man can imagine to proceed from bare Simplicity, from Custom, or from fear of secular Justice; but from a much higher Principle, a Sense of God's Sovereignty, and a Dread of his Vengeance. Cicero pro S. Roscio, c. 24. Every Man that is dishonest, lives in a perpetual Fright, every Man's Wickedness haunts him, his Folly and his Madness disturb him; his evil Thoughts and guilty Conscience terrify and distract him. These are the constant and the domestick Furies, which plague and torture the impious. Add Selden. de J. N. & G. l. i. c. 4. p. 37, &c. Nor can I believe that any Man by flying to the impious Refuge of Atheism, ever found there so good Security against these Terrors, but that his wicked Mind would frequently recoil, and shake him with more Violence than before. And we have scarce had an Instance of any such bold Desier of Heaven, who has not at length been driven into a Consternation by his own Crimes, and turn'd a Penitent in Horror, according to that of Horace ^a.

Although to bind the Consciences of Men, be principally the effect of natural Obligation, yet the same Power is communicated to civil Obligation, provided the Object of the latter be not repugnant to the former. And therefore *Civil Law*s do also bind the Conscience, so far as they are consistent with the Law of Nature. Both Obligations do farther agree in this Respect, that the Duties they enjoin, a Man ought to perform voluntarily, and as it were upon his own internal Motion.

And 'tis this which makes the chief Difference between Obligation and Compulsion; by the latter, the Mind is by external Violence driven upon a thing contrary to its inward Inclinations; but whatever we perform on the former Account, is suppos'd to be done upon the Approbation of our own Judgment, and the hearty Disposition of our Will.

If we consider these Obligations again, as they regard the Object, or as they produce some Effect in the Person, to whom by Virtue of them something is due, they have this Force common to both, That what being thus due, is paid or perform'd, may be fairly accepted and possess'd. But when the other Party neglects or refuses to make good his Obligation, there is then a Difference in the manner of compelling him, between the natural and the civil Obligation, or between those who live in a state of Nature, and those who are settled under a Polity, or Government. To those who live in their natural Liberty, the Precepts of the Law of Nature, being of two kinds, do cause the same Distinction in the Obligation to perform them. Those things which Nature enjoins one Man to pay to another, without any antecedent Paet, as are the Offices of Charity and Humanity, we cannot challenge any otherwise, than by gentle and easy Methods; as by persuading, admonishing, desiring, or intreating. But we must not apply Force to the most obstinate Refuser; unless in Case of extream Necessity². The Reason of which Proceeding seems to be this, That human Society cannot be preserv'd in a very easy or peaceful Condition, without the conferring of those mutual good Offices; and therefore Nature seems to have set them aside, as constant Subjects of exercising Mens particular Benevolence, by Means of which they might win on the good Opinions and the Affections of each other. And now it is clear that those things which may be recovered by Force, are not so apt to procure the Favour, or to unite the Minds of Men, as those which we give only upon our own free Motion, and which we might deny without Fear, or Danger. But what is due to us, upon an intervening Paet, if not voluntarily tender'd, we may procure by forcible Means. As we may likewise defend by Force, our just Possessions and Goods, when an Attempt is made upon them by any injurious Assailant. Civil Obligations, or such as have been confirm'd by the Authority of *civil Law*s, create an Action in Courts of Justice, by virtue of which I am to carry the Defailant before the Magistrate, who has a Power of compelling him to the Performance of his Duty. But even in States, Obligations purely natural, or such as have been enforc'd by the Sanction of *civil Law*s, are left wholly to the common Modesty and Conscience of Men, and to their just dread of a Divine Sovereign and Judge; and the Subject ought not by a Course of Violence to be brought to the Observance of them.

What Obligations ought to be confirm'd by civil Ordinances, it is the Business of Legislators to determine; and they are to measure their Expediency and Use, according as they seem likely to contribute to the inward Happiness, and Tranquillity of the State³. As it would be ridiculously troublesome, to disturb the Judge on every petit Account, so it would be an Error on the other hand, to imitate the Custom of the Seres (in Strabo l. xv.) who⁴, he tells us, had no Hearings in Court, but upon Murther, or Scandal; these being such Mischiefs as the Sufferer could not prevent; whereas it is in every Man's power not to be cheated in a Bargain, only by considering well whom he trusts. Much to the same Purpose, is what he reports of the Indians, That they have no Action at Law, upon Matters of Faith and Trust, nor do they make use of Witnesses, or Seals, but believe each other on their bare Words. Comp. Ælian V. H. l. iv. c. i. Add. Senec. de Benef. l. iii. c. 15.

VII. Obligation may again be divided into perpetual and temporary. The former is that which cannot be taken off so long as the Person exists, in whom it inheres. Such is our connate Obligation towards God; which, even with respect to the Exercise, can at no time be suspended or diminish'd. Such likewise is the connate Obligation of all Men towards all, as Partners of the same Nature, which no Person can throw off, so long as he makes a Part of Mankind; yet the Exercise of it may sometimes, with regard to some particular Persons, be suspended. And this happens, when I devolve into a State of War with another. For the Obligation being reciprocal, in case one Party break it, and return Hostilities for the good Offices of Humanity, the other Party is no longer bound to deal with him in friendly manner; but may maintain his own Safety, and his own Rights, although with the hurt of the unjust Opposer. Yet the same Obligation may still be said to remain perpetual in this Respect, That so soon as our own Safety is provided for, and ensured, we ought to be ready to renew the Peace, and to return to the exercise of all Courtesy and Humanity, towards the Party who began the Contention. Amongst adventitious Obligations we commonly reckon perpetual, the Obligation of Children towards their Parents, and that which passes between Husband and Wife; which shall elsewhere be explained at large ¹.

Temporal Obligations are such as may cease and be cancell'd, whilst the Persons in whom they inhere do yet exist in the World.

VIII. Farther, since it generally happens, that Obligations answer one another, it may be useful to divide them into mutual, and not mutual. An Obligation not mutual is, when one Party stands bound to perform somewhat towards another; yet so that the other Party shall lie under no corresponding Obligation, nor be tied to make equivalent Requital. Such is the Obligation of Men towards God, by which they are engaged to pay him absolute Obedience; but he on his Part is not constrain'd, by Virtue of any such external Obligation ¹, to make any Return for their Obedience. Amongst those Obligations where both Parties are Men (if we except a few Contracts, binding only one side) there are none to be met with of this sort. And the Reason is, because it seems repugnant to the natural Equality of Men, that one Person should be bound to another, and the other Person lie under no Engagement towards him. For we cannot ² apprehend them to be sociable Creatures, who are not united by a common Tie, who have not a mutual Communication of Services; but of whom one seems to be made as it were for the sake of the other, and the other is not bound in Return to contribute any thing towards his Interest, or Happiness. Nor, when Men by political Institutions introduced a State of Inequality, was it in their Power, to invest any Person with such an extraordinary and transcendent Right, as should disengage him from all Obligation and Duty towards other Mortals ³.

IX. Mutual Obligations are such as answer to one another; so that the Party who on the one hand receives a Due, on the other hand is bound to repay it ⁴. These again are subdivided into imperfectly mutual, and perfectly mutual. The former are such as answer unequally, one of them being oppos'd to another, which is either different in kind, or in Virtue and Efficacy. This seems to happen chiefly on account of one of these two Reasons, either that the Persons are unequal, one having a Right of commanding, the other a Necessity of obeying; or because Persons in other Respects equal, as to some particular Business, refuse to receive an Obligation of the same Strictness on both sides. For it is clear that Obligations do thus differ in Force, or Efficacy, some producing a perfect Right in the Person towards whom they are directed; so as to found an Action in human Cognisance, to be prosecuted either by War, or before the Judge, according as the Parties live, either in a State of Nature, or under a Form of civil Government; whereas others produce only an imperfect Right, so that the Performance of them ought not to be extorted by Violence. From the former of these Causes arise the Obligations imperfectly mutual, betwixt Princes and Subjects, betwixt States and particular Members, betwixt Masters and Servants, Parents and Children; all which will be examined in their proper Places. The latter Cause of making Obligations imperfectly mutual, chiefly happen in Cases of gratuitous Promises, and the Performances of them. For whilst I promise any thing to another out of free Favour, I perfectly oblige my self to give it, and the other Party has a Right of requiring it from me. But because I did not engage him to pay me an Equivalent, he is bound to me only by the Law of Gratitude, which ties him much more loosely than if he were my Debtor upon Pact. For we cannot on such unlimited Obligation build our Hopes or our Affairs, and therefore should the Party prove ungrateful in the highest degree, we do not reckon our selves properly to have receiv'd any Loss or Prejudice: For 'tis a Mistake in some Authors to assert, "That Nature gives us a perfect Right to claim a Return of our Benefit, from an ungrateful Person ⁵; though in most Commonwealths, the Courts of Law refuse to admit an Action on that Score." Nor is this a good Consequence, The Necessity of returning a Kindness is greater than that of giving one; therefore the latter is founded upon an imperfect Right, the other upon a perfect.

² This Period, not containing at least directly a Reason of what the Author was speaking of before, I suspect that the Word enim has crept into the Text instead of etiam, either through the Carelessness of the Author or Printers; altho' it is found in the last Edition of 1706, of which Mr. Hertius had the Oversight.

³ We can't maintain this, without encroaching upon the Prerogative of God, who imposes these Duties on Men by the Constitution of their Nature. This we ought nicely to observe, that we may understand the just Extent of the Rights of a King, which are founded upon the Power which every Man can and is willing to grant to him over himself. See my Notes on Lib. 7. c. 8. following.

² See c. 3. §. 17. foregoing.

For, however the Case may stand before, yet when I once have promis'd to do a Favour, there lies a greater Necessity on me to perform it, than on the other Party to return it³. For there may be different Degrees in Obligations of the same kind⁴; especially when we are to compare such Duties as concur in point of Time⁵.

³ To perfect the Reasoning of our Author, we must remember, that the Foundation of the Difference between perfect and imperfect Right, ariseth from the necessary or unnecessary Influence that a thing hath in establishing Peace and Society among Men, and not simply a degree of Obligation from the matter of the thing. So that though we are more indispensibly obliged to the Duties of Thankfulness than of Beneficence, the first ought not to authorize us to use Force or Justice to make us perform them, rather than the last; because neither of them are of that Nature, that the Continuance of Peace or Society doth necessarily require the Practice of them. In some Cases the Duties of Gratitude ought to give place to those of Beneficence, as when a Benefactor may want, or at least spare without any great Loss or Trouble, a thing of which another Person has great need.

IT now follows in course, that we enquire how such Obligations as are not born with Men, should by virtue of some Act of theirs be laid upon them, by which means there arifes, at the same time, in other Persons a Right which before they wanted. For these two moral Qualities have such a mutual Relation and Dependence, that whenever there is produced an Obligation in one Man, there immediately springs up a correspondent Right in another; for 'tis impossible to apprehend that I am bound to any Performance, unless there be some Person in the World, who can either fairly require it, or at least fairly receive it of me. Tho' the Remark will not hold vice versa, that where-ever there is a Right in one, there must presently be an Obligation in another. For example, the Magistrate has a Right of requiring Punishment for Crimes; but such a Right as is attended with no Obligation in the Criminal^{1a}. Unless we solve the Doubt by this Distinction, That if we take Right in a strict and close Sense, for a Power or Aptitude to have any thing, then there is always in some other Person an Obligation answering to it; but not if the Word be taken for a Power of doing any thing. This then in the first place, is clear, that all adventitious Obligations proceed either from a simple, or from a mutual Act; of which the former is properly call'd a free Grant or Promise, the latter a Pact or Covenant.

II. But inasmuch as all acknowledge that Promises and Pacts do transfer a Right to others, before we proceed, it may not be improper to examine Hobbes's Opinion^b about the transferring of Right. He then, from his Project of a State of Nature, having infer'd, that every Man hath naturally a Right to everything, and having farther shewn, that from the Exercise of this Right there must needs arise a War of every Man against every Man, a State very unfit for the Preservation of Mankind; he concludes, "That whilst Reason commands Men to pass out of this State of War, into a Condition of Peace, which Peace is consistent with a Right of every Man to every Thing, it at the same time prescribes that Men should lay down some part of this universal Right. A Man, he says, may lay down, or divest himself, of his Right two ways, either by simply renouncing it, or by transferring it to another. The former is done, if he declares by sufficient Signs, that he is content it shall hereafter be unlawful for him to do a certain thing, which before he might have

MR. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on Chap. V. §. I.

¹ This is not absolutely true. See my Notes on Lib. 8. c. 3. . 4, 5. But Mr. Thomasius, to shew that Right and Obligation do not always answer to each other, alledges the Example of two Persons, who in a Shipwreck getting upon one Plank, which could not save them both, had each of them right to thrust off his Companion, and consequently, there was no Obligation to answer each other. Fundam. Jur. Nat. & Gent. Lib. 3. c. 7. §. 10. But this only proves, that there may be a Case where one Man's Right becomes of no worth by the Opposition of an equal Right in another Person. In like manner, certain other Duties so clash sometimes, that one of them must give place in certain Circumstances, without being less obligatory in general. In the Example of the Plank, we must suppose, as I have said elsewhere, that it belong'd no more to the one than to the other, and neither of them was seized of it alone. For then the Right of Property of the first Occupier would lay an Obligation of giving place on him against whom any of these Titles could be alledged. But yet the other, who was not in the same Case, let it be to whom the Plank did appertain, might lawfully hinder him from using that Instrument to save his Life, which Providence had furnish'd him with; so far is it from this, that he ought to help us, if he can, to seize it.

^a 'Tis true, Punishments are not due to Criminals by virtue of any Compact; but since the Right of Life and Death, or the Right of the Sword is conferr'd upon Sovereigns, we are oblig'd not to resist 'em when they make use of that Right, tho' it be upon our own Persons. See Mr. Barbeyrac's French Translation of this Book, Lib. 8. c. 3. f. 4. Note 8. and f. 5.

“lawfully done. The latter, if he declare by sufficient Signs to another Person, who is willing to receive such a Right from him, that he consents it shall be for the future, as unlawful for himself to resist him in the doing of a certain Thing, as he might before have justly resisted him.” Hence he infers, That the transferring of Right consists purely in Non-resistance; or that, he who in a State of Nature transfers a Right to another, does not give the other Party a new Right which before he wanted; but only abandons his own Right of resisting such a Person in the Exercise of his. Which Assertion, according to his Hypothesis, he thus makes out; “Before any such Act of transferring Right, the Person to whom it is said to be transfer’d, had a Right to all things, and therefore it was impossible to give him a new one; but the Person transferring, loses his Liberty of just Resistance, which before hinder’d the other from exercising his Right in its full Extent. Therefore, whosoever in a State of Nature acquires a Right, only gains this Privilege, to enjoy his primitive Right securely, and without just Disturbance; for example, If a Man in a State of Nature, by Sale or Gift, makes over his Field to another, he only takes away his own Right to that Piece of Ground, not the Right which all other Men have to it; or which comes to the same, he declares that he will not resist, or hinder such a particular Person, who has a mind to make use of the Field; but he does not by this Act prejudice the rest of Mankind, who still keep their primitive Right, as well to this Spot of Earth, as to every Thing else which Nature affords.

III. But as we have formerly made out^a, that this Hobbesian State is by no means natural to Man, a Creature design’d for a social Life; so neither can we admit of what the same Author thus establishes as the Consequence and Result of it, such a Right of each Man to all Things, as shall produce any Effect in reference to other Men. For the clearer Illustration of this Point, it is necessary to observe, That not every natural Licence, or Power of doing a Thing, is properly a Right; but such only as includes some moral Effect, with regard to others, who are Partners with me in the same Nature. Thus, for instance, in the old Fable, the Horse and the Stag had both of them a natural Power or Privilege of feeding in the Meadow; but neither of them had a Right, which might restrain or take off the natural Power in the other. So Man, when he employs, in his Designs and Services, insensible or irrational Beings, barely exercises his natural Power, if without regard to other Men, we here precisely consider it in reference to the Things, or Animals, which he thus uses. But then at length it turns into a proper Right, when it creates this moral Effect in other Persons, that they shall not hinder him in the free Use of these Conveniences, and shall themselves forbear to use them without his Consent. For ’tis ridiculous Trifling to call that Power a Right, which should we attempt to exercise, all other Men have an equal Right to obstruct or prevent us. Thus much then we allow, that every Man has naturally a Power or Licence of applying to his use, any thing that is destitute of Sense, or of Reason. But we deny that this Power can be call’d a Right, both because there is not inherent in those Creatures, any Obligation to yield themselves unto Man’s Service; and likewise, because all Men being naturally equal, one cannot fairly exclude the rest from possessing any such Advantage, unless by their Consent, either express or presumptive; he has obtain’d the peculiar and sole Disposal or Enjoyment of it. And when this is once done, he may then truly say he has a Right to such a thing. Or to decide the Business more briefly, we may make use of this Distinction, that a Right to all Things antecedent to any human Deed, is not to be understood exclusively, but indefinitely only; that is, we must not imagine one may engross all to himself, and exclude the rest of Mankind; but only that Nature has not defined, or determined, what Portion of Things shall belong to one, what to another, till they shall agree to share her Stores amongst ’em, by such Allotments and Divisions. Much less will the same Equality amongst Men admit, that one should naturally claim a Right over another. It is rather true, that no Person will have a Right to govern any other Person, unless he acquire it in a peculiar manner, either by his Consent, or by some other antecedent Deed; as shall be made out more at large in its proper Place^b.

IV. The proper Notion then, of transferring and of acquiring Right, will appear with more Exactness, if we premise, that some Rights bear a regard to Persons, others to Things; and that the latter kind of Rights is again divided into Original and Derivative. I acquire a Right over a Person, if he either expressly or tacitly consents, that I shall prescribe to him what he ought to do, to suffer, or to forbear; by virtue of which Agreement he both obliges himself voluntarily to study Obedience to my Pleasure, and at the same time grants me a Right of compelling him, in case of default, to his Duty, by proposing some considerable Evil, which I shall otherwise bring upon him. A Man then acquires an Original Right over Things, when all others either expressly or tacitly renounce their Liberty of using such a Thing, which before they enjoy’d in common with him. This original Right being once establish’d, by virtue of which the primitive Community of Things was taken off, the transferring of Right is nothing else but the passing it away from me to another, who before was not Master of it. Hence appears the Absurdity of saying, That the transferring of Right consists barely in Non-resistance. Inasmuch as that negative Term cannot express the Force of the Obligation arising from such an Act; which properly implies an inward Inclination to make good the Contract: Tho’ Non-resistance be indeed one Consequence of the Obligation, and without which it cannot be fulfilled. The Instance about the Field, propos’d by Hobbes, does not come up to the Point in hand; for beſides, that it is very abſurd to call that an Act of Selling, when I only quit my Pretenſions to a Thing, whilſt all other Men ſtill keep theirs; even according to his own Doctrine, Propriety of Things had its Riſe from civil Government¹, aiter the State of Nature was ſuppoſed to be paſſ'd and gone. Therefore during the State of Nature, no Man could call the Field his own, and conſequently not ſell it. He ought indeed to have expreſs'd himſelf thus: " Since in a State of meer Nature things belong'd no more to one than to another, therefore if a particular Perſon deſired the ſole Uſe of any thing, to make him Maſter of his Wiſh, it was neceſſary, that all other Men ſhould renounce the Uſe of the ſame Thing. If they did this gratis, the Act had ſomewhat in it like a Gift; if with ſome Burthen, or under ſome Condition, it was then a kind of a *Contract*², for which we have no Name. But ſhould one Man have renounced his Power over ſuch a thing, this could have been no Prejudice to others³, and conſequently, he only would have been debarr'd from the Uſe of it, who had thus freely quitted all Title to it.

MR. BARBEYRAC’S NOTES on §. III.

^a Our Author reasons here upon a false Supposition, which I shall confute in its proper Place. See my Notes on Lib. 4. c. 4. All that can be said is this, that before the Property of Goods was settled, no Man ought to exclude another always from the use of any one thing, and when they had no farther use of it, it return’d to the first Occupier, as if he had enjoy’d it himself by that Title.

V. Let us now carry on our Enquiries, and examine how a Man may contract an Obligation, and confer a Right on another, by means of his own free Promise. To underſtand the Nature and Effects of this kind of Tye, we muſt in the firſt place obſerve, that there are two ways of ſpeaking about giving, or doing a thing to another, which now is, or which we imagine, will hereafter be in our Power. The firſt way is, when we barely expreſs our preſent Mind about a future Act; yet ſo as to lay no Neceſſity on ourſelves, of perfevering always in the ſame Reſolution. An Inſtance we have in what Tiberius in *Tacitus*¹ writes to his Favourite Sejanus, Iſpe quid intra animum voluaverim, quibus adhuc neceſſitudinibus immiſcere te mihi parem, omittam ad præſens referre. I forbear to tell you at preſent, by what Fortunes, and by what Alliances I am conſidering to unite you to myſelf. Such a bare Aſſertion neither founds an Obligation in me, nor a Right in the other Party². And to render it virtuous and unblameable, there is only this Condition requiſite, that we ſpeak as at preſent we really think, and do not impoſe upon a Man by Falſehood and Diſſimulation. But we are by no means obliged to continue always in this Deſign; ſince the mind of Man has not only a natural Power of changing Opinion, but likewiſe a Right; ſo as to do it without Fault, when there is no particular Obligation impoſing a Neceſſity of holding firmly to a Reſolution already taken and declared. Yet theſe Changes of Purpose are liable to juſt Cenſure, if either the former Judgment, from which we receded, was better than this laſt; or by altering our Meaſures ſo unexpectedly, we expoſe a Perſon to Diſappointment and Deriſion, who did not deſerve ſo unkind Treatment at our Hands. See the Paſſage between Q. Cæcilius and T. Marius Urbicus in Valer. Max. l. viii. c. 8. §. 5, 6. See Grot. Book II. c. 11. f. 2. Tho' it be often a juſt³ Punishment to baſe Flatterers and Deſigners, to balk them of their greedy Hopes, and to cheat the gaping Crows, when they have prepared their Mouths for the Morſel. Vid. Plin. 2. Epift. 20. Comp. Grot. l. ii. c. 11. f. 2.

VI. We may call it an imperfect Promise, when a Man determines his Will to the doing a Favour hereafter, with a ſufficient Sign to make it firm and laſting, or ſo as fully to declare his Willingneſs to lie under an Obligation, but not ſo as to give the other Party any proper Right of compelling him to ſtand to his Word. The like to which happens in the Duty of returning Kindneſſes, where the Receiver is obliged to make a grateful Acknowledgment, tho' the Giver has not a full Right to require it. Some are of opinion, that it is hardly poſſible to produce an Inſtance of this kind of Promise, in the Law of Nature, barely conſider'd. It is uſual to alledge for Examples, the Promise of an abſolute Prince made to his Subject, of a Maſter to his Servant, of a Father to his Son, whilſt yet under his Power; by all which the Parties promiſing, ſtand obliged to make good their Engagement; but the others ſeem to want a Right of demanding it from them, becauſe they are allow'd in no Court to bring an Action againſt them upon Default. But now the Lameneſs or Defect of theſe Promiſes does not ariſe from any intrinſick Weakneſs or Invalidity; but from that ſuperior Quality or Station in the Promiſers, which hinders the Obligation from taking its full outward Effect. ² I ſhall explain this Term, Lib. 5. c. 2. §. 7.

³ This is grounded upon a falſe Hypotheſis, as I have ſhewn in Note 1. of the foregoing Paragraph. The Truth is, that till a Man abandons a thing, of which he had poſſeſſed himſelf, with a Deſign to make uſe of it, it belongs to him, and no Man may diſpoſſeſs him of it; but if he releaſes it to another, as from hand to hand, this latter acquires the ſame Right, and conſequently excludes the Right of all others, until he again in his turn leaves to the firſt Occupier the thing which he had Power to diſpoſe of all the while he had it, becauſe the Ceſſion of him who was in poſſeſſion before him, gave him Power to prevent any other who would be maſter of it.

³ The Author plainly ſpeaks here only of thoſe wandering Hopes which ſome ſuffer others to conceive, or rather give them, to diſappoint the Covetouſneſs of thoſe who would cheat us, or deceive us of our Inheritance. So that here is no real Promise, nor any real Declaration of our Will fully, nor irrevocable; but only ſuch hope as was formed at the time when the Words or other equivocating Signs were ſpoken, by which the Deceiver was deluded himſelf, and pleaſed himſelf with Smo'le. See Lib. 4. c. 10. §. 3. following. It may be convenient here to ſay ſomething of ſuch Promiſes, which, tho' made in jeſt, were valid among the Romans, provided they were made in the Form of a Stipulation. For if one ſaid to another, Doſt thou promiſe me this or that? And he ſaid, I do promiſe; the firſt had a juſt Action againſt the other, and he was adjudged to make good his Promise, tho' he had no deſign to engage himſelf. But at length they found out an Expedient to hinder the Effect of this ſcrupulous Obſervation of Laws, contrary to all Natural Right: It was this, Altho' ſuch a Promise would bear a juſt Action, it was eluded, and made null by the Right of the Prætor, who found out a poſitive Exception. See upon this Subject the Julius Paulus of Mr. Noodt, Chap. 11. and his Treatiſe De forma emendandi Doli mali, &c. publiſh'd in 1709. Chap. 6.

an imperfect Stipulation; when the civil Laws enjoin, that Promises shall be made under such a particular Form of stipulating Words; and will not permit a Man to sue another upon his Promise, if it did not run precisely in those Terms. Here they observe, That in case the Parties concern'd fully intended to contract a perfect Obligation, and omitted the set Form of Law, only thro' Error or Imprudence, the Promiser is by natural Equity engag'd to perform his Word, tho' the other Person cannot force him to it by an Action in Courts of civil Judicature. But neither have we in this Example a Promise, which is imperfect upon account of the Law of Nature, but by virtue of a positive Law, which ties up its Effect to such a punctual Form of Speech, a Restraint, which naturally it did not lie under. A true Instance then of all imperfect Promise is, when I express myself in this manner, I really design to do this, or that for you, and I desire you'd think I am in earnest, and speak Truth. In which case I am bound to perform my Word, rather by the Law of Veracity, than of Justice; I lay an Obligation on myself, but I give the other Party no Right of forcing me to perform it. Men have naturally somewhat of Greatness and Generosity in their Temper, upon account of which they had much rather seem to do a good Office, purely on the free Motion of their own Virtue, than for the sake of any Right which another has to challenge it from them. To this Head we may refer the Promises of Men in Favour and Authority, when not by fair Words and general Complements¹, but in a serious and particular manner, they engage to assist us by their Recommendation, Intercession, Promotion, or Suffrage; which yet they would not have a Man challenge from them by virtue of any Right, but desire they should be imputed wholly to their Generosity and Honour. Even the Law of Nature does not seem to allow, that a Man should be compell'd to the Performance of these Promises; since in the very Act of engaging himself he made a tacit Reserve against such Proceeding; that his Benefit might carry the more Grace and Beauty in it, by being remov'd as far as possible from Necessity and Constraint.

VII. A perfect Promise is, when a Man not only determines his Will to the Performance of such or such a Thing for another hereafter, but likewise shews that he gives the other a full Right of challenging or requiring it from him. When we engage to give away a particular Thing, or to perform a particular Service, the former is a kind of Alienation of our Goods, or at least somewhat in order to it; the latter is an Alienation of some part of our natural Liberty; inasmuch as we are now to stick to the Restraint and Confinement of our Promise about a Matter, which before we might have used, or done, or omitted, at our Pleasure. It must be well observ'd, that what we here deliver, concerns only such Promises as are made betwixt Men: tho' it be impossible, that the Divine Promises should fail, yet it would be highly arrogant and indecent to say, That these seeming Engagements on God's Part do give a Right to Man, which shall hold valid against his Maker. Add Grot. loc. cit. f. 3, 4.

VIII. It is a nice Remark of Mr. *Hobbes*², and worthy our Notice, That in relinquishing or transferring Right, if we make use of no Signs except Words, those Words ought to be of the Time present or past. For he, for instance, who shall say in the future, To morrow will I give, plainly shews that he has not given already; and therefore the Right he has over the Thing promised continues firm and entire all this Day, and all the next Day too, and so on, unless in the mean time he actually give it, or pass away the Right of it by a new Promise. Yet in case, besides his Words, he made use of other Signs sufficiently arguing, that it was his Will to transfer the Right at present; then the Words, tho' Grammatically future, shall not hinder the Engagement from taking full Effect. But where these other Signs are wanting, we ought to be very tender of putting so wide and forced an Interpretation on Verbs of the future Tense, as to make them imply a present Act of Alienation. For since we are not wont to make over our Goods to others, without the Prospect of some Advantage to ourselves, which Advantage does not, in these Acts of Grace or free Gift, visibly appear; therefore, in construing such an Act, to which Men are commonly averse, we ought not to presume on any Thing farther, than what is by express Tokens of the Will declar'd. Especially since it is usual by these Terms to signify only a *simple Mark of Good Will*³, and such as shall, at present at least, have no Effect. So that whilst a Man speaks in the future⁴, he is suppos'd to be yet under Deliberation; and before the Time prefix'd, perhaps his Affection and the Merits of the Person may alter; or some Misfortune may intervene, rendring it incommodious for him to part with what he intended. In the same manner as he that makes his Will, does not transfer his Right immediately on the Heir; but he is suppos'd ever to have this Clause or Condition in his Mind, Such a Person shall be my Heir, unless I alter my Will before my Decease. Tho' indeed it be look'd upon as an Argument of Levity and Inconstancy, for a Man to cheat and delude another with false Hopes and Expectations.

The Case is very different, if I express myself thus, I have given, or do give to be deliver'd to morrow: For this is plainly, giving a Man to day the Right of having a Thing to morrow, or transferring to him to day the Right over a thing, which ought to morrow to be actually deliver'd to him. Nor is it any Objection against what we have been asserting, that according to the ordinary Form and Manner of Speech, most Promises are express'd in Terms of Futurity. For in the most solemn Engagements by formal Stipulation, or by Oath, we use the same way of speaking, You shall have such a thing of me, I will give such a thing, &c. The reason of which Custom is, that the delivering of a thing promis'd, generally follows at some Distance. And indeed, we can scarce call it a Promise, when at the same time the Intention of giving is declared, and the thing actually tender'd; inasmuch as there seems here, either to have been no Obligation, or such as expired in the very minute that it was contracted. However, it is plain the Generality of Men never think they properly have a thing, till they get firm Hold and full Possession of it. If then these Terms of Futurity occur in a perfect Promise, as for instance, To morrow I will give you an hundred Pounds, the Sense of them amounts to this, I now give you a Right to have and to require of me the said Sum; and I likewise oblige myself on the Day appointed, to deliver it to you accordingly. We may settle the whole Point with more Brevity, by only saying, that Verbs of the future Tense, made use of in Promises, and especially the Term of Giving, do either imply an Obligation hereafter to be contracted, and then they neither transfer the Thing, nor the Right, to another; or else they import the delivering of a Thing hereafter, the Right to which either is now, or has been formerly transferr'd; and then they do not hinder the Promise from being most perfect and compleat.

² We may observe here, as Mr. Hertius directs us, what the modern Lawyers call, Tractatus incundarum Conventionum, i. e. a Treaty in order to an Agreement; or, Paſta contractuum præparatoria, i. e. some previous Covenants in order to Contracts, which we may call, Preambles or Discourses, by which we seem disposed to enter upon a Bargain, and testify some Desire of Agreement, but conclude nothing positively. For in this Case every Man is free, and there must be a new Treaty to render the Agreement full and entire. Hence it is said in the Digests, That if any one hath promised to lend us any Money, we may receive it, or not, as we please, Qui pecuniam creditam accepturus spondit creditori futuro. in potestate habet, ne accipiendo se ei obstringat, Lib. 12. Tit. 1. De Rebus Creditis. &c. Leg. 30. See what Mr. Hertius says there, and in his Paræmia Jur. German. Lib. 1. c. 8. §. 5.

IX. It is requisite, that whilst we are engaged on this Point, we endeavour to settle a famous Question, which has been much canvass'd by Authors, Whether there can be a Force of obliging in bare Promises, or in bare Pacts, whilst they are no more than verbal Agreements, and are not strengthen'd by any actual Performance betwixt the Parties¹? Connanus the Civilian has been the principal Assertor of the negative Side; whom *Grotius*², and others have labour'd to confute. And indeed, it has been the fix'd Opinion of wise and learned Men in all Ages, that Faith ought to be kept inviolably, though given only in Words; or that a Man by speaking only, without the Intervention of any Deed, may lay on himself a Necessity of some future Performance³. Tull. Off. I. c. 7. The Foundation of Justice is Faith, that is to say, a Firmness and Truth in our Words, Promises, and Contracts. Hence some will have the word Fides to be call'd Quia fit quod dictum est, because that which was said is done, Ulpian in l. i. D. de Pactis. What is so agreeable to human Faith, as to observe mutual Agreements? Vid. D. l. ii. c. 14. de Pactis. It was a very wicked Jest of the petit Prince of Bantam, when being reproved for Breach of Promise, he answer'd, His Tongue had no Bone in it, to make it more stiff than was necessary for his Interest⁴. Whether Connanus has with any Colour oppos'd this universal Judgment, will appear, if we bestow a little time on taking his chief Arguments under Consideration. In the first place then, he says, that he who rashly believes a Promise made without Cause, is no less to blame, than the vain Person who made it. Now here all the Difficulty lies in explaining what he means by a Promise made without Cause. If he would be understood of such Promises as if not perform'd, it brings no Loss or Prejudice to the Party, to whom they were directed, and if fulfill'd, must needs create Trouble or Damage to the Performer; we are willing to allow, that Engagements of this kind produce no Obligation. For how can a Man have any Right of requiring me to put myself to any Charges, or any Toil, in doing a thing which shall profit him nothing⁵? And it is indeed against Reason, to undertake an Action which can produce no Good, and may produce Evil. Thus for instance, suppose you had got me to promise you that I would forbear eating four Days together; upon what account should I stand to such a rash Engagement, if so long a Fast would prejudice my Health, and yet would contribute nothing to your Interest or Advantage? Therefore in this Case it is alike vain and foolish in one Man to make the Promise, and in the other seriously to challenge the Performance. Besides, since Promises are Matters of Grace, or free Favour, they ought to be interpreted under this Condition or Limitation, Provided I can compass the Thing I speak of, without any considerable Damage to myself. Nor can the Person to whom I make the Promise be so impudent and unreasonable, as to desire that my Kindness should be an Injury to me, and that I should enrich him

² Comment. Jur. Civ. Lib. 5. c. 1. But Mr. Buddens in his Element. Philos. Pract. Part II. c. 4. §. 9 asserts, That this Lawyer is fully accus'd of any such Opinion. Mr. Hertius also rejects the Opinion of a certain nameless Person, who justified Connanus, and maintains, That that Person spake only of simple Contracts, considered as they are used in the Roman Judicature. For he says, We must here distinguish between these two Propositions; the one is, That Promises produce a natural Obligation, and the other, That the natural Obligation which arises from a Promise, does not produce a Civil Obligation, which is founded upon a Maxim of the Law of Nature, which authorizes a Sovereign Prince to declare what Obligations shall be valid, and what null. Nevertheless, according to Mr. Hertius, we need only to read Connanus's Reasons to convince us, that he denies Promises to produce any Obligations able naturally and of themselves to give a perfect Right, without the Assistance of the Civil Law.

⁶ We must distinguish here between Pacts or Agreements, which may be called Momentary, which are perform'd immediately, and leave no durable Effect after them, and Succellive, whose Performance is accompanied with a long Train of Effects. As to the first, there is no Necessity that they should have any impulsive Cause, or suitable Motive; but as to the latter, they do not oblige, unless they have a sufficient impulsive Cause, or which comes to the same, unless they tend to profit. That sort of Engagements which want this is not only unprofitable, but hurtful to Society; because by the Duration of their Effects they may cause Trouble and Disorder in the Affairs of the World. As for example, if any one promise not to alienate his Estate without the Consent of his Neighbour. See the Digests, Lib. 2. Tit. 14. De Pactis, Leg. 61. (and Mr. Hertius's Dissertation, entitled, De Pacto, ne Dominus rem suam alienet, Tom. 3. Opusc.) In fine, Men having establish'd Pacts and Covenants for their Advantage, and not to hurt or deceive one another, every Agreement, which aims not at the hat of these Views, may be, and ought to be look'd upon as null by the natural Law. Tit. Observ. in Lauterbach. Obj. 59. See Lib. 5. c. 2 §. 3. Note 3.

by my own Losses⁷. It often falls out⁸, that even not to keep one's Promise shall be just. For all must be refer'd to the fundamental Rules of Justice; as first, that no Man be wrong'd; and secondly, that the publick Good be as far as possible promoted. It may likewise happen, that the Performance of a Promise or Contract would prove highly prejudicial⁹, either to one of the Parties, or to the other. For if Neptune (as it is in the Story) had not made good his Promise to Theſeus, Theſeus had not been so unfortunately deprived of his Son Hippolytus. Therefore neither are we to keep those Promises which are unprofitable to the Person to whom they are made; nor those which are more hurtful to ourselves than advantageous to him. It is a Breach of Duty to prefer a greater Damage to a less. If you promise to plead another Man's Cause, and in the Interim your Son falls dangerously ill, it will be no Violation of your Duty to recede from the prior Engagement; and the Fault will be much greater in the other Party, if he complain of such a Disappointment. Tull. Off. I. Vid. D. L. 50. T. 17.

Add. Senec. de Benef. Liv. c. 35, 39. Tull. Off. l. iii. c. 24. This Case is proposed, I have a Remedy given me for the Dropsy, upon this Condition, That if it cures me, I am never to use that Medicine again. Within a few Years after I have been thus cured, I relapse into the same Disease, and the Person with whom I contracted will not give me leave to make any farther use of it. What am I to do here? It is Inhumanity in him to refuse me, besides, that my using it would do him no hurt. I may therefore safely consult my own Life and Health.

But if by a Promise made without Cause, Comanus understands only a gratuitous, or free Promise without prospect of Gain; then his Assertion will overthrow the whole Business of Beneficence and Liberality, and make all the Offices of Humanity base and mercenary Performances. For why should not I credit a Man, who knowing his own Abilities has bid me expect some free Gift from him, purely that I may have occasion to love and to esteem him? And since if he had pleas'd, he might safely have forborn the Promise, why did he order me to depend upon his Word, if he design'd not fully to oblige himself to the making it good? For the denying of a Benefit is then only void of Injury, when a Man is bound to confer it only by the Law of Humanity; not when by express Promise he has given another a Right to receive it.

X. Comanus urgeth farther, "That since Promises of this kind commonly arise from Ostentation rather than good Will, or at least from Rashness and Inconsiderancy, supposing the Design to be real; the Fortunes of Men would be in great Danger, were they bound to perform every thing they said." It was perhaps on some such Principle, that the Antients imagined the Oaths and Protestations of Lovers were invalid, and that the Gods excused the Breach of them, as proceeding from Minds blinded with Passion. Plato in Sympos. & Poete passim. But indeed the Danger here mention'd is chiefly in Imagination. For we do not attribute a Power of obliging to any Promises, but to such as are made upon serious and deliberate Purpose; and he that mistakes Jest for Earnest, ought to pay for his want of Apprehension. On the other hand, to promise really more than one can conveniently perform, as it must be acknowledg'd a Fault, so it would be a much greater, and indeed a piece of Barbarity, strictly to challenge and require it. Aurelian in Flavius Vopiscus, c. 35. Setting out on an Expedition, and promising the People to bestow Crowns of two pound weight on them, if he return'd victorious, when the Distribution was to be made, the Crowns proved only of Bread, whereas the People expected them of Gold². And besides, we should take care to distinguish between such Terms of Honour and Esteem, as Persons make use of to express, in an indefinite manner, their good Affection towards us; and such particular Engagements as they bind themselves by, to perform somewhat on our behalf: For Men of good Nature and good Breeding often express their Kindness and Civility in very ample Terms; they declare themselves to be entirely ours, and offer all they have to our Service and Disposal³. Old Aeolus in Virgil had this Piece of Gallantry:

⁸ The Latin of Cicero is this, *Sed incidunt sæpe tempora, cum ea, quæ maxime videntur digna esse justo homine, eoque, quem eorum bonum dicimus, commutantur, suntque contraria; ut reddere depositum, promissum facere, quæque pertinent ad veritatem, & ad fidem, ea migrare interitum, & non servare sit justum. Reserri enim decet ad ea, quæ proposui in principio, fundamenta justitiæ, primum, ut ne cui noceatur; deinde, ut communi utilitati serviat. Cum tempora commutantur, commutatur officium, & non semper est idem; potest enim accidere promissum aliquod, & conventum, ut id effici sit inutile, vel ei, cui promissum sit, vel ei, qui promiserit. Nam si, ut in fabulis est, Neptuneus, quod Theſeus promiserat, non fecisset, Theſeus filio Hippolyto non esset orbatus. Ex tribus enim optatis, ut scribitur, hoc erat tertium, quod de Hippolyti interitu iratus optavit. (See Eurip. Hippolyt. c. 1315, &c.) quo impetravit, in maximos luctus incidit. Nec promissa igitur servanda sunt ea, quæ sint iis, quibus promiseris, inutilia, nec si plus tibi noceant, quam illi prosint, cui promiseris. Contra officium est majus non anteponi minori, ut si constitueris te cuiquam advocatum in rem præsentem esse venturum, atque interim graviter ægrotare filius cæperit, non sit contra officium, non facere, quod dixeris, magisque ille cui promissum sit, ab officio discedat, si se destitutum queratur. Cicero de Offic. Lib. 1. c. 10. Si quis medicamentum cuiquam dederis ad aquam intercutem, pepigeritque ne illo medicamento unquam postea uteretur, si eo medicamento sanus factus fuerit, & annis aliquot post incidit in eundem morbum, nec ab eo quicum pepigerat impetret, ut item eo liceat uti, Quid faciendum sit? Cum is sit inhumanus, qui non concedat uti, nec ei quicumque fiat injuria, vitæ & salutis consulendum. Ib. Lib. 3. c. 24. where there are also some other Examples.*

² Mr. Thomasius thinks that the People were befotted when they believed the Crowns should be of that weight; but on the other hand, that the Emperor mocked his Subjects by giving his Promise such a strait Interpretation, which look'd like a Trick. There was really cause to believe that the Crowns promised by the Emperor were not Crowns made of Dough.

—Tuus, O Regina, quid optes,
 Explorare labor; mihi iussa capessere fas est.
 Æn. 1. v. 80, 81.

—Great Queen, be pleas'd to say
 The thing you wish: my Duty's to obey.

Here the Goddess had been uncivil, should she have taken Advantage of his general Compliment. Words of this Nature then, how ever seriously deliver'd, oblige a Man to no certain Performance; but only serve to testify his hearty Respect and kind Inclination towards another^a. But those Promises by which we empower another to expect some particular and determinate Service from us, ought most strictly to be fulfill'd, because the other Party building on our Word has adjusted his Affairs accordingly. So, though there now and then happens an Instance of a vain Prodigal, who should have been put under Government for a Fool, or a Madman, that ruins himself by profuse and inconsiderate Engagements, this ought to be no Reason why we should affirm all verbal Obligations to be invalid, and banish them from the use of human Life: As we don't condemn Suretyship in general, though many have suffer'd so severely by it. Upon the whole, since an express Promise passes into a Debt, Men ought to be very cautious of engaging for more than they are able to compass. And 'tis not Modesty, but a vicious Weakness in any Person to be so easy and tender, that he dares not deny the most impudent and unreasonable Petitioner^b.

XI. What Comnanus alleges more in defence of his Opinion, may be solv'd with little Difficulty: he says, "'Tis fit that some things should be left to every Man's Honesty and free Bounty, and that all Matters should not be reduced to the Rigor and Necessity of strict Obligation. That the study of Integrity and Constancy would improve amongst Mankind, were there but a Field left for those Virtues to exert and exercise themselves in; which is hardly possible, if Men are compell'd to observe all the Promises they make. But that otherwise it was a great and glorious thing to perform, what by Words or other Signs you shew'd your Intention of doing; and so much the more glorious, the less it seem'd constrain'd. But indeed there is still left scope enough for Liberality, though you give a Man a Right of demanding somewhat from you, which at first you might have securely denied him.

And since there must needs pass such a mighty number of Promises amongst Men, whilst they continually want the Assistance of each other, it is more for the Interest of human Affairs, that there should be less Glory in the Act of keeping Faith, than that so many Persons should be deluded by other Mens Inconstancy and Irresolution. The Law of Nature commands us to lend to another, so far as we can do it without any considerable Prejudice to our selves. But the Obligation is rendered more strict and binding, if by our own free Offer we reduce this general and unlimited Injunction of Nature to a particular Engagement, and assure the Party that he may expect for certain it shall be fulfill'd. So that this Argument is plainly false, If I had not promis'd, it had been nevertheless the Duty of a just and good Man to relieve the Indigence of others; therefore it is laudable to stand to Promises, not because we have bound our selves by giving our Word, but because the Party is in real want of our Succour.

He is willing to grant thus much, That if a Man by breaking his Promise, has caus'd the other Party to suffer Damages (who for instance might depend perhaps on his Word, and so neglect to provide for his own Necessities) that in this case he should be bound to make good the Loss sustained. And from this Concession we may as fairly infer, That Promises may be challeng'd, and that we stand oblig'd to perform them, lest we prejudice the Persons to whom they were directed. But it is very dangerous to draw thence such Consequences as these; That when you would not be in a worse Condition, should I break my Promise, than you was before I made it, I may then have liberty of revoking it; supposing that nothing has yet been done towards the Performance. And it is more against Nature for you to require me to make good this Engagement against my Will for your Gain and Benefit, than it would be for me to recal it without your Detriment. For the Duty of Humanity is not fulfill'd by your not hurting another; but you ought as far as you are able positively to advance his Good. Therefore when you have peculiarly engaged your self to such a kind Performance on his behalf, to repent of your Design only with this Consideration, That he is not like to be the worse for your Inconstancy, looks as if it were a thing not worth a Man's Regard to improve the Condition of his Neighbour. The Case then is the same with these verbal Promises as with those Pacts which have receiv'd the farther Confirmation of some Deed between the Parties; and no one will pretend that we may run from those, when we see that our change of Mind will not render the other Person's Condition worse, but only negatively, not better. Besides, as Grotius well observes from this Opinion of Comnanus, taken in so gross and general a manner as he expresses it, 'twill follow, That Articles of Agreement made between the Princes and the People of different Nations, so long as nothing has yet been perform'd on either side, are invalid; and especially in such places where no particular forms of Leagues or Covenants have been receiv'd into Use. And were this true, a general Diffidence and Jealousy must reign amongst Mankind, and no one must believe another any farther than he can see him. Which close and immediate way of transacting the Condition and Circumstances of many Men will not admit of; who may nevertheless have occasion to settle Business with each other.

Plutarch also in Brutus relates it thus, Τὸ ἄπὸ τῆς ἀναγκῆς ἀποκρίνοντες ἡλικίαν ἢ τῆσαν, &c. It is unbecoming a great Man to yield to impudent Petitioners. Brutus used to say, They do not seem to have employed their Youth well, who are not able to deny any thing.

The last Argument of Connanus taken from the Practice of the Roman Courts of Law, which granted an Action only upon such Promises as were confirm'd by Stipulation, is easily answer'd by observing, That the Reason of this Caution in the Civil Law was not because serious Promises do not bind by the meer Law of Nature; but that the Ceremony of these solemn² Forms might put Men on considering thoroughly, whether it was expedient for them to enter into a Promise, which it would be impossible afterwards to revoke. As likewise, that the things promis'd might by this means be express'd more punctually and plainly, lest any Obscurity in that respect might give occasion to future Cavils and Disputes³.

¹ See Lib. 5. c. 2. §. 3. following. But Mr. Thomasius maintains, nevertheless, that they that establish'd these Forms among the Romans, had such Designs as tended more to advance their private Interest, than the publick Good. The Patricians labour'd by this means to keep the People in a Dependence upon them, and by making the Laws obscure, interpreted them as they pleased, and by multiplying Forms of Law without end, opened a large Field for Contentions and Divisions. This Pomponius the Lawyer tells us plainly in a Fragment preserved in the Digests. *Deinde ex his Legibus [duodecim tabularum] eodem tempore fere actiones composita sunt, quibus inter se homines disceptarent; quas actiones, ne Populus prout vellet institueret, certas solennesque esse voluerunt, &c. Et quidem ex omnibus qui scientiam [Juris civilis] nati sunt, ante Tiberiam Coruncanium (He was the first of the People that arrived at the Dignity of Pontifex Maximus, i. e. the High-Priest) publicè professum neminem traditur, ceteri autem ad hunc vel in latenti jus civile retinere cogitabant, solumque consultoribus [vacare] potius, quam discere volentibus præstabant, Lib. 1. SINCE the regular Effect of Pacts and Promises is to abridge and restrain our Liberty, and to lay on us the Burthen of necessarily doing such or such a thing, which before we might have perform'd or omitted at our pleasure; there can be no better Argument to hinder a Man from complaining of this Burthen, than to alledge, That he took it upon him by his own free Will and Consent, when he had full Power to refuse it¹.

II. This Consent is usually declared by express Signs, as by Speaking, Writing, Nodding, &c. Yet sometimes, without the help of any such Tokens, it is sufficiently gather'd from the Nature and Circumstance of the Business². And it is well known that³ Silence it self, in many Cases, is interpreted for Consent. Thus to be silent, is to own your Crime, Euripid. Iphigen. in Aulid. v. 1142. vid. D. L. l. Tit. 17. But in all these Exceptions it is strictly required, That the State and Condition of Affairs be such as shall on every side conspire to ground the Presumption; and that not so much as one probable Conjecture appear to the contrary. For otherwise it would be very hard Measure to put a Man under Obligation, upon any little Hint or Symptom of Agreement. And thus we see wherein the proper Nature of tacit Pact consists; that it happens, when we express not our Consent by the Signs generally made use of in human Commerce and Transactions; but leave it to be suppos'd from the Business it self, and from the

Circumstances that attend it ³. What we most commonly meet with of this kind is, That when some principal and leading Contract has been entred upon by express Agreement, some other tacit Pact is included in it, or flows from it, as we cannot but apprehend upon considering the Nature of the Affair. In the same manner most Covenants leave some slight Exceptions and Conditions to be understood. But we must have a care of stretching these Indulgences any farther than is well consistent with the carrying on of Trade and Business in the World, lest they should prove of ill Consequence to the Validity of Contracts, by rendering them too slippery and uncertain.

Of Tacit Pacts, it may not be amiss to offer these few Instances: A Stranger comes into a State where Foreigners are treated with great Civility, and he comes in a friendly manner here; though he does not expressly swear Fealty to the Government, yet he is suppos'd by the very Act of his coming, tacitly to have engaged, That according to his Rank and Condition, he will conform to every Law of the Place, so soon as he shall understand that such a Law was designed to reach all manner of Persons who should abide in those Territories. And on the other side, the Government tacitly engages to grant him Security and Protection, and the Benefits of publick Justice.

A Man is abroad at a distance from his Family and his Concerns, in the mean time a Neighbour without particular Orders, transacts some Business for him; here again we must suppose a tacit Pact, by virtue of which the one having lent his free Assistance and Service, the other is bound to requite the Pains, and to refund the Charge. In as much as it may be fairly presum'd ⁴, That had the absent Party known how Affairs stood, he would readily have consented to the whole Management.

A Guest sits down to a Table at a publick House; and though he has not exchange'd a Word with the Host about the Price of his Dinner, yet by the bare Act of sitting down to eat, he is suppos'd to consent to the Payment of his Scot; since all know that this is not a Place where Men are treated for nothing.

In like manner, the Obligation between a Guardian and his Ward ⁵ has its Rise from a tacit Contract ⁶.

As for those tacit Pacts which we observ'd to flow from principal Contracts, and which we may call Accessory, these Examples will shew the Nature and the Manner of them. A Man that bargains with another to have free Ingress to a Place ⁶, is suppos'd at the same time to obtain Liberty of Regress from it, though this be not expressly mentioned; because otherwise the former Agreement would be to no purpose. A Prince or Magistrate, who by Covenant gives leave to Strangers to frequent his Markets, is suppos'd to consent likewise, That they shall carry home the Goods they purchase there. As on the contrary, it would be most ridiculous Madness for me, supposing I have sold a Field to another, to deny him the Liberty of possessing it here, and to desire he would translate it to another place. In the same manner, he who lets out a Chamber to hire, is suppos'd to consent withal, that the Lodger shall make use of such other parts of the House, as he cannot be without; as of the Doors, Entries, and the like; at least so far as to have free Access to his Apartment, and free Passage from it.

Instances of tacit Exceptions and Conditions are so frequent, that 'tis not necessary to set down any in particular. But we must observe this of them in general, That they were ever to be interpreted with the greatest Strictness and Severity of Judgment; and that they will hold good no farther than it appears from very sure Grounds and Presumptions, that they were consented to by the Parties whom they concern. Add. D. xxii. tit. 3. de Probation. & Præsumptionib. Leg. xxiv. For otherwise it would be easy to thrust a troublesome Obligation upon a Man against his Will. And were too great a Licence given to these secret and implied Reserves, there is scarce any Covenant, which might not be either annull'd or evaded ⁷.

³ A tacit Consent properly arises from certain things done, or omitted on purpose; but yet of themselves do not imply directly an Approbation of the thing that is doing. Further, we distinguish a presumptive or supposed Consent, as the Roman Lawyers speak, which consisteth in this, That tho' a person be absolutely ignorant of what passes, and consequently could neither indirectly nor directly agree to it, yet we suppose he acquiesces in it, because we believe, That if he knew it, he would freely consent, or at least that he ought so to do by the Maxims of Natural Equity: But this sort of Consent is of no use nor necessity in Civil Life; and the Lawyers invented it only to found certain Obligations upon, for which they could not see any true Principles. If we consider this Matter well, we shall find that what they refer to a presumptive or supposed Consent, may easily be deduced, either from a tacit Consent, properly so called, or from the necessary Duties of Society, without any other Consent. And hence it is, that Terms tacit and presumptive are often used one for another in this Case. Our Author distinguishes neither the Terms nor Notions, as appears from the Examples he alleges of them that do another's Business in his Absence from his Family, and of those who take upon them a Guardianship. Titius's Observ. on Pufendorf, 205, 206. and in Compend. Lauterbach, Obsere. 56. See l. 4. c. 13. §. 5. Note 11. We may also find some very good Remarks upon this Distinction of a tacit and presumptive Consent in Mr. Thomasius's Instit. Jurisprud. Divin. l. 2. c. 7. §. 19, &c. whose Notions, tho' they seem different, may easily be made to agree with our Author's, which I have recited and represented in my manner. See also Mr. Thomasius's Discourse, entitled, Philosophia Juris de Obligationibus & Actionibus, which is the third among his Disputations at Leipsick, c. 2. §. 132, &c.

^a Add Grot. l. 3. c. 24. See what we shall say hereafter in Book 4. c. 4. f. 15. ^b The Roman Lawyers give this Instance of a tacit Pact in l. 2. tit. 14. D. de Pactis, leg. 2. If I restore to my Debtor his Bond or Caution, it should seem there is a tacit Agreement between us, that I demand not the Loan. Yet here according to the Simplicity of Natural Law, there appears to be no occasion of introducing a tacit Pact, since it is much plainer to say, That by the returning back the Caution the Debt is suppos'd to be forgiven, and consequently no room left for an Action upon it. But that the Civil Law chose this round-about way of proceeding, was the effect of Caution, lest an Obligation really contracted should seem to be cancell'd by bare Consent. Another Example they produce, and say, Suppose that in a Lease of a Farm there be this Clause, That in case the Farmer does not till the Ground as he ought, the Proprietor may let it to another: Must it not be meant, That the Farmer is obliged not to damage the Land, in consideration that the Lands are Lett at a low price? But on the contrary, if it happens to be Lett at an higher price, 'tis for the advantage of the Proprietor; because there seems to have been a tacit Agreement between them, that no advantage should come thereby to the Farmer. Digest. l. 19. tit. 2. Locati, conducti, leg. 51. in the beginning, Et Lege fundum locavi, ut si

III. To make a Man capable of 'giving a serious and firm Consent, 'tis above all things necessary that he be master of his Reason, so far as to understand the Business in hand, to know whether it be convenient for him, and whether he have Strength and Ability to perform it; and when he has well consider'd these Points, to be able to express his Agreement by sufficient Indications. Hence it follows, that the Promises of Infants², of Madmen, and of Ideots³, are utterly invalid. But as to the Case of Madness, it is particularly to be observ'd, that this does not render a Man's Actions null and void in moral Esteem, any longer than during the actual Continuance of it. But so long as he enjoys lucid Intervals of Sense, there's nothing hinders why he should not be able effectually to oblige himself for such time as the Distemper allows him the use of his Reason. Yet the Fit returning suspends his Power of contracting or of performing any Business, till he again recover the Government of himself and of his Actions. Therefore the common Maxim in the Civil Law, That Madness coming upon a Man destroys not any Business which he had before duly perform'd, is to be understood of such Actions or Concerns as can be completed and dispatch'd at once. Of this kind is a *Will or Testament*⁴, which being once rightly made, stands good; unless it be revoked by a sufficient Declaration to the contrary; such as a distracted Person cannot give. But in case a Man lies under such an Obligation as is to be fulfill'd by distant Acts, all requiring the use of Reason, it is plain that if he fall into Distraction, the Duty is thereby suspended. Thus if a Person bargain with me to work at my Affairs for a certain time; if he happen to be seiz'd with a Phrensy, the Obligation expires, in as much as he is now incapable of making it good. Although indeed, in hopes that a Person in this Condition may recover his Health, we usually suppose him still to have inherent in him all his former Obligations, Powers, and Rights, the charge of exercising which is for a time committed to others. But if the Madness be judg'd incu-nable, the Person is in all legal and moral Consideration to be accounted *Dead*⁵. Vid. Dig. l. I. tit. 6. De his qui sui vel al. jur. sunt. Leg. viii. tit. 18. De Offic. Præsid. Leg. xiv. & l. iii. tit. 3. De Procurat. & Defensor. Leg. ii. & l. ix. tit. 2. Ad leg. Aquilian. leg. v. f. 2.

IV. Farther¹, since the use of Reason is exceedingly hindered, and sometimes entirely oppress'd by Drunkenness, it is an usual Question, Whether a Person under that Disorder can bind himself by any Covenant or Promise? Which we think ought to be decided in the Negative, in case the Intemperance were so great, as entirely to drown and overwhelm the Understanding. For it can by no means be esteem'd a real and deliberate Consent, if a Man should with never so much Eagerness of Inclination run into an Engagement, and express his Agreement by Signs which would at other Times be valid, whilst his Mind lies as it were under a stupifying Charm, and he is bewitch'd out of his Reason. It would indeed be highly impudent for a Person to challenge the Observance of such a Promise, especially if it could not be perform'd without considerable Burthen or Trouble. And if it farther appear, that he purposely took advantage of the other Man's Weakness, and cunningly drew him into an Engagement under that Distemper of his Brain, he stands liable to be punish'd as an arrant Cheat. But when a Man, after the drunken Fit is over, shall upon being put in mind of his Promise, acknowledge and confirm it; it shall then be Obligatory, yet not by virtue of what pass'd when he was drunk, but of what he since did when he was sober². Yet the Merriment of a cheerful Cup, which rather revives the Spirits, than stupifies the Reason, is no hindrance to the contracting of just Obligations; especially if they be afterwards renew'd at more sober Seasons. To this purpose, the account which Tacitus, De Mor. Germ. c. 22. gives us of the old Germans is very remarkable. 'Tis at their Entertainments, says he, that they commonly make up Differences, contract Alliances, choose Princes, and non ex Lege coleretur, relocare cum mihi liceret, & quo minoris locassem, hoc mihi præstaretur (nec convenit, ut si pluris locassem, hoc tibi præstaretur) videtur autem in hac specie id silentio convenisse, nequid præstaretur, si ampliore pecunia fundus esset locatus, (i. e.) ut hæc ex conventionem pro locatore tantummodo interponeretur. But yet in the Case propos'd, without supposing any such feign'd Agreement, it is more natural to affirm, that the Conditions on which this kind of Contract was founded, cannot be extended so far as to benefit the Hirer, who is indeed worthy of no manner of Favour, in as much as he hath neglected to cultivate his Land according to Bargain. MR. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on §. IV.

² 'Tis a general Rule, that such Agreements as are null upon account of some Incapacity of the Persons making them, may become valid, if that Incapacity ceases, and the Person approves or ratifies the said Agreement. So if a Minor, being come to Age, ratifies or executes a Contract which he made in his Minority, it becomes as irrevocable as if it were made after he came of Age. See Digest. l. 26. tit. 8. De Autoritate & Consensu Tutorum & Curatorum, leg. 5. §. 2. & Cod. l. 2. tit. 46. Si major factus ratio habuerit. See also what our Author speaks §. 14. in this Chapter, and what I have said in my Treatise of Sports, l. 2. c. 1. §. 7.

in fine dispatch most Affairs of Peace and War. They think no time so proper as this, because the generous Heat of the Liquor, as it opens their Hearts, and takes off all Disguise from their Thoughts, so it inspires them with brave Resolutions and hardy Attempts. They are Strangers to Craft and Dissimulation, and the Liberty of the Table gets out all they know, and all they design. But the settling and finishing of Business is left to the next Day, when their Minds are closed, and their Judgments grown cool. Thus they make the right Use of each Time; they consult whilst they cannot dissemble, and they resolve when they cannot mistake. The like is reported of the Persians by Herodot. in Clio, l. i. c. 133. Athenæus, l. iv. c. 10. Curtius, l. vii. c. 4. Add. Plutarch Sympof. Quest. l. vii. c. 9, & 10. 3.

It is true indeed, that Faults committed in Drunkenness are not on that account excusable 4. Legislators have then thought fit to punish even Ignorance, when the Person is the cause of his own Ignorance. And therefore a double Penalty is usually enacted against drunken Offenders. For here the Excess, and consequently the Ignorance, was of the Man's own procuring, it being in his Power to avoid them. Aristot. Ethic. l. i. c. 5. l. 10. It was one of Solon's Laws, That a Governor taken in Drunkenness should be put to Death; and Pittacus decreed, that a Fault committed under this Disorder should have a twofold Punishment. Laert. l. i. in Pittac. Because, though a Person whilst the fit is on him knows not, perhaps, what he does, yet in as much as he voluntarily applied himself to the use of such Things as he knew would cast a Cloud on his Understanding, he is supposed to have yielded Consent to all the Effects of that Disorder. Yet it will not follow from this Consideration, that the Promises of drunken Men are Obligatory; because there is great difference between committing a Crime, and contracting an Obligation. For since there lies an absolute Prohibition against all Sin, therefore Men are to avoid all Occasions that may probably draw them into a Violation of their Duty. And how many Enormities Drunkenness betrays a Man to, is obvious to the meanest Apprehension. An Action then in itself sinful, can by no means lose that Character by proceeding from another Sin which led and disposed a Man to it. But on the other hand, since it is left to our free Pleasure, whether we will contract new Obligations, or no, we are not (as in the other Case) bound to avoid all Occasions which may render our Consent imperfect and invalid. As we are not bound to decline Sleeping, out of a Fear that others should interpret our 1 Nodding or Winking for a Token of Agreement to somewhat which they proposed. To this purpose, Sueton tells us a jesting piece of Knavery in Caligula. He made an Auction of his superfluous Gladiators; and as the Cryer was performing the Sale, Aponius Saturninus, a Gentleman of the Pretorian Dignity, happening to sleep upon one of the Benches, the Emperor commanded the Cryer to take notice of the worthy Chapman that nodded * to the Price proposed. And the Business was so managed, that the poor Gentleman had laid out ninety thousand Sesterces before he knew a Word of his Bargain. Vit. Calig. Chap. 38. Therefore if Drunkenness had no other ill Effect, but that it made a Man seem to give some Indications, which at another time would imply Consent, it would not on this bare Account be esteem'd unlawful. And since a Man cannot contract an Obligation by Promise or Pact, without agreeing to it, and at the same time understanding the Business, we cannot infer his Consent to such an Engagement from his first consenting to make use of a Thing, which would probably hinder the Exercise of his Reason. Especially, if we consider, that Men seldom drink merely for the sake of stupifying their Brain, but their general Design is to comfort and cheer up their Spirits; and the former Effect steals upon them almost insensibly, whilst they unwarily prosecute the latter. To make the Difference appear more manifestly, we may add, that since the Property of a Crime or Offence is to bring some Evil upon some Man, and of a Promise to bring him some Good, which before was not his due, and since to be positively hurt, or injured, is more odious in the eyes of common Justice, than barely not to acquire some Benefit, there is much more reason why Drunkenness should invalidate a Promise, than why it should cancel a Transgression. As for a Man's being bound to pay for that useless load of Wine which he pours down, after his Stomach is already overcharg'd, and which he would refuse, were he in his Senses; this Obligation arises from the Contract made at the first sitting down, by which he engaged himself to give the Price of whatever he should drink, though he drank it to no purpose. If during this Fit of sottish Extravagance he be guilty of any mischievous Frolicks, as throwing away the Liquor, destroying the Vessels, or the Windows, and the like, he stands bound to make Satisfaction by the general Law of Reparation of Damages.

V. How 1 long Children continue under such a Weakness of Reason, as renders them incapable of contracting Obligations, we cannot universally determine; in as much as some arrive at a Maturity of Judgment sooner than others. Therefore in settling this Point, regard is to be had to the daily Actions and Proceedings of the Persons, from whence the best Conjectures are to be made about their Understanding; or commonly we have recourse to the positive Laws of the Country; all States almost having fix'd this Period by their particular Constitutions, and sooner or later 2, according as they found their People to be naturally more brisk and apprehensive, or more sluggish and heavy. Amongst the Jews, a young Man might ob-

4 Some Nations inflicted a double Punishment upon such as had committed any Crime in their drink; and by one of Solon's Laws it was enacted, if a Ruler or Magistrate were found drunk, he should be put to Death. lige himself by Promise after thirteen Years of Age, and a young Woman after twelve. But because Persons of tender Age, though they may sometimes tolerably understand Business, yet for the most part act with too much Vehemence and Rashness, are too free and easy in their Promises, eager and over-confident in their Hopes, proud of being thought generous and liberal, ambitious and hasty in contracting Friendships, and not furnish'd with prudent Caution and Diffidence, it has been wisely order'd in most Commonwealths, That in contracting all Obligations³ they shall be sway'd by the Authority of graver Heads; till such time as their Rashness and Heat of Youth shall appear in a good measure to be abated. Hence in some Places, whatsoever they do in their own Names, during their Minority, is declar'd null and void; in others, if they have been cozen'd or over-reach'd, they are allow'd to recover full Satisfaction⁴. Vid. l. xi. f. 3, &c. l. xxiv. f. 1. l. xlv. D. de Minoribus. The Law of Nature itself plainly directs, that these Provisions should be made by positive Constitutions. Especially since he would justly forfeit the Character of his Honesty, who should make his Advantage upon this easy Age, and enrich himself at the Cost of those, who for want of Judgment and Experience, either could not foresee, or do not rightly apprehend the Loss⁵. The same Law of Nature enjoins, that when any Statutes or Customs of this kind have been establish'd in a Commonwealth, they shall be strictly observ'd; not only by the Subjects amongst themselves, but in all their Tran-

actions with Foreigners. Not so much as (as Grotius says in B. ii. c. 11. §. 5.) because he who enters into Contract in any Place, is during that Affair, bound by the Laws of the Country as a kind of temporary Subject, as because no State will admit of an Action in its Courts of Justice, upon a Business not conformable to its Constitutions, unless it has particularly declared, that in judging the Causes of Strangers the bare Law of Nature shall be followed. The same is to be said of Contracts made by Letter, between the Subjects of different States, when upon Default, either of them sues the other in the Courts of his own Country. For though here the injured Party may not have made himself, so much as for a time, a Subject of the other Commonwealth; yet, if he desires Redress by its Assistance, he must submit his Case to the standing Laws⁷: Or supposing two Subjects of the same Nation shall enter into a Pact or Promise, in some place which acknowledges no Sovereign, as on the wide Ocean, or in some Desert Island, they must nevertheless have recourse to the Laws of their Country, if they would obtain a full and perfect Right to what they bargain'd for; or an Action to hold good in Court upon Failure on either side. How the Case stands with Reference to the Acts of those Persons who are placed above the Power of civil Laws, it will be our Business elsewhere to enquire⁸.

VI. Another thing which invalidates Consent, and by Consequence the Promises or Pacts that are built upon it, is Error or Mistake²; through which it comes to pass, that the Understanding is

⁴ The Law grants this Privilege to him who hath been injured by any Act, as a Party to it, to look back to the Age he was of before that Act, if there be a just Cause. See Digest. l. 4. tit. 1. and what Mr. Horrius says upon that Title in his Observat. in Compend. Juris Lauterbach, where he carefully distinguishes the Maxims which may be drawn from natural Right from the Subtilties which the Roman Lawyers have perplexed the Matter with. See also Daumal's Civil Laws, Part 1. l. 4. tit. 6.

⁵ We ought to observe (as Mr. Placcette speaks in his Treatise of Conscience, p. 60.) That if, for Example, we meet with such a dull understanding at the Age assigned by the Law, that there is not Sense enough to oblige them sufficiently, we ought not to play upon their Simplicity, and engage them to do what we please upon that Pretence. Doubtless such an Action would be unjust; and in this case we ought to say, as in many others, We ought to attend more to the Intention of the Law, than the Terms. But here is another important Question to be examined into, and that's this, Whether if a Young Man engages himself before he arrives at the Age fixed by the Law, he is bound in Conscience to do what he has promised? For Example, If he has borrowed any thing before that Age, is he bound to pay it when he comes to it? Mr. Placcette seems to have determined this Question very well in these Words, The Casuists of the Church of Rome, even the strictest of them, answer by this Distinction, If the young Man has made a good use of what he borrowed, and in general, if the Agreement he has made be profitable and advantageous to him, he is obliged to stand to it; but he is not obliged, if he hath got nothing by the Bargain, viz. if he has spent what he borrowed upon his Debaucheries, and other Excesses. But Mr. La Placcette adds, This is not my Opinion, and says, I can't allow, that a Man should get by an ill Action, and free himself from his Engagement by a Fault. We may have regard to other things, and in the first Place consider whether he with whom we have contracted loseth any thing otherwise by the breaking the Bargain. For if he loseth nothing, but all the Damage he suffers, is only, that his Hopes are disappointed, I believe we are not obliged to make good the Promise we have made in that manner without any ill Design. Did he foresee the ill use that was likely to be made of what he lent? If he did foresee it, and did lend with an evil Intention, he ought to lose what he lent, and impute the Loss to himself; but if he had no ill Design, and lent freely, 'tis my Opinion he ought to be paid; and I am persuaded, to do the contrary, and take the Advantage of the Law, is a Fault, which not only a tender Conscience, but an honest Man in the Esteem of the World, ought to be ashamed of. See my Treatise of Sports, l. 2. c. 4. §. 12. and what this Author says, l. 4. c. 2. §. 11. following.

⁶ Mr. Hertius in his Treatise, De Collisione Legum, which is in Tom. 1. of his Comments and small Tracts, proves at large, that we often judge according to the Laws of another State, when we have made an Agreement, either where the thing of which we have treated is found to be, or where one of the Parties has his Dwelling.

⁷ Grotius is of Opinion, l. 2. c. 11. §. 5. numb. 3. that in this Case we ought to judge only according to the Rules of natural Right; and Mr. Hertius agrees to his Opinion. See the fore-mentioned Discourse, §. 56. and another of the same Volume De Comœatu Literarum, §. 16, &c.

⁸ See l. 8. c. 10.

cheated in its Object, and the Will in its Choice and Approbation. We ought here carefully to distinguish, whether the Case relate to a Promise, or to a Paët. As for Promises, we may lay down this for a certain Rule, that if a Promise be grounded upon Belief and Presumption of some Fact³ which really never was, or when in making an Engagement of this kind I supposed such an Action, or such a Quality, without regard to which I should never have given my Consent; in this Case my Promise is naturally null and void; provided it appear evident from the Nature and Circumstances of the Business, that I agreed to the Proposal purely on account of that Fact, or of that Quality, which I took for granted. Because, here I did not promise absolutely, but upon Presumption of a necessary Condition; which Condition failing, whatever was built upon it, must consequently come to nothing⁴. Thus, for Instance, suppose I have been inform'd that you have done me a Kindness in promoting and well-ordering my Affairs, and upon this score I have promis'd you a Gratification; you will not say I am bound to stand to my Word⁵, when I find the Intelligence was absolutely false. By the same Rule we may decide the Case proposed by Cicero in Lib. i. De Oratore, c. 38. "A false Report was brought home of the Death of a certain Soldier abroad in the Wars. His Father believing the Story, alter'd his Will in favour of another Heir, and afterwards died. The Soldier at last returning safe, sues the Possessor of his Inheritance." It was here urged for the Plaintiff, that the Civil Law declares such Wills of a Father to be null⁶, in which the Son is neither made Heir, nor yet particularly, and by Name, disinherited; neither of which was done in the Will now under Consideration. But to this the Defendant might have return'd, that the Law cited on the other side plainly supposed that the Father knew his Son to be living, which here he knew not, but imagin'd the quite contrary. Therefore it might perhaps have been a more clear and easy Way of asserting the Soldier's Title, to proceed only upon the Law of Nature, and to alledge, that the Father's Will was grounded upon Supposition of his Son's Death, which proving false, the Will became void and ineffectual; since it appears that his belief of that Report was the sole Reason of his altering his Measures. And hence too it is easy to answer that over-nice Question of Sir Thomas Browne in his Religio Medici; Whether it was lawful for the Person whom Lazarus had made his Heir to possess the Goods? or whether the Owner upon his being restored to Life, had not a Right to challenge them again? Where the latter must without doubt be affirm'd. For the reason why the Goods of the Deceas'd pass away to others is, because they themselves are taken out of the World, and consequently have no farther need of these Possessions. Hence in many places, some part of the Goods are set aside to be given to the Poor, or to the Church for the Benefit of the Soul of the Deceas'd. And in the Pagan Superstition, it is usual to bury or burn some of the Goods with the dead Body, for the Service of another Life.

But in case the Promiser was negligent in searching into, and examining the Condition upon which he built his Consent, he shall be bound to repair any Damage that is sustain'd by the other Party, upon account of his idle Engagement.

If the Promise was not grounded upon the Presence or Absence of such a Quality, as a necessary Condition, then tho' the Promiser was mistaken in that Point, yet his Obligation shall stand good. If the Promise were but in part occasion'd by an Error, it may as to the rest of it remain valid; unless one Part were included by way of Condition in another; or unless the Parts cannot separately be perform'd; for then an Error in part destroys the whole.

VII. As for Mistakes in Paëts, it seems necessary to distinguish whether the Person was thro' Error drawn into the Bargain, or whether there proves to be an Error as to the Thing or Subject for which he bargain'd. In the former Case we should again enquire, whether any Step is made towards Performance, or not. If I am prevail'd with to enter into a Paët or Contract upon Mistake, and I find this Mistake out, before any thing is done in order to the fulfilling of the Agreement, it is but equi-

table, that I should have liberty to retract; especially if upon making the Engagement, I plainly declared the Reason of my Proceedings¹. But if the Error be not discover'd till the Paët is either wholly or in part perform'd, then the Person who lay under the Mistake, cannot demand a Releasement any farther than the other shall, upon a Principle of Humanity, be content to allow him². For instance, a Man being at a Distance from home, receives false Intelligence, that he has lost all his Horses. Upon this Information he enters into Contract for the Purchase of new ones; but before the Money or the Horses are deliver'd, he finds himself to have been deceiv'd in the former News. Here we judge he is not bound to fulfil the Bargain, inasmuch as the Seller very well knows, that the false Account of his Misfortune at home was the Reason of his Purchase. Yet he is in Equity obliged to make some Consideration to the Seller; at least to repay the Damage which he sustains by losing the Bargain. But in case the Money and Horses were on both sides deliver'd, tho' the Buyer should now find that he has no occasion for his Purchase, yet he cannot force the Seller to refund the Price, and to take back his Horses, unless this Condition was expressly mention'd in the Agreement.

But when there happens to be a mistake about the Thing which is the Subject of the Contract, then the Business is null; not so much upon account of the Mistake³, as because the Laws and Terms of the Agreement are not really fulfill'd. Inasmuch as in all Bargains the Matter, about which they are concern'd, and all the Qualities of it, good or bad, ought to be clearly understood, and without such a distinct Knowledge the Parties cannot be supposed to yield a full Consent. And therefore upon discovery of any Defect, the Person who was likely to suffer may either draw back from the Engagement, or may compel the other to supply what is wanting⁴; and likewise to make Satisfaction for Damage, if occasion'd by his Deceit or Default. And this, not only if the Defect be immediately found out, but if it appear at some Distance of Time. Which Period or Interval, when it is not fix'd

Mr. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on §. VII.

² The Author is not consistent with himself here. For, if in the first Case there is any good Reason to excuse him who has made a mistake, so that he may lawfully retract, why should not the same Reason be good in the second Case? [The delivering of a thing consider'd in itself is a Physical Act, which can't deprive him of his Right, who has it; nor give it to him that has none. Whence it comes to pass, that when one hath paid what he ought not, he has not less Right to require again what he has done, than if he had forgiven him that which he had not deliver'd. See Mr. Thomasius's Jurisprud. Divin. l. 2. c. 7. §. 45, 46.] Further, if in the first Case we have Right to recant, how are we obliged to repair the Damage? The truth is, in both Cases we are indispensibly obliged to keep our Word. For if the Error be invincible, 'tis nevertheless only concomitant (see l. 1. c. 3. §. 10. Note 2.) and consequently does not exclude a necessary Consent in our Agreements. In fine, this Reason obliges us to conclude, that the Price doth not at all influence the Engagement farther than as it is an Indication of our manner of Dealing, and can't be formally inserted into it as a Condition to render it null, so that the Error which is committed thereupon can have no manner of Effect as to the Validity of the Contract. The Roman Lawyers own the Truth of this Principle in a like Case, I mean, in the Subject of a Delegation made thro' mistake. See Digest. l. 46. tit. 2. De Novationibus & Delegationibus, Leg. 12, 13. The same thing has place in an Onerous Contract. For example, in a Bargain of Sale, when there is a Mistake, as to the Person with whom we treat, taking him for another. For this is only an Error concomitant, having nothing in the Contract which necessarily requires that he with whom we treat should be certainly such or such a Man, or at least that he should declare himself, and we should affirm, that we dealt only with Peter (for example) and no other. Most of the Interpreters of the Roman Laws do indeed quote some Laws, which seem to establish the contrary; but if we examine those Places, we shall find that they treat of some Act of Liberality or Service, or suppose in the Person dealt with some Care, Industry, or other particular Quality; for then 'tis essential to a Contract, that the Contractor be certainly he whom we believe him; inasmuch that if we are mistaken in that, the Error is efficacious. Titius Objerv. in Pufend. 214. and in Lauterbach. 513.

⁴ This is too much from the purpose. Something more exact ought to have been said to give us an Idea of the Effects of an efficacious Error. This Maxim may be added to those of our Author, If he that is mistaken aims at that chiefly wherein the Error lies, the Agreement is absolutely void, and he hath liberty to recant; but if he had not the thing itself in view, altho' he could heartily wish it had been what he believed it, the Agreement is good, and he can have a Right only to demand some Satisfaction for the Fault he overlook'd. As for example, if a Man in a great Necessity buys an House, which afterwards he finds to be subject to several Services, as he did not principally endeavour to have it free from all Services, that alone don't break the Bargain; but he may demand of the Seller, that he lessen the Price in proportion to the Inconvenience that those Services bring, with which he did not think the House was charged. It is very probable that the Roman Lawyers did follow this Principle in their Practice. Nevertheless the Determinations which we find in their Writings are neither accurate enough, nor consonant one with another, as this Reason will shew. That they may build the Efficaciousness of Error upon the Connection of the thing in which they are mistaken, with the Essence of a Bargain, they only consider the Natural Constitution of the thing in itself. Hence they distinguish the Error which hath for its Subject the Substance or Matter of a thing about which they treat, from that which falls only upon the Qualities of the thing. But here we are not examining what relation the Object of Error hath to the Matter of an Agreement, we only enquire upon what Foot the Bargainers consider'd it; and if it appear that they had only some certain Quality in view, 'tis the Error alone that respects that Quality, that can make the Bargain null, as much as if it fell upon the thing itself. Titius Objerv. in Pufend. 216. and in Lauterbach. 511. See Note 5. at the bottom of the following Page.

by the civil Laws, is to be determin'd by the Arbitration of some honest Referee; that no Indulgence may be given, either to the Fraud of the one Party in concealing, or to the supine Negligence of the other in examining the Business. And the larger Space of Time is to be allow'd, if the Defect were such as did not appear to external View, or could not be discover'd but by Men of extraordinary Sagacity and Skill.

As to that common Maxim with the Civilians, that an Error in the Essentials of a Pact dissolves the Agreement⁵, but not an Error in the Accidentals or Circumstances; we are so to interpret it, as by the Essentials to understand, not only what makes up the Physical Essence of the thing bargain'd for, but likewise those Qualities of it, to which the Contractor had an especial Eye and Regard⁶. For it frequently happens, that in a Bargain some Quality of the thing shall be chiefly esteem'd and valu'd, and the Substance or natural Constitution be only look'd on as a necessary Adjunct or Vehicle⁶. Thus my Contract will not only be void, if I buy such a particular Slave of a Merchant, and he sends me a different Person⁷; but likewise if I bargain'd with him for one skilful in the Art of Cookery, and the Man whom I receive proves utterly ignorant of the Business, and incapable of serving me in that Condition^b.

VIII. Much more ought a Mistake to render a Promise or Pact invalid, if it were occasion'd by the Fraud of one of the Parties, who by that means drew the other into the Engagement. What Force or Effect the Practice of Deceit in these Matters will bear, may be clearly stated by making these Enquiries; first, as to the Author of the Knavery, whether it be he with whom we bargain'd, or a third Person. And in the next place, whether the Deceit was really the Cause of our Engagement, without which we had not ventur'd upon it, or whether it was only accidental to the Business, which we had nevertheless undertaken, but were now cheated in the Thing and its Qualities, or the true Price and Value of them. If the Trick was put upon us by a third Man, the Party with whom we transact not having been accessory to it, and the Thing for which we bargain'd proves without Fault²; in this case the Agreement shall stand good³; but we may recover of the Knave whatever we lose by his contrivance. If the Party himself with whom I contract, by some Deceit draws

⁷ Vid. l. 18. Princ. D. de Contrah. emptione. Cicero (pro Q. Roscio, c. 10.) speaking of a Slave who was at the same time claim'd by Fannius and Roscio; What belong'd to Fannius? (says he) his Body; what to Roscio? his Activity. Not his Face but his Skill was valuable. The share which Roscio had in him was worth double to that which Fannius could challenge, &c.

MR. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on §. VIII.

¹ By Fraud (which the Civilians call Dolus malus, or Dolus only) is understood any sort of Surprize, Deceit, Craft, Cheat or Dissimulation. In a word, any corrupt Methods, direct or indirect, positive or negative, by which Men maliciously deceive others. For there are innocent Errors, as that of a Medicine, which instead of curing enrages the Distemper. Itaque ipse [Labeo] sic definiit, Dolum malum esse omnem calliditatem, fallaciam, machinationem ad circumveniendum, fallendum, decipiendum alterum adhibitam. Labeonis definitio vera est. Digest. l. 4. tit. 3. De Dolo malo, leg. 1. §. 2. Non fuit autem contentus Prætor DOLUM dicere, sed adiecit, MALUM, quoniam veteres dolum etiam bonum dicebant, & pro solertia hoc nomen accipiebant, &c. ibid. §. 3. See Mr. Noodt's Treatise De forma emendandi Doli mali, c. 1, & 2. In fine, tho' where there is a Fraud in the one Part, there is always an Error in the other; yet ordinarily the Invalidity of a Contract is entirely founded upon the evil Intention of the Contractors: For that Reason alone is in the main sufficient to make an Engagement void.

³ It being understood that the Motive which by the Deceit of a third Person, inclined us to promise or treat, hath a necessary Relation to the Foundation of the Engagement, i. e. that the Error is purely concomitant. For if (for example) any one makes me believe that all my Horses are dead, and I declare to him that sells me others, that I did not buy them, but upon this Supposition, that the News is true: The Moment that I discover the Falshood, the Bargain is void, by virtue of the Condition which was formerly mention'd, and the Seller is to take care of him that hath deceived me. See §. 7. Note 2. before-going.

me into the Business⁴, I am then free from all Obligation to performance⁵. If the Deceit were not antecedent to the Contract, but happen'd in it, with reference to the Thing bargain'd for, its Qualities, &c. the Agreement shall be so far void, as that it shall be at the pleasure of the suffering Party, either to reverse the whole Business, or to require Satisfaction for his Damage⁵. A Matter not essential to the Agreement, nor expressly consider'd init, shall not prejudice its Validity; tho' perhaps one of the Parties might have a secret and sly Respect to some such thing in the very Act of driving the Bargain⁶. Upon what Right a Man may proceed, in case he be egregiously cheated, as to the Price of any thing contracted for, we shall hereafter examine and declare.

IX. It comes now in course, that we consider the Point of FEAR, what Power it has in rendring human Acts incapable of producing an Obligation. There are two Species of Fear, which especially fall under this Enquiry. The former arises from some Vice or ill Disposition in the Person with whom we transact, or else from his ill Will to us in particular; whence we entertain a probable Suspicion, that he will deceive us. The other denotes a vehement Terror of the Mind, caus'd by the threatening of some grievous Mischiefe, unless we engage in the Promise or Pact desired. As to the first sort of Fear, this is evident beyond dispute, that if I see a Man who makes it his common Practice to cheat all the World, and reckons every piece of Knavery a piece of Wit⁷; or if as to the present Business I find he has a manifest Design upon me; I shall be a ridiculous Fool, if by trusting to his Faith, I expose myself to his Fraud, and to his Scorn. For he that runs into a Snare with his Eyes open, falls not only without help, but without pity⁸.

The Character which Polybius in B. VI. p. 498. A. Ed. Wech. Casaub. gives of the Grecians is not much ⁴ Indeed 'tis absurd to imagine that a Man can by a design'd and wicked Cheat, lay a valid Obligation upon another on our Account. Nemo ex suo delicto meliorem suam conditionem facere potest (say the most judicious Roman Lawyers.) Digest. l. 50. tit. 17. De Divers. Reg. Jur. leg. 134. §. 1. Nevertheless, these Lawyers, as Mr. Titius observes (on Lauterbach. Observ. 116, 117.) deliver here many vain Distinctions. For they affirm, that a Fraud, which has been the Cause of a Contract, does render it null in itself, and by Right (Ipso Jure) unless when Sincerity may be pretended, i. e. when a favourable Construction can be put upon it by the Rules of Equity, if we do not insist rigorously upon the Terms. But in an Act of rigorous Right, where we must strictly observe what is said or written, the Fraud does not hinder the Contract from being valid, altho' it may be reversed by a full Restitution. For the Laws in this Case always allow the Benefit of Restitution, which comes to the same thing as to the Damage of the Person cheated. But according to Natural Right, a Fraud does no less disannul a Contract of rigorous Right, than a faithful Contract. Mr. Titius (in Lauterb. Observ. 1148, &c.) maintains also with Reason, that this Distinction of Acts of good Faith and rigorous Right is not conformable to Natural Right by the Principles which ought to take place in all sorts of Acts, which admit of an equitable Construction, as Mr. Noodt acknowledges, De Forma emend. Dol. mali. Sec. c. 4. where he observes that before the Prætor Caius Aquilius Gallus there was no regard had to Contracts of rigorous Right, unless there were some formal Agreements, and the Person cheated were a Minor. See l. 5. c. 2. §. 8. infra.

⁶ Altho', adds our Author in his Abridgment of the Duties of a Man and Citizen, l. 1. c. 9. §. 13. the other Contractor has directly led us into that Thought till the Bargain was concluded.

MR. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on §. IX.

² Our Author leaves us here to guess at his Meaning about the Validity of an Agreement, which notwithstanding the Knowledge of the ill Design of the other Contractor, we have engaged ourselves in with him for something; but he explains himself in his Abridgment of the Duty of a Man and Citizen, l. 1. c. 9. §. 14. where he lays down this Rule, He that trusts to the Promises or Agreements of a Person who makes no Scruple of violating his Faith, and breaking his most sacred Engagements, acts with a great deal of Imprudence, but that is not a Reason sufficient to render the Engagement null and of no Effect. The Reason is plain, he ought to have taken care not to engage, and if he be deceived 'tis his own Fault, he can blame none but himself.

better. The publick Bankers of Greece (says he) if you lend them only a single Talent with ten Bonds, as many Seals, and twice as many Witnesses, yet will never be prevail'd upon to be honest. But whether this Fear or Suspicion of being deceiv'd, can render invalid a Pact already made, and can absolve the suspecting Party from a necessity of Performance, will appear when we shall have consider'd the Opinion of Mr. Hobbes, on this Point. He then lays it down for a Rule, that a Covenant wherein neither of the Parties perform presently, but trust one another, in a State of Nature, becomes void, if on either side there arise a just Fear^a. Which Assertion we cannot admit of, but under this Construction; that one Party after the Covenant is made has just Reason to fear, that when he has perform'd the Engagement on his side, the other Person will fly off. And by a just Reason to fear, we mean such as is grounded on plain Indications and Proofs. For it is highly injurious to question a Man's Fidelity without good Evidence, when we have experienc'd it in former Instances. And indeed Mr. Hobbes himself by a subjoyn'd Note, brings his Words to this qualified Sense; Unless, says he, there arise some new Cause of Fear from some Fact, or other sign of the Will, in one Party, tending to Non-performance, the Fear cannot be esteem'd just. For that which could not binder a Man from promising, ought not to be admitted as an Hindrance of performing. That is, tho' before the entering into the Covenant, one of the Parties might entertain some Suspicion, that the other would impose upon him; yet by the very Act of covenanting with such a Person, he as it were renounces this Fear, and declares it insufficient to hinder his believing and trusting him. And otherwise, no Engagement could pass between them. But at first this seems to have been Hobbes's Judgment, that a Pact thus made would be void, tho' there should no such Fear arise after the Conclusion of it, as appears both from his Work of a Body Politick^b, written in the French Tongue, where we do not meet with this Restriction; and from the reason assigned by him in the Latin Treatise, for that Rule of his at present under our Examination. And the reason he gives for it is this, Because he that performs first, betrays himself to the covetous Designs of the other Party, upon account of the ill Disposition of most Men, inciting them to study and advance their own Interest by Right or Wrong. But it is against Reason, that one should perform now, whilst it is improbable that the other will perform hereafter. Whence it is plain^c, That he derives the Cause of this Suspicion and Diffidence from the general Pravity of Mankind. And by this Means must the greatest number of Mortals be branded as Persons unfit to deal with; and in general, all Faith and Trust be banish'd from amongst those who are not subject to a common Ruler or Judge. For since we cannot be infallibly certain of any Man's Honesty, and since the World is for the most part inclin'd to Wickedness; and farther, since in a State of Nature every Man orders his Business according to his own Opinion, and is Judge of the Justice of his own Fears, it will follow, that a Suspicion, though vain and groundless, shall render a Contract invalid; and therefore that Pacts are of no manner of use, except under civil Governments. And it is an exceeding hard Censure, to think the greatest part of Men to grossly vile and wicked, as that (setting aside the civil Power) the Fear of God, the Regard to Faith and Trust, and the Force of sound Reason, shall have so little Influence on their Minds. Whereas, on the contrary there seems to be stamp on the Souls of all Men, in indelible Characters, a just Sense of the Duty of keeping their Faith sacred and inviolable; an Argument for which Truth we may draw from this easy and natural Reflection, That we can find no Man who will openly profess Perfidiousness, but every one who recedes from his Word or Bargain, pretends to have done it on very just and weighty Reasons. A Commonwealth which breaks its Faith with one of its neighbouring States, immediately engages its Faith again, to procure the Alliance and Confederacy of another; and thus endeavours to avert the Danger it lay under from that Baseness and Treachery, by the Help of the same Duty which before it violated. We ought therefore to presume, that every Man will do what is just and honest, till his contrary Practice forces us to change our Opinion. To distrust every Body, says Lucian, is a most ridiculous Folly^d. From all which we may venture to conclude, That this distrust of Mens Faith arising from the general Pravity of human Nature, is not sufficient to justify the Non-performance of Contracts^e. And therefore the Excuse of the Mitylenians for deserting the Confederacy of the Athenians, was vain and groundless, as it is given by their Ambassadors in Thucydides, B. iii. c. 12. Edit. Oxon. Pag. 154. When they had War, they for Fear courted us; and when they had Peace, we for Fear courted them. Thus our Faith on both sides was not preserv'd as is usual by mutual good Will, but by mutual Distrust; and they who could be first encouraged by Security were likely to be the first that should break the Union.

Nay, should we discover some particular Vices in a Person, this is not always a good Reason for us to recede from an Engagement made with him^f. For there are many Vices which have no ill influ-

³ This is a Mistake of our Author, for 'tis only a Translation into French, as Mr. Barbeyrac observes.

ence on the Duty of keeping Faith. Thus suppose a Man to be inclin'd to Lust, Drunkenness, or Cruelty, those ill Habits, consider'd barely in themselves, do not hinder but that he may be a strict Observer of his Word, and a constant Performer of his Covenants. And farther still, should we find a Person addict'd to such Vices as do commonly prejudice Fidelity and Trust; as if we observe in him a desultory Lightness and Inconstancy of Mind, an insatiable Desire of Riches, or a violent Strain of Ambition; yet even these Qualities do not give us an absolute Liberty of refusing to make good our Word, when we have pass'd it on his Account. For in the first place, it may often happen that a Man out of a particular Inclination may practise Dishonesty towards others, and yet may live fairly and justly with me. And then (as has been lately observ'd) by my very Act of bargaining with a Person whose Disposition I am acquainted with, I declare those Vices which I know him guilty of, to be insufficient to hinder me from trusting him, and so renounce all my Privilege of making Exception against his present Morals, after the Business is concluded between us. For otherwise nothing would have been firmly transacted, supposing one Party at first to have made such a Reserve as should, when he pleas'd, overthrow the whole Proceedings⁷. Though indeed when I have been once deceiv'd by a Man, I shall act very imprudently, if I engage in any Contract with him again, without requiring particular Security. And the very Proverb will tell me, That if such a Knave cheats me once, 'tis his Fault, but if he cheats me a second time, 'tis my own⁸. Add. Senec. de Benef. l. iv. c. 27. Cic. de Invent. l. i. c. 39. Or even after the Pact is concluded; suppose I find by evident Tokens, that he is contriving to play me a Trick, I shall be an egregious Fool, if I betray my self voluntarily to his Designs. Cicero de Invent. l. i. c. 39. It's the highest Pitch of Madness to rely on their Fidelity, whose Perfidiousness you have often experienc'd. Hence Menelaus cries out in Homer. l. iii. Iliad. v. 105, 106.

Ἄξιός τε Πειράωιο βίην, ὄρε' ὄρνια τάμην
 Ἄπτος, ἐπεὶ οἱ παῖδες ἑσφιάλοισι καὶ ἀπτοισι.

Bring Priam's self to see the Contract made,
 For Priam's Sons are faithless and unstead.

⁸ Cicero's Latin is, Primum quidem decipi incommodum est, iterum stultum, tertio turpe — summa igitur amentia est, in eorum fide spem habere, quorum perfidia toties deceptus sis. De Invent. l. 1. c. 39. See also *Homer's Iliad, l. 3. v. 105. ⁹ Mr. Vander Muellen in his Commentary upon Grotius, Tom. 2. will not agree to the Opinion of our Author. For he says, Experience shews, that those sort of Men have not so altogether put off Humanity, but are usually conformable to the Rules of Honesty and good Sense established among Men; and if they do not act with any fear of a Deity, yet they do it with the Prospect of their own Advantage and Preservation. So that though we know that a Man is infected with that detestable Opinion, we have no Right under that pretence to break our Word with him, and neglect to perform the Agreements made with him. We were at our Liberty to agree with him, or not; but from the Moment that we have concluded an Agreement with him, we are necessarily obliged to perform it. It is a clear different thing when we deal with Traitors, Thieves, Pirates, &c. Mr. Bayle has also proved at large in his Thoughts upon a Comet, and the Enlargement of that Work, that Atheists are not always wicked and faithless, and that they may through a Principle of Honour or other human Motives abstain from grosser Vices.

¹⁰ The Author here speaks only of that Circumspection that we ought to use in treating such Men. For he denies not but we are obliged to observe what we have freely promised. See what he speaks a little lower, §. 11. in the place where he examines the Maxim of Cicero. De Offic. l. 3. c. 29. See also l. 8. c. 4. §. 5.

ed and deluded; or that he must depend entirely on the Favour and good Grace of the other, for what he expects in return.

Thus Socrates of Achaia replied to the Demands of King Artaxerxes; The King deals most unreasonably by us; what he desires to receive from us, he would have to be immediately deliver'd; but what he is to give us in return, he expects we should afterwards humbly sue for. Diod. Sic. l. xiv. c. 24. For the same Reason, facilior fides speratur ex pari, we may trust more safely to the Faith and Honesty of an Equal, Quintil. Declam. 312.

And lastly, That he exposes his Safety to manifest Danger, who by performing a Covenant weakens himself, and strengthens the other Party; upon hopes that in Requital, and according to the Agreement, he shall afterwards receive the like Assistance and Succour. For 'tis a piece of Folly to give a real and substantial Good, in exchange for Words, Writings, or Seals, when we have nothing to oppose to the Charms of Ambition and Covetousness, but the ill-grounded hopes of Honesty and Fidelity ¹².

Maurocen. Hist. Venet. l. v. p. 193. Ed. Ven. I dare not venture to place the Security of our Affairs in a League. For such is the Nature of Confederacies, that they are frequently hindred and interrupted by the various Events of Things; different Ends propos'd draw the Strength and Minds of the Allies different ways; and whilst each State pursues its own private Interest, the common Good is disregarded or betray'd. Reinforcements and Supplies are neither sent in equal Proportion, nor at the time agreed upon; hence arise Suspicions, and Estrangement of Affections, from this open Quarrels, and from Quarrels utter Desertions, and Violations of the main Contract; and thus at length, those of the Confederates who are least able to make Resistance, become a Prey not only to their Enemies, but to their Allies.

X. We are now to proceed to that other Species of Fear, arising from the Approach or the Apprehension of some grievous Mischief. And in stating this Point it is necessary, that we go back to furnish our selves with some clear and fundamental Principles. And such is this undoubted and original Truth, That our Will naturally inclines to what it looks upon as good. Now it appears no less good and desirable to the Will, to avoid an imminent Evil, than to acquire an absent Benefit; and towards the attaining of both these Ends, we employ the most likely Means, although they be such as we should not barely on their Account choose or embrace. For we commonly make use of Methods in themselves ungrateful and troublesome for the escaping of a Danger, as for the acquiring of a Pleasure ¹. Though indeed, the Hopes of compassing a Good does more sweeten the Grievousness of these Means or Methods, than the Care of preventing an Evil. For which Reason Aristotle ^a calls those only mixt (that is, partly voluntary, partly involuntary) Actions ², which are undertaken for the sake of declining some Mischief which we are like to suffer; as in that trite Instance, of throwing Goods over-board in a Storm. Though as great Hardships as any of this kind are undergone by the Wrestlers, and other Engagers in the publick Games, to prepare their Body for those Exercises ^b. What we would observe then is this, That although Actions perform'd upon Fear of a greater Evil, ought to be accounted spontaneous, and tho' the lesser Evil, which in those Cases we choose, is, as Things then stand, the real Object of our Desire; yet all this is not sufficient to found an Obligation in us towards another. For since every Obligation is directed towards some other Party, to whom it is to be made good, and who thereby obtains a correspondent Right of compelling us to Performance; to produce such an Engagement, 'tis not enough that one Person has in him the due Grounds or Principles of an Obligation, but it is requisite, that there be in some other Persons Principles fit to create a Right. For we can have no Notion of an Obligation, unless a Right answer to it, or be consequent upon it: As I can owe nothing, if there be no Person who can rightly demand any thing from me. Therefore such Fear alone invalidates and destroys an Obligation, as is caus'd by some Vice or Imperfection in the other Party, rendering him incapable of acquiring a Right ³. And such a Defect is every injurious Action; which cannot be said to produce a Right without a manifest Contradiction ⁴. For to pay what ¹² This Quotation is not very necessary, because that Historian there treats in general of the Inconveniences which arise by Alliances of one State with another.

MR. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on §. X.

See tit. 2. l. 4. Quod metus causa gestum erit, and Mr. Daumiat's Civil Laws in their natural Order, Part 1. l. 1. tit. 18. § 2. We may add also what Cicero says, Jam illis promissis standum non esse, quis non videt, quæ coactus quis metu, quæ deceptus dolo promiserit? Quæ quidem pleraque Jure Prætorio liberantur, nonnulla Legibus. De Offic. l. 1. c. 10. (i. e.) As for Promises extorted by Fear or Fraud, who sees not that we are not obliged to keep them? The Prætor himself frees us from many of them, and the Laws from some others. "Solon (as Plutarch relates) by allowing Men who had no Children to give all they had by Will to whom they pleased, yet did not thereby approve of all sorts of Donations indifferently, but of those only that were given freely without any Violence, and without a Mind corrupted with the Potions, or Fawnings of a Woman, being justly persuaded that there is no difference between Seducement and Force; and placing in the same Rank, Surprise and Force, Pleasure and Pain, as the things which equally cloud our Reason. Εὐ πάνυ καὶ ἀρροσσηρόντος τὸ πειθώσαι ὅτι τὸ βέλτιστον, ἐδὲν ἠγέρθητε τὰ βλαδύαι διαζέρειν, ἀλλ' εἰς τάντο ἢ ἀπάτω τῆ ἀνάσκει, καὶ τὸ πῦρα ἢ ἠδονὴν δέμας, ὡς ἔχ ἠπλον ἐκείνηται λογισμὸν ἀνδρῶτα δωμαρῶσαν.

another has a Right to demand, is a Precept of the Law of Nature; and should an Injury (that is, a Deed or Fact directly contrary to that Law) be able to cause any such Effect, the Law of Nature would lend Strength and Assistance to its Enemy, and manifestly contribute to its own Destruction. We may as well say, that a Law which forbids Thieves, may at the same time reckon their Trade and Practice amongst the honest ways of Gain^s.

XI. But, before we apply these Remarks more closely to the Point, it is necessary that we make farther Enquiry, whether the Author of the Fear was the Party with whom we are engaged in Business, or some other Person. And then again, whether he had a just Power and Authority of presenting such a Fear to our Mind, or not. For this is true beyond Dispute, that in case I have taken an Obligation upon me through Fear of Mischief, threatened by a third Person, neither at the Intigation, nor with the Confederacy of the Party to whom the Engagement was made^r, I stand firmly bound to perform what I promis'd him. For there appears no Fault in him, which might render him incapable of acquiring a Right upon me; and on the contrary, he may justly challenge a Requit, in that he lent me his Assistance, in warding off the Danger I apprehended from another Quarter². Thus, if I hire a Guard of Soldiers to defend me against Robbers, I am no doubt oblig'd strictly to pay them the Price of their Service. And a Man who being reduc'd to a low Condition, procures by large Promises the Help of others, and having by their Means escap'd the Danger, is afterwards backward in performing, contracts the double Guilt of Perfidiousness, and of Ingratitude.

A Promise is likewise valid, if made to a third Person, through our Awe and Dread of a lawful Superior³; who had a just Right of commanding us, and of denouncing a Penalty upon Default. For here the Party to whom I make the Engagement is in no Fault; and I can only blame my self for being driven to a thing through Fear of Punishment, which I ought voluntarily to have undertaken. Thus should a King lend a Body of his Soldiers for Guards to a foreign Prince, and for the greater Security, command them to swear Obedience to the Stranger; they shall not afterwards fly from their new Obligation, upon pretence that they were brought to it by Fear; since the Fear proceeded from him, who had a sovereign Right of laying this Injunction on them, and of forcing them by any Methods to their Duty. In the same manner, ⁵ To clear this Matter, it is necessary to make some Reflections. 1. The Reason which our Author alleges, taken from the Incapacity made by the Cause of Fear, to acquire any Right from the other Contractor, is very good, but there is another drawn from the Person in whom the Fear is, That his Consent is not so free as is required in all Promises and Agreements, which ought to be perfectly voluntary. 'Tis not here as it is in Actions criminal and evil in themselves, which ought not to be committed for fear of the greatest Menaces, though the Fear yielded to may lessen the Crime. Because as we ought and may obey the Law that forbids them, we are thought to be free so far as is necessary to make us culpable, though we have nothing in view but the Trouble which we are immediately threatened with. But in the Matters of Promises and Agreements, all that is not done without Artifice and Constraint from him with whom we engage, is looked upon with Reason not to have a good ground of Consent, and consequently is void in itself, because we act about things indifferent, which we need not determine farther than we see convenient. The Law that leaves us at liberty to do them or not, lays no Necessity upon us to keep what we are engaged to contrary to our Will and Interest. Reason and Prudence will oblige us rather to depart from our Rights, than expose our selves to the ill Effect of Force; but if there be no Damage to us, nothing can oblige us to make good an Act which is null in itself, unless we fear a worse Consequence than appears in doing it. Mr. Daumat, who has used (in his Civil Laws reduc'd to a natural Order, Part 1. Lib. 1. tit. 18. § 2.) this Reason to shew the Nullity of forced Engagements, but explains them obscurely, has not forgot the other Reason taken from him who is constrained to promise or treat. 2. Our Author seems to think that the Evil, which being apprehended, is sufficient to make forced Promises and Agreements void, ought to be very terrible, whose Prospect may affright the most courageous Persons. 'Tis certainly the Opinion of the Roman Lawyers, who confine this Fear to the Danger of losing Life, or suffering some violent bodily Pain. Metum accipiendum Labeo dicit, non quemlibet timorem, sed majoris malitatis----qui merito & in hominem constantissimum cadat. Digest. l. 4. tit. 2. leg. 5, 6. Talem metum probari oportet, qui salutis periculum, vel corporis cruciatum contineat. Cod. l. 2. tit. 4. De Transactionibus, leg. 13. But supposing always, that the Fear is unjust, I do not see why the Apprehension of a small Evil is not sufficient to make Promises and Agreements void, if that be the principal Motive, and without it Consent had not been given. The least Injustice, in my Opinion, gives no more Right to the Author of it than the greatest. But the Fear must not be a vain one, for he that resigns himself up to panick Fears, must blame himself. Vani timoris justa excusatio non est, Digest. l. 50. tit. 17. De Diversis Reg. Jur. Leg. 184. Otherwise, as Mr. Daumat observes, all the World would not have the same Resolution to resist Force and Menaces. There are some Men so very weak and timorous, that they yield to the least Impressions; so that the least Force prevails as much on them, as the greatest on the most courageous, and 'tis principally for their sake that the Laws punish Matters of Fact and Oppressions. But if the same Laws do not allow the Fear of a small Evil to be ranked among the Causes of nulling a Contract, it proceeds from hence, according to the judicious Reflection of Mr. Placette in his Treatise of Restitution, that the Lawgivers would prevent the Multiplication of Suits, which are without Contradiction a great Evil; but they have left, adds he, the Rights of Conscience entire, and their Authority hinders not but that we may observe exactly what that inward Law prescribes upon that and the like Subjects. We must then conclude, that by natural Right all Force, and every kind of Violence, direct or indirect, all Menaces, and in general all unlawful Influences which oblige Men, contrary to their Inclination, to give their Consent, which otherwise they would not, takes away that Liberty which is necessary to make an Engagement valid, and consequently renders all Promises and Agreements in such Cases null and void. I shall farther add only one Passage in Plato, wherein that Philosopher asserts, That the Agreements to which a Man is obliged by an unjust Force, ought to be valid no more than those which are contrary to the Laws, or are not in our Power to execute, by reason of some unforeseen Accident, "Ὅσα τις ἀνὸς δολογῶν ξωθέει, μὴ πῶν κτ' πᾶς δολογίας, πλὴν ὅν ἀν νόμοι ἀπειρώσων, ἢ ψήφισμα ἢ πνθὸς ὑπὸ ἀδίκου βιαδέει ἀδικίας δολογίᾳ, κτ' ἐάν ἀπὸ τύχης ἀπεσθδὴται τις ἀκων κωλυθῆ, δίκας εἶδ' ἢ ἀδὼν ἀπὸ δολογίας ἐν ἡ φυλακῆσι δίκας, &c. De Legibus, l. 11. Tom. 2.

MR. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES ON §. XI.

² Si quo magis te de vi hostium vel latronum, vel populi tuerer, vel liberarem, aliquid à te accepero, vel te obligavero; non debere me hoc edicto teneri, nisi ipse hanc tibi vim summiserit. Cæterum si alienus sum à vi, teneri me non debere; ego enim operæ potius meæ mercedem accepisse videor. Digest. l. 4. tit. 2. leg. 9. § 1.

should we suppose that a Father might betroth his Daughter to a Man, quite against her Inclination; and in this Case, when she, out of fear of her Father's Authority, has given her Faith to the less agreeable Spouse, she cannot afterwards disappoint him. For there is no Fault in him, to prejudice his Right, accruing from that Promise; and the Daughter ought freely to have obeyed her Father's Pleasure; and so cannot plead Compulsion, when she has no Right to resist. Thus far then it is a Point of Moment to consider who was the Author of the Fear. But in other Cases, the Rule of the Roman Lawyers holds good, That it makes no difference from what Person the Fear proceeds; that is, when one has a Right of putting us into such a Fear; and when the Fear is actually the Cause, not the bare Occasion only of the Promise, or Pact, consequent upon it ⁴.

Those Promises then, or Pacts, we take to be invalid, which a Man is compell'd to engage in by the unjust Force of the Party to whom they are made. For since he who extorts any thing from another, by using unjust Terrors, is by the Law of Nature bound to restore it; and must consequently make good what the other Person loses by such a forced Bargain. So ⁵ Seneca l. iv. Controv. 26. The Question is, whether Force and Necessity render a Business invalid, when they did not proceed from the Party contracting? What Influence (will he say) "can your Compulsion have on me, when it was not I that compell'd you? The Punishment cannot be mine, unless the Fault were mine. But the other denies this way of arguing. The Law, says he, as to the present Case, doth not prosecute him that offers the Violence, but assists and relieves him that suffers it; it seeming unreasonable, That a Man should be bound by an Engagement thrust upon him against his Will. Whence the Necessity proceeded, is a Point of no weight in the Dispute. That which renders the Contract unjust, is the hard Fortune of the Sufferer, not the Person of the Doer. Idem Controv. l. iv. c. 8. If it be said it was not I that applied the Force, but another; the Answer is, That Man who makes his Advantage by Violence, offer'd by some other hand, is no less guilty, than if he had been himself the actual Performer.

The Necessity of Reparation in the Party who offer'd the Violence, takes off all Obligation to Payment in the Party who suffer'd it; because should he offer to do ⁶, or to give what in the Agreement he promis'd, he ought in common Justice immediately to receive full Recompence, or full Restitution ⁷. And 'twould be a foolish and idle way of acting, when we are once got clear of the Danger, to pay voluntarily what we promis'd upon Force, and then to require Reparation of the Damage ⁸. Martial. L. XI. Epig. 59.

I'd spoil his Dancing and his Fiddling too.

Especially since the other Party, when he demands or accepts our Promise, does by that very Act declare manifestly, that 'tis far from his Thoughts and Designs to make us any Satisfaction. Besides, how ridiculous would it be in you to reckon it a piece of Merit, when you forbear a Mischief which the Laws forbid you to commit, to pretend that you do a Man a Kindness, by refraining from some notorious Villany? And therefore Cicero ⁹ utterly denies himself to have been obliged to Antony, for not killing him at Brudusium. What Benefit, what Favour is it (says he) that you withheld your Hands from the foulest Wickedness? What Kindness can Thieves boast of, but that they spared a Man's Life, when it was in their Power to have murder'd him?

⁶ There is no Necessity here to have recourse to this Fiction of Law; and our Author ought the more to have avoided it, because he condemns it himself, when he criticises upon Grotius's Opinion, at the end of §. 12. in this Chapter. He had better have insisted upon the Principle he laid down above, viz. The Incapacity that the Author of Force should obtain any Right by such extorted Engagements, and the want of Liberty in the Person which gives such a forced Consent. See §. 10. Note 5. The Argument our Author uses here, can only be ad hominem against the Roman Lawyers, who having searched into the idle Fallacies of this Head, as they have done in other Matters, maintain, That the Contracts of Rigorous Right extorted by an unjust Fear, are valid in Equity, altho' they ought afterwards to be disannulled by the Prætor. See Institut. l. 4. tit. 13. De Exceptionibus, §. 1. and Mr. Noodt, De Forma emendandi doli mali, c. 16.

Add. l. vii. f. 3. D. de pactis. Seneca, l. ii. Controv. 13. Not to do a Villain will never pass for a Benefit. Quintil. Declam. 330. To make an end of an Injury is by no means to begin a Kindness.

No more is a Man bound to perform his Promise, who in a Case of this Nature¹⁰, gives Security for the Person in Distress; although his own Fear is not the Cause of his entering into the Engagement. For since Suretyship is a kind of inferior Contract, admitted to confirm and strengthen the main Business; it would be absurd (at least with regard to natural Law) to attribute more Efficacy to the former than to the latter; to make the principal Debtor less strictly obliged, than he who comes into the Business purely for his Assistance¹¹. The Case is otherwise, if this third Party, for the relief of the Sufferer, contract an Obligation, in which he himself is the Principal, not the Surety, or the Accessary. For instance, if a Man out of Kindness and Pity should promise some Reward to a Villain, upon Condition he will set a poor Wretch at Liberty, whom he has got under his Power¹². For here the Contractor himself is not properly put under Fear, nor can he use those Exceptions, which might be made by the Person he delivers; in as much as he engages upon his own Score, not in the Name of the other, and cannot be said to build his Bargain on a primary Obligation; since indeed, none pass'd, but what he freely set on foot, and of which he took the whole Burthen on himself. And he ought to esteem it a thing well worth his Pains or Cost, to have saved the Life of an innocent Man, and to have acquired the Glory of Beneficence in so extraordinary a Degree.

But if a Person in this captive Condition, upon making Terms for his Liberty shall leave Hostages to continue under the Power of the Villains, till such time as he shall have perform'd what he promised; he is then indeed bound to make good his Word; yet not by virtue of his Contract with the Rogues, but of that whereby he stands engaged to the Friends whom he has left in his room. In Morocco, and other Parts of Africk, the whole Body of Christian Slaves pass their Faith for each particular Man of their Number, that he shall not go off; and by means of this Security they are allowed to walk the City without their Chains; and in case one of them make their Escape, the rest are obliged to pay the Price he was valued at. Whether an Oath added to Promises of this kind, does more confirm and establish their Force, we shall hereafter examine.

It is a noted Saying of Tully in his third Book of Offices, c. 29.¹³ If you have agreed with Thieves to give them such a Sum to save your Life, it is no Deceit to recede from your Promise, though you have given your Oath too for the Performance. For Robbers or Pirates are not in the number of any particular and lawful Enemies, but should be look'd on as the Adversaries of Mankind; and therefore no true Faith or Oath can properly pass between us and them. Which Assertion we thus far allow holds good, that a Promise made to such Men through the Compulsion of Fear shall not be binding. But the reason on which Tully proceeds, is not satisfactory to many Persons; especially, if extended to such Pacts or Promises as we commence with the same Villains, without being brought to it by Violence. For tho' by the common Custom of Nations¹⁴ a lawful Enemy and a Robber are treated in a different Method, yet the latter cannot be said immediately to lose all Rights of Humanity; at least, if he still deal with some Persons in a fair and peaceable manner. For when he transacts with me without influencing my Consent by Fear, he bargains not as a Robber, but like any other Man. Now a Robber is call'd a common Adversary, because he does not, like other Enemies, offer War peculiarly to any Party; but practises hostile Force upon all, without Distinction, that fall into his Hands. Upon which account, in order to quell and to suppress him, there is no need of the Formalities of denouncing War, and lifting Soldiers against him; but Nature commissions every Man to prosecute him in a military way. But it may still be affirm'd, that as by Tully's own Confession, a State of Hostility does not hinder us from being bound to observe Faith with an Enemy; so neither is this common Hostility of the Robber an Hindrance to our performing a Covenant made with him; especially if, as we have all along suppos'd, he lays aside the Part of an Enemy in the Act of Covenanting.

Grotius forms another Objection to this purpose; "Such as are notoriously wicked, and are no part of any civil Society, may, if we regard the Law of Nature, be by any Man punish'd. (This¹⁴ Hypothesis we shall examine in another place.) Now they who may be punish'd, and even with Death, may likewise be despoil'd of their Goods, may be dispossest'd of their Rights. But, amongst their Rights, that which accrues to them

¹⁰ This is the Decision of the Roman Lawyers, who say at the same time, That if the Surety has engaged thro' Fear, and he for whom he is Surety engageth himself voluntarily, the Engagement of this latter is good, but of the other null. Labo ait, Si quis per metum Reus sit constitutus, & fidejussorem nolentem dederit, ipse & fidejussor liberabitur. Si solus fidejussor metu accessit, non etiam Reus, sed fidejussor liberabitur. Digell. l. 4. tit. 2. Quod metus causa, leg. 14. § 6. See l. 5. c. 10. § 9. following.

¹¹ Mr. Hertius maintains, that in this last Case the Engagement is not valid, unless there be an open Donation of what is delivered or promised on that account. For, says he, though he be engaged in Person, 'tis only to save another, who is unjustly oppressed. The Author himself in the following Chapter, § 9. puts the like Engagement among such as are extorted by Fear, or gotten by Surprise, and in Sport. This Criticism is well grounded, altho' in the Case he is speaking of the Engagement be free, he to whom it is made can acquire no more Right by our Promise, than by those for whom the Engagement is made.

¹² Cicero's Latin is this, Ut si pro donibus pactum pro capite pretium non attuleris, nulla fraus est, ne si juratus quidem id non faceris. Nam pirata non est perduellium numero definitus, sed communis hostis omnium; cum hoc nec fides debet, nec jusjurandum esse commune. See also what is said, l. 4. c. 2. § 8.

¹³ Heliodor. Aethiop. l. 1. c. 3. p. 56. When we make War upon Thieves, we do not finish it with the usual Ceremonies of Articles and Leagues. The Greek is, Οὐ γὰρ ἐπὶ ῥητοῖς ποτὲ λήσειε ἢ ἔληξε πόλεμος, εἰ δ' ἐν σπονδαῖς ἔρε τὴν τελευτήν. But see Gratus, l. 3. c. 19. §. 2. Numb. 2.

¹⁴ See l. 8. c. 3. §. 4. following.

¹⁵ Vid. In l. 1. §. tit. 21. De Fidejussor. §. 5.

“ from our Promise is one; and therefore that too
 “ may by way of Punishment be taken from them.
 But Grotius answers this Argument with great Ease.
 For he that voluntarily bargains with a Thief, knowing him to be such, does by that very Act renounce all Exception against his Person, which might otherwise render the Promise invalid. Else the Business was vain and insignificant, and nothing really pass'd between them. Should I be got out of my Road, and promise a Thief some Reward for setting me right again, there is no doubt to be made, but I ought freely to pay it. And thus too the Roman Lawyers rightly maintain, “ That what“ soever is deposited with us by a Thief, ought to “ be restored to him ¹⁵, if the true Owner of it “ does not appear. To which they should add this farther Condition, That the Man who receives the thing in trust, does not know the Fraud of the other. For in Case he is satisfied that the Person is a Villain, and that the Goods are stolen, I do not see how he can take them in Charge, without bringing himself in as an Accessary to the Crime.

XII. But many indeed there are, who maintain that Pacts and Promises, though extorted thro' Fear, have yet the Force and Power of Obliging
¹. Some urge the Authority of the Roman Law, which by giving full Restitution ² should seem to suppose, that those Engagements are in strict Justice binding, but ought to be reliev'd and corrected in Courts of Equity. But 'tis easy to vindicate the Practice, without drawing any such Conclusion from it. For since the Parties are Members of a civil State, the Court does not presently take it for granted, that one of them offer'd Violence to the other; and since that Point may bear a Dispute, it seems convenient so long to keep up such a Contract, and to suppose it good, till the Judge shall receive manifest Evidence, That the Allegation of Fear, on which the Action was grounded, was really just and true. But it does not follow hence, That Contracts of this kind, or other Business which may be disannull'd by a peremptory Exception at Law, are in themselves firm and obligatory; since the Formality of that way of Proceeding, though proper civil Judicature, yet is not agreeable to the Simplicity of the Law of Nature; at least, when the Case happens between Persons who do not acknowledge a common Judge.

Grotius asserts ³, “ That a Man who makes a “ Promise through Fear, is therefore naturally oblig'd to perform it, because he plainly gave his “ Consent, and such Consent as was full and “ absolute, according to the present Posture of “ Things ³. For, as Heliodorus says, l. v. c. 15.

 “ p. 253. Edit. Lugd. Life is so precious, that we “ seldom think we buy it too dear; though he “ had never pass'd his Consent, had he been re-“ cure from the Danger. But in answer to this,
 'tis sufficient to repeat what we formerly observ'd,
 That since every Obligation arising from a Contract, supposes a correspondent Right in the other Party, it is not enough that I have in me the necessary Causes and Principles of an Obligation; but 'tis requisite, that the Person with whom I deal, be free from all such Defects as might hinder him from obtaining a Right upon me. And therefore my having the Power to give a thing, does not presently make another have a Power of receiving it. Since then an Obligation without a Right answering to it, is of no Use or Purpose; it cannot be imagined, that my bare Consent should bind me to a Performance, which the Law of Nature forbids the other Person to receive at my Hands. And this is manifestly the present Case. For the same Law which prohibits the Application of Violence and Terror, must needs at the same time prohibit the Acquirement of any Right, or any Gain, by such wicked Means. What Grotius subjoins appears not altogether agreeable, “ That if he to whom “ the Promise was made, did obtain it of the other “ Party, by putting him in a Fear, though never “ so slight, he is oblig'd to release the Promiser, if “ he desire it; not because the Engagement was in“ valid, but by reason of the Damage which he un“ justly occasion'd. Now if I can at my Pleasure
 “ or Desire be freed from my Obligation, I am al“ ready actually quit of it. What need is there then of this round-about way of Application? You ought to release me from my Obligation, if I request it? Is it not more easy, and more natural to say, Since you compell'd me by Force to make the Promise, I owe you nothing; and 'tis idle in you to demand that of me, which should I pay, you are oblig'd immediately to restore ⁴? Ald. Senec. Controvers. iv. 25.

XIII. The same Opinion is defended by Mr. Hobbes
^b, though by different Arguments. He says, Cove- nants entred into by Fear are not therefore invalid, because they proceed from Fear; for then it would follow, that those Covenants by which Men unite in Civil Life, and make Laws, must be invalid; for

MR. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on §. XII.

¹ This is the Opinion of Mr. M utagne in his Essays, l. 3. c. 1. who thus delivers himself, What my Fear has once made me resolve, I am oblig'd to make good without Fear; and though nothing forces me to it but my Tongue without my Will, yet I am oblig'd to make good my Word. As for my self, whenever I have inconsiderately deliver'd my Thoughts, I have made a Conscience nevertheless of disowning them. Otherwise we shall come by degrees to abolish all the Right which a third Person obtains by our Promises. Quasi vero facti viro cui passet a liberis (Cicero de Offic. l. 3. c. 30. upon which see Grotius's Notes.) In this alone hath the Law a secret Interest to excite us in the Non-performance of our Promises, if we have promised a thing wicked and unjust in it self, for the Right of Virtue ought to prevail above the Right of an Obligation.

² This hath only place in Contracts of strict Right, for those of good Faith would be null in themselves, and by the Civil Law. It is true, that according to the Roman Lawyers, the Words annul, make void, rescind, make good fully, may be indifferently applied to both sorts of Contracts, because when we are brought to Justice by the Contractor, who would oblige us to keep them, the Judge may declare them null one way or other, either as having no Force in themselves by the Tenure of the Civil Law, or being void by some Exception made by the Defendant. See §. 8. Note 5. foregoing; and Mr. Nair's Treatise, De Forma emendandi doli mali, &c. c. 15, 16. where it will appear, that our Author's Reason to excuse the Course of Proceedings in the Roman Court is no way solid, since the Judge had always time to know the Force, whether the Contract were in itself good, or not.

⁴ Here we may apply the Maxim of the Roman Lawyers, Non videtur quisquam id capere, quod ei necesse est alii restituere, (i. e.) He seems not to receive any thing, that must of Necessity restore it. Digest. de Divers. Rez. Juris, leg. 51. on which see the Note of Dion. Gothofred.

the Fear of mutual Slaughter is the Cause of one Man's submitting himself to the Government of another. It would follow likewise, that a Man acts irrationally, who believes his Captive bargaining with him for his Ransom. Now in the first of these Reasons, there is a plain Ambiguity in the Term of Fear. For that Fear which engages Men to enter into civil Societies, is of a quite different kind from that which we are now considering¹. The former is a Caution against some Evil which may happen indefinitely; I know not when, nor which way: The latter is a dreadful Apprehension of grievous Evil just now coming upon me, and which I am not able to resist. Therefore the Covenants which we make for the Procurement of mutual Assistance against a common Enemy, are entirely of another Nature, from those by which we promise some Reward, to free our selves from a Danger which a Villain unjustly brings upon us². As to the latter Reason, we readily acknowledge, that a Rogue acts very irrationally, when having first extorted a Promise by Force, he afterwards yields Credit to the Person, as if the whole Business had been honestly and fairly transacted. For that Wickedness and Folly should meet together, is no Contradiction. On the other side, we may venture to say, That he would not act very rationally, who being got safe from a Mischiefe, with which he was unjustly threatened, should freely pay the Ruffian the Price of his Villany³. () Dionys. Halicar. l. viii. p. 509, in fin. Edit. Lips. "Whatever is extorted from private Men, or from publick States, by Force and Necessity, holds no longer than the Necessity it self continues.

He adds, 'tis universally true, that Pacts oblige, whensoever a Good is receiv'd, and when the Act of promising, and the Thing promis'd are both lawful. But is it lawful for me both to make a Promise for the rescuing of my Life, and also to give what I will of my own, even to a Robber? But indeed, what the Robber in this Case performs for the Traveller, in forbearing to take away his Life unjustly, cannot be call'd a Good. The obtaining from an Injury ought not pass for a Benefit. And we are then only said to have done some Good to a Man, when we have conferr'd some Advantage on him, which he wanted, or secured and preserved some which he before enjoy'd; or have deliver'd him from some Evil or Danger, which fell upon him without our Fault⁴. As to the latter part of the Argument, it is no good Consequence to say, "It is lawful for me to promise and to pay the Villain; therefore he has a Right of requiring the Performance from me; or therefore I stand bound towards him by some inward Tie upon my Conscience. We may do many things lawfully, which we cannot be engaged to do by any Obligation. I may lawfully throw away my Goods; but does it therefore follow, that another can oblige me to such an Extravagance? So that the Rule which the same Author lays down on this Subject in his *Leviathan*⁵, is likewise false; Whatever I may lawfully do without Obligation, the same I may lawfully covenant to do through Fear; and what I lawfully covenant, I cannot lawfully break. For he ought to have added this Condition, Provided the other Party can honestly demand it of me.

XIV. There is on this Point still one Question behind, which requires our Examination; since Promises made through Mistake, or through Fear, are void; suppose the Party after he gets rid of his Mistake, or of his Fear, is inclin'd to stand to his Bargain, What must be the way of ratifying such Promises, and of putting them in full Force? For an Obligation that was at first invalid, may afterwards recover its Strength by the Intervention of some new Cause, fit to create a Right; which in the present Case must be a clear and voluntary Consent. Some then are of Opinion, That for the Confirmation of such a Promise, no more is requisite, than an internal Act of the Mind, or a full and free Agreement to the Business, tho' it be not express'd by any outward Sign. For the outward Sign, they say, has pass'd before; and this being now enforced by the clear and free Determination of the Mind, nothing is wanting to the Production of a firm Engagement. Others dislike this way of deciding the Controversy; because they conceive that the internal Consent, and the external Sign, ought to exist together, and that therefore an antecedent external Act cannot be a Token of a subsequent internal Act, which perhaps was not then thought of. And upon this Account, they, to make such a Promise valid, require a new verbal Promise and Acceptance. Grotius^b offers a middle Judgment, that 'tis indeed absolutely necessary, some Signs should be used to declare such a subsequent internal Consent, because the other Party would else have no Assurance of his Right; but there is no Necessity the Signs should be verbal, Jur.* leg. 29. And this Maxim is afterwards applied to the making of an Heir, Quæ ab initio inutilis fuit institutio, ex post facto convalescere non potest, Ibid. leg. 210. But we may discern from divers Examples of the Roman Law, that this Principle has not always been followed, even in the matter of Wills. See Digest. l. 12. tit. 1. de Rebus Creditis, &c. leg. 12, &c. and Dionys. Gothofredus upon the Rules quoted above, as also Mr. Daumat's Civil Laws in their Natural Order, Part 2. l. 1. tit. 1. Sect. 2. §. 31.

since others may serve as well to the purpose; as suppose the Promiser understanding his Error, or being deliver'd from his Fear, shall voluntarily give what he engaged for, or if the thing be already given, shall not endeavour to recover it, when he has convenient Means; or shall treat afterwards with the other Party about the same things, as he would about any thing else, which the said Party lawfully possesses. To which Decision we readily subscribe.

XV. We are farther to observe, That to the rendring of a Promise good and valid, there is required, not only the Consent of the Person who makes it, but likewise of him to whom it is made²; and this latter Consent too (as well as the former) must be express'd by Signs sufficient; and for this a bare Nod will serve, if the thing offer'd, be either a matter of free Bounty, or have been before requested. For if the other Party do not consent, or do absolutely reject the Proposal, the thing promised still remains in the Power of the Promiser, though he had sworn to part with it; for even an Oath cannot transfer a Right before Acceptance, and has only this effect, That it makes it unlawful for me to revoke my Offer, till I am assured of the other Man's Refusal. For he that profer any thing of his own to another, does neither intend to force it upon him against his Will, nor quite to give it over, and throw it away at a Venture; and therefore he loses nothing of his Right and Title to it, in case the other Person refuse to take it. If a Request pass'd beforehand, it shall continue in Force, unless it be expressly revoked; and in this case the Acceptance is supposed to have been made in the very Petition; provided still, that what is offer'd, be equal to what was desired. For if a Man ask me to lend him a greater Sum, and I profer a less, to make such a Engagement good, his express Acceptance is necessary; in as much as this lesser Sum may perhaps no ways answer his Occasions, or turn to his Profit; and therefore unless this express Acceptance intervenc'd, he shall be responsible only for such a Sum as he first ask'd me to supply him with. It may not here be amiss, to consider Plutarch's Observation, Sympos. l. ix. q. 13. p. 742. B. Edit. Wech. That the Words of the Person that proposeth the Conditions, have much more Power and Authority, than his to whom they are offer'd, in as much as he has no Liberty of adding to them: That is, because the latter can obtain no Right, but what results from the Consent of the former. If the Promiser shew his Agreement to the Request of the other Party, barely by Nodding, or any other Sign of the like Nature, it shall be supposed that the Request was tacitly repeated⁴. Add. Grot. l. ii. c. 16. f. 32.

Add. l. iii. D. de pollicit. Vid. D. l. L. tit. 12. de pollicit. Whence some have concluded, That to render a Promise valid, the bare Act of the Promiser is sufficient. Grotius (l. ii. c. 11. f. 14.) answers, That a Promise once made cannot indeed be revok'd; so as always to lie ready for Acceptance, tho' before Acceptance, the Obligation is not fully contracted. But those who look more closely on that Passage in the Civil Law may find, That Ulpian teaches no more than this⁵; a Covenant is the Consent and Agreement of two Persons, but a Promise is only on the part of the Offerer; where it is not denied, but that Acceptance makes even the latter firm and obligatory. And indeed the State or City, of which Ulpian speaks, had before signified its Acceptance, in case the Promise were made on the Account of Honours already granted, or now desired; and only refused it when the Promise was made without Cause⁶, Vid. l. I. f. 1. d. t. l. xix. D. De donat. And again, l. iii. f. 1. d. t. Things thus deliver'd without

³ Plutarch's Greek is, Κυρίως εἶναι τὸ πρὸς ἑκάστῳ μέρει λόγον—οἱ δὲ δεξιόμενοι καὶ ὑπακείμενοι ἐκείνῳ κώστοι προσθήντες.—Farther, Mr. Hertius observes here, that there is this Difference between Engagements advantageous to one Party only, and such as are for the Advantage of both, that in this last the Promise must exactly answer to the Demand, whereas in the first no such thing is required. For if any one (as the Roman Lawyers express it) says thus, Wilt thou give me ten Crowns? and I answer, twenty; I am engaged for ten only. But on the contrary, if he says, Wilt thou give twenty Crowns? and I answer, ten, I am engaged for no more than ten; for ten is included in twenty, but twenty is not in ten. But in a Contract of Hire, for Example, if the Leasor require ten Crowns, and the Lessee thinks he has hired for five, the first is not obliged to pass it over for that, tho' five be contained in ten. On the contrary, if the Leasor believes he has Lett for five Crowns, and the Lessee understood him ten, this last is obliged to pay no more than the former meant, as the Laws following direct. Si stipulanti mihi decem, tu viginti respondeas, non esse contractam obligationem, nisi in decem constat; ex contrario quoque si me viginti interrogante, tu decem respondeas, obligatio nisi in decem non est contracta; licet enim oportet congruere summam, attamen manifestissimum est viginti & decem inesse. Digest. l. 45. tit. 1. De verb. Obligat. leg. 1. §. 4. Si decem tibi locum fundam, tu autem exiilimes quinque te conducere, nihil agitur. Sed etsi minoris me locata sensero, tu plaris te conducere, utique non plaris erit conductio, quam quanti ego putavi, Lib. 19. tit. 2. Locati conducti, leg. 52.

⁴ For Example, if one says to another, Wilt thou lend me a thousand Crowns, and I will pay thee 5 per Cent. Interest, and repay it in five Months? and he only answers, Yea, or, I will; 'tis as much as if he had said, Yea, I will lend you a thousand Crowns, for which you shall pay me Interest at 5 per Cent. and repay me in five Months; and so he engages himself under those Conditions, and he can require no more of him, and on the other side he can do no less lawfully to oblige us.

Cause⁷, are forbidden to be claim'd; because the Propriety of the Things being already transferr'd on the Community, they could not properly be deliver'd without the publick Acceptance.

Since in all Obligations whatsoever, there is required the Consent of the Person to whom they are directed⁸, or who obtains a Right by them; declaring (by himself, or Deputy) that he accepts the Obligation, and the Right which it transfers to him; and this with Signs sufficient to express the inward purpose of his Mind; we may hence understand somewhat as to the⁹ Firmness of Religious Vows, or Engagements voluntarily undertaken with regard to Almighty God. And it seems impossible to make these with any Force, unless God has by Revelation declared his Acceptance of them; or unless he has constituted some Vicegerent upon Earth, to judge of their Validity. For otherwise a Man cannot be certain, whether it is the Will of God he should, or should not bind himself in this manner; whether his Vows are pleasing or displeasing to Heaven. Especially since the Subject of Vows must be such Matters, as God has not by way of Command punctually and precisely required at our Hands. For 'tis absurd and contradictory, to reckon that an extraordinary Performance, which is a matter of strict and necessary Duty; and how can we be assured, except by Revelation, that any Act which God has not enjoin'd, will be acceptable to him? And to engage in Vows without knowing whether they will be received, or not, is idle and useless. But may we not, in many Cases, reasonably presume on the Divine Consent and Approbation? This we think can only be done in those things which are Indefinitely agreeable to the Law of Nature, and therefore to the Will of God; but in which the Application to Persons, Places, and Times, and the Allotment of the particular Quantity are left to the Pleasure, and the Judgment of Men. Thus we take those Vows to be good and justifiable, by which a Man binds himself to bestow such a Sum of Money in Charity to the Poor, or on other pious Uses; provided that such an Act of Bounty be no Hindrance or Prejudice to any Duty absolutely necessary: Or if he enjoin himself set Days of Fasting; or resolve to abstain from some particular Meats and Drinks, within a fixt Measure and Quantity; or if he deny himself the use of some superfluous Ornaments; as the wearing of Jewels, Pearls, and Gold; or lay any Command or Prohibition on himself of the like Nature; all which Performances fall under some general Virtue, tho' the determinate Manner and Proportion of them are not Matters of strict Precept. On the contrary, such Vows as only create trouble to the Undertaker, and no Benefit to other Men; we esteem no better than idle and superstitious, especially if they prove an Hindrance to other Duties.

A Scruple has been moved sometimes, whether the Obligation in the Promiser begin at the very Moment, when the Offer is accepted by the other Party; or whether it is farther necessary, that the Acceptance be formerly made known to the Promiser? And here it is certain, a Promise may be design'd, and be expounded two ways, either thus, I engage myself to do the thing, if it shall be accepted; or thus, I engage myself to do the thing, if I shall understand that it will be accepted. Now which of these two Senses the Promiser intended, is to be gather'd and presumed from the Nature of the Business. If the Promise were a matter of pure Generosity, without Restriction or Limitation, we are to believe it was meant in the former Sense; because here the Promiser hastens as it were to bind himself, without staying for any Formality in the other Party. But those Promises are to be understood in the latter Sense, which express some arbitrary or mixt Condition essential to the Engagement¹⁰. Compare Grot. l. ii. c. 11. l. 15.

XVI. It remains that we add a Remark or two about the Signs of Consent, which are absolutely necessary to the producing of any Obligation, in as much as the bare Acts of the Will can have no Effect amongst Men, unless manifested and declared by some external Tokens. Of Signs, the more imperfect are some particular Motions and Gestures, necessary to be used in Commerce, when the Parties transacting are unacquainted with the Language of each other. The more perfect are Words, and such Words as are understood on both sides¹. See 1 Cor. xiv. 11. And to make these declare the Will more clearly and more firmly, it has been a constant Practice, both to make use of Witnesses in Contracts of Weight and Moment², to whose Memory and Conscience Appeal might be made, in Case either of the Parties denied the Engagement, or cavil'd at the Expression; and also (as a higher Degree of Confirmation) to set down the Terms of the Covenant in *Writing*³. Instead of which the Grecians sometimes used Tallies, v. D. L. xxii. Tit. 4. de fide

¹⁰ These Terms will be more fully explained, c. 8. of this Book, § 4.

MR. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on §. XVI.

² Testimoniorum usus frequens & necessarius est—ad fidem rei gestæ faciendam. Digest. l. 22. tit. 5, De Testibus, leg. 1. in princip. & leg. 11. The use of Testimonies is usual and necessary to prove Matters of Fact. We shall treat of the use of Witnesses, l. 5. c. 13. § 9.

instrum. For the Memory of Witnesses may be treacherous, or their Integrity capable of Corruption⁴; but Writings are a much stronger Security, both against Forgetfulness, and against Unfaithfulness. And as for bare Words, it is an usual way to elude them, by pleading that they were utter'd thro' Rashness, before the thing had been consider'd. But Writings do exclude all such Prevarication; whilst they are drawing up, they set the Business clearly and leisurely before the Eyes of the Contractor; so that if he once declare his Approbation of them, he must be judg'd to have yielded full Consent to the Engagement, and cannot afterwards pretend that he was drawn in by Passion, or Precipitancy. Nor are Writings liable to such violent and crafty Interpretations, as are often put upon Mens Discourse; in which one Particle artificially inserted, and thro' the quickness of the Pronunciation passing undiscover'd, shall unravel and overturn the whole Affair. And therefore it is not without good Reason, That more Credit is given to authentick and unquestion'd Instruments, than to the Depositions of Witnesses; since what a Man testifies against himself, is much stronger Evidence, than what can be offer'd by others; and since the Charge never lies so heavy upon him, as when his own Authority is produc'd against him: Yet the Force of unquestionable Witnesses must then be admitted as Superior, when they make out by sufficient Proofs, that the Instruments produced are supposititious or corrupted.

Farther, although the Strength and Firmness of Covenants does not absolutely depend on such Writings or Deeds, in as much as they may rightly be made without them⁵, and may as to the Law of Nature still hold good, though these Tokens should by any Accident be lost⁶; yet in Courts of civil Judicature, where they proceed on full and manifest Evidence, the greatest Regard imaginable is had to Credentials of this kind. And commonly if such are not produc'd, the Party who sues another upon a Debt, or Promise, loses his Cause; unless he can make it appear, that they were once actually in his Custody, and that he has been depriv'd of them by some Misfortune. And for this reason it will become a careful Man to secure his Business by good and legal Instruments; and not to rely too much on the bare Words, or Faith of those he deals with. Thus King⁷ Perseus (in Plutarch De vitioso pudore, p. 533. B. T. 2. Ed. Weck.) lending a Friend Money, required Security in the common Form. The Gentleman desiring the reason of his Strictness; I lend according to Law (replied Perseus) that I may receive without Law; in a fair and friendly manner. Juvenal, Sat. 13. ver. 75.

Tam facile & primum est Superos contemnere testes, Si mortalis idem nemo sciat.

When Murena (in Appian. Mithridat. p. 214. C. Ed. H. Steph.) made War upon Mithridates, and was accused by that King's Commissioners of Acting against the League, he sophistically denied, that he ever saw any League. The meaning of which was, that Pompey had not indeed left Articles of Peace in Writing, but thought it sufficient to shew his Agreement by Fact, and accordingly had drawn off his Army. Richerius reports of the Turks, that they are so constant to their Promise, so secure of mutual Fidelity, that in their Bargains they use no Bond or Writing; but the whole Business depends on the Word of the Parties, if present; if not, on the bare mentioning of their Names. Garcilass de la Vega testifies the like of the old Inhabitants of Peru, Royal Comment. l. viii. c. 16. It is vulgarly known, that if a Creditor shall restore the Instrument of Obligation⁸, or shall cancel or destroy it with his own free Consent, and with the Privy of the Debtor, it shall be suppos'd that the Debt is forgiven; but not if the Debtor got the Writings out of his Hand by Stealth, or any other unlawful Means. And from all this it appears, that *Seneca*⁹ carries his Philosophy a Strain too high, when he calls Bonds and Papers of Contract by no better a Name, than Inania habendi simulachra, vain and idle Images of Title and Possession.

II. It follows evidently from hence, That no Obligation can lie to Impossibilities; a Sentence commonly in the Mouths of all sorts of Persons, but such as cannot fully be understood without a clear and accurate Examination. In order to which it may be, in the first place, convenient to distinguish between those Obligations which we voluntarily bring on our selves by our own Act, and those which are laid on us by the Command and Authority of our Superiors. He that of his own free Motion binds himself to perform a thing which he knows to be impossible, cannot be reckon'd well in his Wits²: For he resolves and engages to do that, which at the same time he foresees he shall never be able to compass.

But it does not always follow, That he who by Pact or Promise undertakes an Impossibility, shall be entirely free from all Necessity of Performance, tho' the thing it self cannot strictly be accomplish'd. Indeed, if I have promis'd a Man somewhat, which I had then good Grounds to think would be in my Power, but which is now above my Power, or will be rendred so before the Day of Performance, by an Accident of which at the time of the Bargain I was invincibly ignorant; I seem in this Case, neither obliged to make good my Word, nor to repair the Loss which the other Party suffers by the Disappointment. Especially, if the Possibility of the thing were either expressly mention'd as a necessary Condition, or tacitly presupposed on both sides². For instance, I promise to lend a Horse, which at present is at some Distance from me; and the Horse dies before he gets to me; as I cannot here be bound to make the Horse forth coming, so neither am I responsible for any Damage the Man sustains, who was to have used him. For he must conceive me to have built my Promise on this tacit Condition, provided the Horse arrive safe at my Hands; which Condition failing without my Default, the Force of the Promise sinks and is ineffective. If both the Promiser, and the other Party, know the thing to be impossible, and know each others Conscioufness as to this Point, the Engagement shall pass for no better than a Jest. But if the Promiser only knew the Impossibility, and not the other Party, he shall pay to him what he loses by being thus imposed on. If the Promiser was careless, and neglected to examine and weigh his own Strength, so as to promise an Impossibility, which upon due Consideration he might have found to be such, the main Obligation shall be void; because he supposed the thing to be possible, as a tacit Condition of the Agreement: Yet upon account of his Neglect and Default, he shall be bound to answer the Damage which befalls the other Party, through the Disappointment; but then it must be observ'd, That the Hope and Expectation of Advantage from such an insignificant Promise ought not to come under the Notion of Damage. The same Rule holds good in Covenants, so that he who through Negligence has bargain'd to perform what is impossible, shall be free upon paying what the other Party suffers; but then he must likewise release the other Party from any Obligation made on his side; or if the thing be already given or perform'd, he must either restore it, or offer an Equivalent.

² Or he designs to banter him to whom he is engaged. Mr. Thomasius in his Instit. Jurispr. Div. l. 2. c. 7. §. 81. distinguishes here two sorts of Impossibilities: The one of things absolutely impossible to all Men, as to fly, to touch the Sky with the Hand, &c. the other of those which are impossible to certain Men only, as to have Children, to pay two thousand or an hundred thousand Crowns, &c. The Rules which our Author gives hereafter about the Cases wherein one is bound to fulfil his Promise, tho' of a thing impossible; these Rules, I say, respect the last sort, and not the first. For he that will believe that a Man may fly, or drink up the Sea, is as great a Fool as he that engages to do it.

III. But farther, when the thing at the time of making the Promise or Pact appear'd possible, and afterwards becomes impossible, we must enquire whether this happen'd by meer Chance, or by Default and Deceit. In the former Case the Pact is disannull'd, if nothing has yet been perform'd on either side. If any thing have been already done towards it by one of the Parties, the other shall give it back, or pay the value of it¹; if neither of these can be done, he is to use his best Endeavours, that the Man be not a loser by him. For in Contracts the first Regard is had to the thing expressly mention'd in the Agreement; when this cannot be obtain'd, it is sufficient to give an Equivalent; but whatever happens, all imaginable Care is to be used, that the other Party suffer no Prejudice. But when a Man shall by Trick and Design render himself incapable of performing his Part, he shall not only be bound to do the best he can, but he ought likewise to have some Punishment inflicted on him, as it were in supply to his Defect.

These Principles, well applied, might determine most of the Doubts in the Case of Insolvent Debtors. A Man that falls into such a Condition by Misfortune, and without his own Default, is obliged only to use his utmost Endeavour to give every one their due. And here Equity and Humanity² engage us to make an Allowance of Time, so much as shall be necessary for him to look about him, and to seek out all honest ways and means of Payment³. For to seize immediately on all he possesses, and to send him and his Family a begging, would be a most unmerciful Barbarity. The *Roman Laws*⁴ were so favourable to certain Persons, in Cases there specified, as to order that they should be condemned in no deeper Sum than they were able to make good⁵. Yet unless the Creditor shall have forgiven all that exceeds their present Abilities, they shall be bound to pay the Residue, upon the Improvement of their Fortune and Condition. Those who have turned Bankrupt out of Knavery, or some other way, by their own Fault, may be justly compell'd to undergo some painful Punishment⁶; that their Body may in some measure pay for the Defect of their Purse⁷.

In the Case between the Creditor and the Debtor, there is another Point that ought to be consider'd; through what Cause or what Necessity the Man contracted so deep Scores. And he deserves more or less Commiseration and Favour, as the Cause was more or less grievous and unavoidable. For this reason Merchants and other great Traders, though undone by meer Accident and Misfortune, are reckon'd to be in a Condition less capable of Mercy, than others who have been driven by some particular Urgency to the like insolvent State. For the former took up so large Sums on Trust, purely for the sake of making farther Gain and Advantage by them. And in as much as they profess the Art of growing Rich as their peculiar Calling, they are to be blamed for not foreseeing and preventing even Casualties, such as the losing all they are worth at one sudden Stroke; since they ought not to have ventured their whole Effects in a single Bottom. This is contrary to the Judgment of Pliny, who thinks it the safest Course to try the Uncertainty of Fortune by Variety of Possessions. Epist. 19. l. iii. numb. 4. Ed. Cellar. King Philip (in Justin. l. ix. c. 1. in fin.) besieging Byzantium without Success, at the same time made an Inroad into Scythia, for the sake of Plunder; seeking (according to the Policy of Merchants and Dealers) to defray the Expences of one War with the Spoils of another.

Livy (l. xl. c. 21. p. 661. in fin. Ed. Gronov.) reports of Antigonus, That being in great Distress at Sea, when he had all his Friends with him in the Ship, he call'd his Children about him, and strictly charg'd them both to remember themselves, and to caution their Posterity, That they never engaged with their whole Family together in Difficulty or Danger.

Yet it is plain the antient Romans had little regard to these different Circumstances. For thus Seneca argues (Benef. l. vii. c. 16.)⁸ Can you imagine our Forefathers were so imprudent, as not to apprehend how unjust it must be to put a Man who had waded a Loan in Dice or Lewdness, in the same Case with him, who by Fire, Thieves, or some sadder Misfortune, had lost other Mens Money with his own? They allow'd no Excuse, that Men might learn in all Cases most strictly to keep their Faith. And it were more safe to reject the just Plea of a few, than to admit all to a Privilege of offering their Apologies. In Moscow, insolvent Debtors are first found-

Mr. BARBÈYRAC'S NOTES on §. III.

¹ This is true in such Agreements where the transferring Property is not concerned, as in Contracts of Hiring; but it is not so in them, where a Right of Property is acquired, as for Example, in a Bargain and Sale. For if a thing so'd perish by mischance, the Loss is the Buyer's, who has the Property and the principal Right in him, if we consider the Principles of natural Right. Hence it is that the Seller keeps the Price of his Goods, or causes the Buyer to pay it, tho' he has never received them. Titius Observat. 230. See what is said, l. 5. c. 5. §. 3.

ly whip'd, and then compell'd to be Slaves to their Creditors ⁷.

IV. It is proper for us on this Subject to examine the Notion of Mr. Hobbes ^a, which he seems to lay down in too general a Manner, That Covenants do not oblige to the thing itself, but only to the utmost Endeavour. That is, since we are not obliged to Impossibilities, and since nothing is in our power but our utmost Endeavours, what we cannot by its means obtain, is to us impossible, and consequently is excluded from being the Matter of Obligation. But he ought indeed to have inserted this Condition, Provided we have not by our own Fault and Fraud incapacitated our selves for such a Performance. For if this be our Case, the Obligation is not satisfied by our utmost Endeavour; but when our power of Payment ceaseth, our Punishment must come in to make up the rest. Therefore the Assertion ought to be limited to those Covenants, in which upon account of some Thing or Action at present reach'd out unto us, we promise some future Labour or Assistance. For here, since such Futurities are uncertain to human Foresight, so that either our Strength may by some Accident be impair'd, or some unaccountable turn of Things may render it extremely difficult, if not utterly impossible for us to meet with an Opportunity of Performance; and farther, since our Sagacity may be mistaken either in rating our own Power, or in weighing the Difficulty of the Undertaking; the Contractors must for these Reasons be suppos'd to have been mindful of their own frail Nature, and consequently not to have agreed on any future Action or Work, but with this Condition and Proviso, That their Abilities and Opportunities remain'd the same, and that they had not overrated their present Strength. In these Cases then, he who has us'd his utmost Endeavour may be rightly said to have done his Duty; especially when in the very midst of the Performance some cross Adventure, which we could not possibly have prevented, falls in, and either quite intercepts, or wrests aside the Fruit of our Labour.

That the Rule will hold good only in this kind of Covenants, is further evident from what Mr. Hobbes discourseth immediately before. We very frequently, says he, contract about such things as then indeed seem possible, but which afterwards we find to be impossible ^b; yet this does not free us from all Obligation. And the reason is, because he who promises an Uncertainty hereafter, receives a present Good, on the Condition of returning the like. But now the Will of him who offers the present Good, has for its absolute Object any return of good equal in Value to the thing expressly promis'd by the other Party; but the thing itself is affected, not strictly and absolutely, but under Condition of its Possibility. Yet on the contrary, I would choose to say, That whosoever exhibits to another any present Good, does absolutely and directly bend his Desire towards that particular future Good, express'd in the Bargain; and this as well in Contracts of giving, as in Contracts of doing. For the Law of Nature doth not seem to afford Ground for that Distinction which some make, that in Bargains of giving a Man is precisely obliged to give; whereas in Bargains of doing, he is not precisely obliged to do the Work, but may be releas'd by a Commutation. But when he cannot obtain what was peculiarly promis'd, he then, to keep himself from suffering Loss, desires something of equal Value. And if this too cannot be paid him, nor the thing restor'd which he first gave on his Part, the other Man fully satisfies his Obligation by offering what his Abilities will admit of.

But in Contracts of Lending, and others of the same Nature, it will not hold that the Debtor is freed from his Obligation, by using his utmost Ability and Endeavour. For when any thing is taken in way of Loan (especially if it be not in a case of extreme ² Necessity) the Creditor supposes that the Debtor is both willing and able to pay, and the Debtor himself pretends as much; and on this Supposition the whole Contract is founded. If then at the time prefix'd for Payment, the Debtor with all his Stock and Effects cannot make up the Sum; tho' here it be at present impossible to squeeze more out of him; yet he shall stand engaged to make good the rest hereafter ^c.

In simple Promises when we engage to do a thing which is not, as to the Event, fully and absolutely in our Power; some such Condition as this ought always to be understood, If Fortune favour me, if no cross Accident intervene, or what better becomes the Piety of a Christian, if it please God ^d. But positively to swear or vow that we will accomplish such an uncertain Enterprize, is not only most extravagant Rashness, but most wicked Presumption. Such was the Oath of Labienus and his Party, recorded by Cæsar, by which they engaged themselves not to return into their Camp without obtaining the Victory ^e.

⁷ Among the Athenians also insolvent Debtors were given to their Creditors to be made their Slaves, or to sell them into Foreign Countries, and many were forced to sell their Children; but Solon abolish'd that inhumane Custom. See Plutarch in his Life. Some also have thought, that among the Romans there was a Law of the 12 Tables, which allowed Creditors to cut their Debtors in Pieces, and part them among them, which Opinion is supported by the Authority of Quintilian, Instit. Orat. l. 3. c. 6. Aul. Gell. Noct. Attic. l. 20. c. 1. and Tertull. Apologet. c. 4. But Mr. Bynkerhook proves fully in his Observation, l. 1. c. 1. that it allowed only the Sale of his Person to his Creditor by way of Auction. We may compare with this Book a Memoir found in the Acta Eruditorum at Leipsick, Febr. 1710.

¹ It is a Principle of the Roman Law, Si minus, quia non facit, quod promissit, in pecuniam numeratam condemnatur; sicut evenit in omnibus faciendis obligationibus, (i. e.) V. There is another knotty Question proposed by Mr. Hobbes, which we ought here to discuss, Whether a Man can by Covenant oblige himself to suffer such Evils, as exceed the ordinary Strength and Constancy of human Minds? For instance, whether he can bind himself not to resist another, who shall go about to kill or to wound him? Now whoever closely and carefully considers this Point, will be able to discover on what account Mr. Hobbes thought good to take the negative Side; namely, to shew that bare Pacts are not a sufficient Guard and Caution to the Security of Mankind; and that 'tis not enough for a Man to engage by Covenant, that he will freely undergo due Punishment, so often as he shall commit an Injury; but for the Preservation of Peace in the World, it is farther necessary that civil Governments should be establish'd, which may bring Offenders to Justice, tho' against their Wills. Which Principle we acknowledge to be most just and true, and shall enlarge upon it in its proper Place. At present it may be worth our while to examine more nearly the Arguments which he produces. He says then, No Man is by any Covenant which he shall make, obliged not to resist another, when he offers mortal Violence, or Wounds, or any bodily Mischief. For there is implanted in every one the highest Degree of Fearfulness, by which he apprehends the threaten'd Evil, as the greatest imaginable, and therefore, by a natural Necessity, flies and avoids it as much as possible; and is suppos'd incapable of doing otherwise. When he is arriv'd at such a height of Fear, it cannot be expected but that he will consult his own Safety by Flight, or by Combat. Since then no Man can be obliged to an Impossibility, those to whom Death, or Wounds, or other corporal Pains are presented, and who have not Constancy enough to bear them, are not bound to venture the Trial. Upon this Argument we may remark, that to suffer Death without Reluctancy, is not a thing absolutely beyond human Strength. And therefore if God has commanded us to lay down our Lives, rather than commit some particular Action, no doubt but we are strictly bound to yield a ready Obedience. But thus much we are willing to acknowledge, that since such a Degree of Constancy is beyond the Strength of the Generality of Men, no one shall be presumed to have bound himself by his own free Covenant to such a rigorous Task. For human Laws and human Contracts ought all to be made with an Eye and Regard to human Infirmary.

Yet this Consideration ought not to be drawn so far, as to prejudice the Force of military Discipline; as if a Soldier under imminent Peril of Death might desert his Post, upon pretence, that a Man cannot be obliged to undergo Death, as being a thing impossible. For we deny that it is a thing above the Fortitude of Mankind, especially of the military Sex, to sustain a probable Danger of Death, still join'd with a Power of resisting to the last. And there scarce ever happens such a Case in War, that some Persons must be thrown away, and offer'd up as Victims to the Enemy, without a Liberty and an Opportunity of defending themselves by Courage, or by Craft. So that it appears from the Necessity of preserving Commonwealths, and from the Use and Practice of all Nations, that whenever it is requisite, a Commander may lawfully enjoin a Soldier to oppose the Enemy in such a Station assign'd him to his last Breath, tho' 'tis probable he may die upon the spot; and may as lawfully inflict capital Punishment on those who shall quit their Post, after such an express Order to the contrary. For he that lifts himself in the Number of armed Men, does by that Act lay aside all Claim to the Excuse of natural Fearfulness, and is bound not only to enter the Field, but likewise not to leave it, without the Order of his Leader. Neither is there any Absurdity in that martial Punishment of killing a Man, because he declined being killed. For is it not much worse to suffer ignominiously under the Hand of the Executioner, than to fall with Honour under the Sword of the Enemy? Add. l. i. c. 28. De Senatusconsulto Silianiano & Claudiano, &c. By one of the Roman Laws, Servants who prefer'd their own Lives before their Masters were punish'd with Death, D. B. 29. t. 5. We must add, that in case a Person be of so weak and cowardly a Temper, as to shrink at those Dangers which the common Hardiness of Men is able to sustain; his peculiar Infirmary of Mind shall by no means absolve him from his Obligation.

Mr. Hobbes proceeds to observe, that since we dare trust him, who is bound to us by Covenant, whilst we lead Criminals to execution in Chains, and under Guards; it should seem that they are not by Covenant sufficiently obliged to Non-resistance. The Remark in most Cases is true³, yet sometimes Persons really bound by Covenant to us, are not so absolutely trusted, but that we think it expedient to provide against their Perfidiousness by a Security of arm'd Men^b. He adds, A Covenant of this kind would be useless; a Man indeed may covenant thus, Unless I do this or that in the appointed day, kill me; that is, you shall have a Right of proceeding to capital Punishment against me upon my Default; but to covenant thus, Unless I do so or so, I will not resist you when you come to kill me, is a thing both unpractis'd and insignificant. He proves his Point after this manner: "Such a Covenant must be made, either between a State and a Subject, or between two Subjects of the same State, or between two Persons living in a Condition of natural Liberty.

MR. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on §. V.

² Servi quotiens Domini suis auxilium ferre possunt, non debent eorum salutem suam anteponeere. — Ultimum itaque supplicium pati debet [Ancilla, cui Percussor Domine mortem minatus erat, si proclamasset] vel hoc, ne ceteri servi credant, in periculo Minorum sibi quemque consulere debere.

“In the first Case it would be useleſs, becauſe ’tis enough to ſecure to a State the Power of puniſhing Offenders, if each particular Subject engages by Oath or Fealty, that he will not forcibly defend or reſcue any Perſon, who ſhall be thus led to ſuffer Juſtice. In the ſecond Caſe it would be alike impertinent; becauſe in civil Governments private Men have not the Right of killing. In the third and laſt Caſe, it would be of no more Uſe or Force than in the former; becauſe if the Parties covenanted, that one of them ſhould be kill’d upon Non-performance, a preceding Covenant muſt be ſuppos’d to have paſs’d, importing that he ſhall not be kill’d before the day fix’d for Performance.” For according to his Hypotheſis, in a State of Nature, before any Paſts have been introduced, each Man hath a Right of killing each Man eſſe. “Therefore upon default of Performance, on the ſet day there returns a Right of War, or a hoſtile State, in which it is lawful for any Man to attempt what he pleaſes againſt another; and conſequently the Right of reſiſting will return at the ſame time.” I would rather chooſe to eſtabliſh the Truth of the Aſſertion another way, by ſaying, that the Force of Covenants, if ſtrain’d to the higheſt, does reach ſo far, as not only to lay on the Parties an intrinſical Neceſſity of performing the Conditions, but likewiſe to give each of them a Right of compelling the other to a Compliance †, in caſe he draw back, by propoſing and preſenting ſome Evil. And that therefore every Covenant may be reſolv’d into this Senſe, I engage to do this or this for you; if I fail, you ſhall have a Power of compelling me by violent Means. Now to add a ſecond Covenant about Non-reſiſtance, would here be uſeleſs and abſurd. For then this ſecond Covenant muſt be enforc’d again by a third, including ſome Penalty, as if I reſiſt you, when you attempt to compel me to Performance, you ſhall have a Power of offering Violence or Evil to me. Thus it is plain, the ſecond Covenants add nothing at all to the firſt; for the firſt gave a Power of reducing the Deſailant by Violence; and ’tis as eaſy to break this as that. What need is there then of backing one Covenant with another, when ten may as well be broken thro’ as one?

The laſt Argument urg’d by Mr. Hobbes, runs thus: Could there be ſuch a thing as a Covenant for Non-reſiſtance, we ſhould by it be oblig’d out of two preſent Evils, to chooſe that which appear’d the greater. For certain Death is a greater Evil than Reſiſtance and Combat. But of two Evils it is impoſſible for us not to chooſe the leſſer; therefore by ſuch a Covenant we ſhould be tied to an Impoſſibility, which contradicts the whole Nature of mutual Engagement. Now here it is neceſſary, that the Rule about chooſing the leſſer Evil, be accurately ſtated and explain’d. And this properly ſpeaking, can take place only in two unprofitable or hurtful Evils, conſider’d as ſuch. In which Caſe it looks like a kind of Gain, to ſuffer only a Part of an inevitable Loſs or Damage: But the ſame Rule muſt by no means be extended and applied to the Caſe of two dishoneſt Evils, or of two Evils, the one dishoneſt, the other unprofitable. For of two Evils of Commiſſion, we are to chooſe neither. But it ſometimes happens, that we cannot fulfil two affirmative Precepts, the Omiſſion of which, ſeparately conſider’d, would be ſinful, yet upon their meeting together the Omiſſion of one of them is look’d upon as lawful. And in this Caſe of the two Evils of Omiſſion, the leſſer is to be choſen, or rather the interfering with a more noble Precept, ſhews the Omiſſion of the leſs noble Precept to be no Evil, or Sin. For in all inferior and ſubordinate Laws, this Reſtriction is ever underſtood, So far as we can comply with them, and not intrench on Engagements of a higher Nature. Thus not to obey God, and not to obey the civil Magiſtrate, if taken aſunder, are both notoriously Sins; and yet, ſuppoſing both the Obligations cannot at once be answer’d, as when the Magiſtrate commands any thing contrary to the Divine Law, in this Caſe, Diſobediencce to our earthly Governors ceases to be Evil; becauſe that Law which binds us to conform to the Will of human Sovereigns, is always underſtood with this Proviſo and Condition, that they enjoyn nothing repugnant to the Laws of God.

We are in many Caſes likewiſe permitted, rather to chooſe the bare Execution of another Man’s Sin †, or a Concurrence by way of Inſtrument, than ſome Evil, very prejudicial, or very grievous to be born, with which we are threaten’d upon reſuſal. Which Point we have elſewhere more largely diſcuſs’d.

Neither is it allowable, as was juſt now hinted, to make any ſuch Compariſon between an Evil, troubleſome or damageable, and a Sin, ſo as to chooſe the latter rather than the former; as for inſtance: If a Man ſhould rather act contrary to his expreſs Duty, than ſlip the Opportunity of ſome Advantage, or ſuſtain ſome real Loſs; how poſitive ſoever his corrupt Judgment may be in concluding the Sin to be the leſſer Evil. For, were this admitted, the Force and Efficacy of Obligations would depend upon every Man’s Opinion; and conſequently would vaniſh into nothing, if I were not bound to an Action, when the Omiſſion of it upon account of ſome external Regard, appear’d to me more deſirable than its Performance. Thus it would be but a poor Excuse for a Thief to alledge for himſelf, that he thought it a leſs Evil to lay Hands on the Goods of his Neighbours, than to get his Livelihood by his own Pains and Labour. Indeed Obligations are ſo far from loſing their Force in theſe Caſes, that they never exert it more vigorously; for ’tis the very Nature of ſuch Engagements to produce in Men an intrinſical Neceſſity of ſuch Performances, as they would otherwiſe be averſe to, upon outward Conſiderations and Reſpects.

VI. To make a Promise or Paſt truly obligatory, it is farther requiſite, that we have a moral Power of performing the thing agreed upon. And if the thing be unlawful, and we conſequently want this Power, we cannot tie ourſelves by any ſuch Engagement †a. For every Promise receives its

† And by conſequence the other is oblig’d not to reſiſt, till he ſhall obtain his Right, otherwiſe his Right will do him no good. See concerning this Mr. Thomasius’s Jurisprud. Divin. l. 3. c. 7. §. 88, &c.

Force from the Ability of the Promiser², and never reacheth farther; for a Man cannot bind himself with any Effect to a Business which he wants Ability to compass. But now the Law by forbidding any Action takes from us the moral Power or Ability of setting about it, and of entering on any Obligation to perform it. For would it not be most absurd and contradictory, that an Obligation which derives its Virtue from the Law, should put us under a Necessity of doing somewhat which the Law absolutely prohibits? And when we are once plac'd in Subjection to Laws, the bare Act of our own Will is not sufficient to repeal or to evade them. Therefore he who promiseth a thing unlawful, sins,

² The Validity of unlawful Agreements not being sufficiently explain'd by our Author, who has treated of it too generally, and without regard to such true Principles as the Solution of divers Cases contain'd in it depends on, I have thought fit to propound such Meditations as I have had about this Subject, ever since the first Edition of this Book, under these Heads:

I. That every Act which is attended with something contrary to the Rules of Virtue, is not invalid upon that Account barely. provided that the thing in which we are engaged be innocent in itself; it implies, that one or other of the Contractors, or both of them, offend in certain respects, viz. the Engagement, without considering the Parties, as not accompanied with all the Qualities of Right. Not to speak of ill Motives, which render the most innocent Actions criminal. As for example, a Merchant who deals in contraband Goods, may act against his own and Family's Interest, without being obliged to perform the Bargains he has made for them. A Vintner, who spends all his time in drinking with Drunkards, certainly does ill, as well as they to whom he gives an Opportunity to be drunk; yet he is not obliged to pay for the Wine these Men have drank, nor are they less obliged to pay him for it. Gamesters by Profession commit divers sorts of Sin by playing, as I have shew'd in my Treatise of Games, but that does not hinder, that such as have gain'd by fair Play, may lawfully take their Winnings, and require what is due to them. Further, we ought to consider that the End of a Law which forbids certain things, is not only to make void all that may be done upon that account; but to hinder their Commission, and, above all, to slip them of their proper and immediate Effects, especially if they are of any Continuance. So, for example, if a Judge, who is corrupted, gives an unjust Sentence, he, in whose Favour it is given, may in Conscience take the Benefit of the Judgment; but if the Effect of an Engagement contracted by means of some unlawful thing, exists entirely, the Law will not authorize it, but leaves the things in the State they were, and denies the Contractor its Protection, as not deserved by him. This being laid down, we must

II. Distinguish between that which is contrary to Natural Right, and that which is unlawful only, because it is forbidden by some Civil Law. As to those sorts of Agreements which proceed from the first sort of things unlawful, I shall reduce them to these following Rules. 1. If after any one has engaged himself in a thing unlawful in itself, he will not perform it, he to whom he is engaged can't force him, and he can't reasonably complain that he has broke his Word, whether he hath got any thing by it, or no. The Reason of it is, not only because (as our Author speaks very well) the Lawgiver by forbidding it takes away all Liberty to do it, and by consequence also all Right of requiring it of any Person whatsoever; but also in every Matter wherein he is engaged contrary to his Duty, it may be presumed that he did not give his full and free Consent, especially if he be to act any enormous Crime, as if a Man promise to blaspheme, or commit Sacrilege, or Perjury, or murder a Man, &c. When then he comes to repent of his Criminal Engagement, 'tis not a bare Presumption, tho' that be sufficient, but 'tis an infallible Sign that he did not think that he promised such things, and he to whom he promised them ought to acquit him for that Reason, since 'tis the very same which we all make use of in not keeping our Word. If he has got nothing by it, he has lost nothing, tho' he deserves it. But if he hath given any thing, as it was under a Condition, and that such an one as is thought morally impossible, he must restore it, because it was not given with any regard to him, and so much the more, because he can't keep it without giving some Reason to believe that he does really repent; and that to his Fault in promising he adds another of having a Design of making an Advantage of his Error, and cheating him of his Substance. Restitution is in this Case indispensibly necessary, since he that gave it thought he did well in promising a thing upon a bad Foundation; as if a blind Person thro' a false Zeal should promise another to change his Religion against the Dictates of his own Conscience. 2. If he whom we have engaged to commit a Crime, doth actually execute it, we are not obliged to pay him what we have promised him. This were to reward a Crime, and encourage thereby not only him that has already broken the Law, but others to break it hereafter for the like Motives. On the other side, he to whom the Promise is made, may and ought to know, that he does not think it a thing to which any Man would engage himself with mature Deliberation; and if he pretends certainly to enjoy the Reward of his Crime, he is a Fool to trust to a bare Promise. The only reasonable Foundation for hopes that a Man's Word will be kept, is the Honesty of him that gives it; and can we repose any Confidence in that Man, who requires things contrary to Honesty? How faithful soever he may be believed, who expects us to keep our Engagements, in that he has solicited us to do an ill thing, have we not reason to think that he will no more scruple to break his Word, than to require what he propos'd, when we gave him ours? He certainly offends against Charity, who will oblige any Man to do an ill thing for a Reward's sake. But since it belongs to us to reject his Proposition, and we are indispensibly obliged so to do, he can't require the Performance of our Promise upon a pretence that we do him an Injury, or frustrate his Design; because, tho' he seems to be injured, he must blame himself for it. As he ought to repent that he hath attempted with too much Success, so he must presume that we promised but loosely, and are left to hearken to our own Passions. 3. But when we have given any thing on the Occasion or Prospect of an evil Action, we can demand nothing again from him who hath received it. For when the Wickedness is done, there is no help; we do not render ourselves more culpable by leaving that which is not in our Power to take away. When there is only a bare Promise, the Will of transferring the thing promised upon that Account, must not be thought full and entire: We promise much easier than perform, and when we have promised on the View of some Criminal Action, there is a Space before the Execution following to presume he may recant his rash Engagement; but the same Moment that he delivers the thing agreed on, he strips himself absolutely of the Right of Property, and he to whom he gave it, acquires it, by a Title dishonest indeed, but not unjust in relation to us; because it shews the same Consent of the Proprietor as if he had done something honest or indifferent. The Validity of an Alienation consider'd in itself doth not depend on the Nature of the Subject for which we part with a thing in respect to another. Let the Motive be good, or not, we are Masters of our own Goods, and may dispose of them as we please; all the Abuse of them is, when we bestow them not with a Prospect of something honest, or at least indifferent. If a transferring of Property becomes null only because there was something dishonest in the Subject, we shall easily find a thousand Pretences to elude the most lawful Contracts. A Man, for example, who has borrow'd Money at the most reasonable Interest, may refuse to pay any Interest, or require what he hath paid, under a pretence that he believes paying of Usury unlawful, and contrary to Natural Right. But (says Mr. Titius Objerv. in Lauterbach. 354.) one of the Contractors gains, and the other loses; and why should either of them have any Advantage, since they both sin? I answer with our Author, §. 9. That he that hath given, believes himself to have receiv'd a thing of equal value. As is the Price, such is the Pay. 'Tis not material, whether in the main there be any Advantage, 'tis sufficient that the Pleasure of Satisfaction is reputed for a real Gain. Further, tho' if we consider him who hath received, that he deserves no Reward for his Crime, no more doth he deserve to recover what he hath given. For he that rewards another for committing a Sin, is commonly esteem'd, and that with reason, more to blame than he who suffer'd himself to be corrupted, because he committed the Wickedness with more Deliberation, and bribed a Person to do evil, who perhaps would not have been guilty of such a foul Action. To deprive a Man then of all Right of recovering what is actually given for an Action evil in its own Nature, it may suffice, that the Acquirement was made near to the Rules of Contracts used in Cases honest or innocent, that is to say, there was no Fraud nor Force practis'd on the part of the Receiver, and the Price was not exorbitant. But it may be further said, Can any Man in Conscience retain the infamous Reward of the Crime he has committed? No, without doubt. If we suppose a Person to examine himself, and consult his own Conscience, the Question is needless: For such an one can't but repent, and then he will neither regard nor demand the Reward of Iniquity, nor keep it, if he has received it already. But if it be restored, it will not follow that he has any Right to require it; and if he knows that he may require what he has given on this occasion, he may have recourse to those Means which are proper to recover what another refuses to give. The Case has place chiefly in the Independence of the State of Nature, and it seems to me that then the Restoration is not more just in respect but he sins doubly, who performs it ^a. Whence this farther Consequence may be drawn, that those Promises are not to be kept ^b, which would prove hurtful to the Person to whom they are made; it being a general Command of the Law of Nature, that we do no harm to another, knowingly and wilfully, though he out of Folly should desire it.

Moreover, since a good and valid Obligation cannot be contracted about unlawful Matters, it follows that Acts undertaken against legal Constitutions, are, by Virtue of the same Law, null and void, or the Magistrate is supposed to have already declar'd them so ^b. Yet in many Cases, it is a constant Practice in Commonwealths, to impose a Fine on the Performer of some unlawful Act, and not to disannul the Act, because there was perhaps, more Indecency in the momentary Performance, than in the Effects consequent upon it; and because frequently the Inconveniences attending a Disannulment would be greater than the Act it self, if permitted to stand valid, would produce ^c ^d.

VII. To proceed distinctly in a closer Examination of this Point, it is first mov'd as a Question, whether an Obligation for the Performance of an Act in it self vicious, be good and valid, whilst things stand as at first, and no step is made towards the Execution? And here it is certain, That such a vicious ^e Agreement does produce an Obligation on neither side, and that Parties ought in Honesty to recede from their Bargain ^f. Senec. Hercul. Oct. v. 480, 481.

respect to him that gave, than the Approbation of the Subject for which he gave, can be a Commendation to him. 'Tis upon this that we must ground the Maxim of the Roman Law, which imports, That if an Agreement be dishonest, both in respect to him that gives and receives, the first can't require any thing again, but in this Case the Possessor has the Advantage. Porro autem, si dantis & accipientis turpis causa sit, possessorem potiorum esse, & ideo repetitionem cessare, tametsi ex stipulatione solutum est, Digest. l. 12. tit. 5. De conditione ob turp. & injuri. causam, leg. 8. In which nevertheless the Roman Lawyers do not always follow their own Principles, since when Men play at the Game call'd Hazard, which was forbidden, and look'd upon as dishonest, they allowed the Loser to require his Money again, even beyond the ordinary Term of Prescription. But as I have shew'd in my Treatise of Gaming, l. 3. c. 9. §. 15. in this last Case the unhappy Gamer can have no recourse to Justice to recover his Money, because in taking upon him to game, he renounces the Benefit of the Law. The same thing may have place in my Judgment, and for the same Reason, in all other dishonest Engagements, supposing that the Law permits Men to recover again what they have given on that Account. Thus much of things evil in themselves, and contrary to the unchangeable Rules of natural Right, after which it will not be hard to state the Validity of such Agreements as are not unlawful, otherwise than as they border upon such things as civil Laws forbid. But here we must distinguish between a Stranger and a Fellow-Citizen. 1. If we treat with a Stranger about things forbidden in our Country, he either knows them forbidden, or not. If he knows them, he has either searched out the Agreement, or not; if he has searched out the Agreement, we are obliged neither to do the thing, nor to make good the Damage he may have by it, but only to restore what he has already given. The Reason is, because in this Case he may and ought to suppose that we are but slightly engag'd, and that we are tempted by the advantageous Propositions that he made us. Besides, we often expose our selves to great Mults, and other Punishments more troublesome, of which we can't suppose that any Person would run the risque. But if we our selves had searched the Agreement, we are not really obliged to execute the same thing, but we must indemnify him with whom we are engaged. I say, we are not obliged to execute the same thing; for tho' Strangers are not strictly obliged to inform themselves of what passes among us, and may behave themselves as they see convenient, without enquiring into the particular Laws of our State, yet they ought in Equity to presume, that a Citizen who recants an Engagement which he has entered into contrary to his Duty, did not engage with mature Deliberation, or at least did not foresee the Obstacles that oppos'd the Execution of his Promise. But since he has searched the Agreement, and seems to have pass'd all these Considerations upon it, 'tis just that some way or other he should indemnify him that has trusted to him. But if the Stranger knows not of the Prohibitions, whether he has searched the Agreement, or no, then we have a more indispensable Obligation to render to him all that he hath suffered by trusting to our Word; and we ought to think our selves happy that he doth not impute it to us as an Injury that we are silent, and let him take other Measures than he would have done if we had spoken our Minds freely. But if the Prohibitions come only when the Market is made and concluded, then we are not obliged to make good any Damages. For in this we ought to be supposed not to have consented but under a tacit Condition, that there was no Obstacle from the Sovereign. 2. But if those that treat together about a thing forbidden by the Law, are Members of the same State, they are both subject to the Punishment really, because they could not be ignorant of the Law, and upon that Account they are looked upon to treat together as if there were no Law about it, and so to renounce the Benefits which might accrue thereby to either of them. So, though they did ill to engage themselves, they ought, as far as in them lies, to suffer their Engagement to continue in force, and neither of them to break it without the Consent of the other; yet if we can't execute the thing to which we are engaged without some great Prejudice, he to whom we have promised should content himself with an Equivalent. I say, every one ought, as far as in him lies, to suffer the Engagement to take effect, for so long as there is nothing done on either part, each of them is free to recant, as if they had done a thing evil in its own Nature, because in this Case we may be thought to have consulted well, or acted with mature Deliberation. As for Example, if I have promised any Man to game with him contrary to Law, I am no more obliged to meet him, than to present my self in the Field to that Man who has challenged me to a Duel, which I have accepted; but when I have actually play'd and lost, I cannot have a recourse to Law to recover my Money, nor use any forcible way to regain it; especially if there was no Cheat put upon me by him who has won it of me. See my Treatise of Gaming, l. 3. c. 9. §. 15, 16. So again, if a Merchant has promised another to furnish him with certain contraband Goods; when they have agreed for the Price, the one may refuse to stand to the Bargain that he ought not to have made, and the other, with whom he has not kept his Word, ought to repent that he had promised such a thing, and be easy that it took not effect; but if the Merchandize be actually delivered, or any thing be received as an earnest of Delivery, which is therefore hoped, neither the Buyer can lawfully refuse to pay the Price agreed on in the first Case, nor the Seller himself to deliver the Bargain without some Prejudice to himself, and incurring a great Punishment: For then 'tis sufficient to restore what he has received, or an Equivalent. With these Limitations nothing hinders but that an Engagement contrary to the Laws purely civil may be of Force between one Bargainer and another. There are Agreements which the Laws forbid, but they suffer them nevertheless to subsist contrary to their Prohibition, for they may be valid between the Parties, altho' the Law nulls them, in as much as that and the Magistrate allow no Action for the Relief of either of them after they have consented with full and entire Liberty.

Obligat.* ^b Lex Wisigothorum, l. 2. tit. 5. c. 7. ^c Thus in Apollonius Rhodius, Argon. l. 4. Aleinous being constituted Umpire between the Colchians and the Argonautes, gave Judgment as follows, "That if Medea had been acquainted with Jason's Bed, she should still remain in his Possession, if not, she should be restored to her Father. We have the same Story in Hygin. Fab. 23. Apollodor. Biblioth. l. 1. l. 25. Orpheus in Argon.

Thus for Instance, if a Man hire an Assassine to commit a Murder, and the Assassine upon better Thoughts resolves against the Villany, the Hirer cannot compel him to fulfil his Covenant. And on the other Hand, if the Hirer repenting of his wicked Design, orders the Assassine not to proceed, the Assassine shall not force him to continue in his Resolution for fear of losing the promis'd Wages. Neither shall he in this Case demand the Money of the Hirer, as on whose account purely he now desisted, and was hindred from earning it. Nay, if after he has been thus countermanded he go on, and accomplish the Mischief, the Hirer shall not be guilty of the whole Fact, but shall be condemn'd only in so much as shall seem a proportionable Penalty, for conceiving a Murder in his Imagination, of which he repented before it was put in Execution.

Grotius^a observes, That a Promise of this kind is therefore vicious and void, because it is made to excite a Man to do a wicked Act^b.

VIII. It is a second Point of Enquiry, whether in Case such a Villany having been once committed, according to the Bargain, the other Party be obliged to pay the Price agreed upon? Which Grotius affirms; because, says he, the Price or Reward before the Fact was accomplish'd had indeed a Blemish and Imperfection, as being the Incentive to Wickedness, which Blemish ceateth, when the Wickedness is once past, and the Crime perform'd. But we cannot but declare our selves of a contrary Opinion; for a Bargain of this kind is so far from ceasing to be vicious, when the Deed is over, that it seems then to arrive at its highest pitch of Baseness, as having gain'd its end. Unless it be a smaller degree of Sin to have stolen, than to think of stealing; to receive the Wages of Villany, than to hope for and expect them; to pay the Reward, than to promise it. Indeed if the Promise be in its self vicious, because it is the Incentive to Wickedness, the fulfilling of the Promise will certainly be vicious, as being the Recompence of Wickedness, and an Encouragement and Invitation to new Mischiefs. And on this account some secret Stain or Blemish is commonly thought to stick on such Rewards, even after they have pass'd to a third Possessor by a just Title; because they were at first the Wages of Iniquity. Thus the Jews were forbidden to bring the Price of Whoredom, as an Offering, into the House of God^c. Thus when Judas^d brought back the Wages of his Treason, the chief Priests thought it not lawful to put it into the Treasury. And thus it is a known Proverb, That a Family seldom thrives on an ill-gotten Estate^e. Therefore we can by no means assent to what Grotius delivers, That till the Time of performing the Villany, the Force and Efficacy of a vicious Promise remains in suspense; just as doth the Efficacy of conditional Promises, till the Condition be made good, and of Promises about things at present impossible, till the things do really fall under our Power, as we have probable Hopes they will, at our first making the Bargain: But that when the Fact is once committed, the Obligation then breaks out, and exerts its Force, which was not at first entirely wanting (in as much as the thing was done by mutual Consent) but was only hindred from displaying it self by that Vice or Defect, with which it is attended; namely, its contributing to the Commission of a Sin. But should we admit this Doctrin, the Edict of Natural Law forbidding us to enter into Covenant about unlawful Matters, would be void, if when the wicked Terms of the Covenant on one side were put in Execution, the other Party must by the Law of Nature be bound to stand to his Agreement. What an insignificant Order would it be to prohibit Theft, if the Act of stealing being once over, the Goods were to remain in the Possession of the Thief, without Blame or Danger? And that Remark is very false, "That there was not originally wanting to "the vicious Covenant, an internal Force of obliging; but that it was only kept in Suspense upon "account of the attending Wickedness, till such "time as it ceas'd to be an Incentive to Sin." For to give a Pact an inward obligatory Force, it is not enough that it be made with the Consent of both Parties, but the Subject of it ought to be such a thing as Men have a Right and Power of disposing of at their Pleasure. Otherwise if mutual Consent were sufficient to produce an Obligation, it would be easy to overthrow all Laws, should Men but enter into a Covenant to break them; and thus the Law of Nature would manifestly contribute to its own Destruction. It is our Judgment then, that with regard to the Law of Nature, neither the Actor of a Villany can by any proper Right demand the Wages promis'd him, nor is the Person who hired him bound to pay the Reward by any inward Tie affecting the Conscience. And that therefore the Court of natural Justice does not think it self concern'd to enquire, whether or no a Man has committed a Wickedness gratis, or to trouble it self in giving him Relief. Indeed, if the Cut-throat here, or any other Man retain'd for the Execution of some unjust Violence, shall upon the other Party's refusing to pay him his Hire, do him some Mischief in Revenge, no Body will pity the Sufferer, nor think that he had been treated injuriously, but only that he has been dealt with in his own Way. This then we must observe, That although Covenants, in themselves vicious, are not obligatory by any intrinsical Force or Virtue, nor fit to produce an Action in Courts of Justice, yet they have some kind of Effect upon a Man, who having at first freely consented to them, refuses afterwards to make them good. For they hinder him from having any Right to complain of hard Usage, in case the other Person violently bring him to a Compliance, or inflict some Evil on him for his Refusal. It is true the Law of Nature forbids, that a Man should have forfeited his Claim, by another's dealing injuriously, or be compell'd to pay what he does not justly owe, or should be punish'd for denying so unreasonable a Demand. But he who agrees to a vicious Covenant, does by that very Act quit all claim to the Favour of this Law, in as much as he endeavours, so far as he is able, to give another an unjust Power over him. And those Evils are adjudg'd to fall very deservedly on Persons, to which they give Occasion by their own Fault². For Instance, the Law of Nature forbids, that a Virgin should be robb'd of that Title and Character against her Will; yet if she once consents to her own Dishonour, she has suffer'd indeed an irreparable Loss, but she cannot complain of any Injury that has been done her³. And thus too in Commonwealths, where Duels are prohibited by Law, a Man who has receiv'd a Challenge, is not bound to come into the Field, tho' he has given his Word to appear. Yet if he freely meets his Antagonist, and happens to be wounded in the Encounter, he cannot say, that he has suffer'd Wrong, or demand the Charge of his Cure.

Grotius, in favour of his Opinion, urges the Example of the Patriarch Judab in the Scripture⁴, who appear'd very earnest and solicitous to send Thamar the Price of her playing the Harlot. To this Mr. Selden^b answers: "That in the Judgment of those Times it pass'd for lawful, for a Woman free from Marriage, and other Restraints, to bestow herself upon a Man, without any Condition of living together; and this either gratis, or for a Reward. And that therefore this Agreement was able to produce a Good and Valid Obligation, being made about a Matter, which if not naturally, yet was civilly lawful, or according to the Opinion of States and People in those Days. We may say farther, That most Men think they ought in point of Generosity to pay something for the purchase of their Pleasures. And besides, Judab might not express so much Care and Concern⁴, lest the Harlot should lose her Wages, but lest he himself should lose his Staff and Ring, the Pledges he had left in her Hands. Another Argument on Grotius's side, may be alledged in that Passage of the Roman Laws^c, What is given to a Strumpet cannot be recover'd; yet not because both Parties are in a Fault; for indeed the whole Offence, as to this Point, is on the side of the Giver. 'Tis vicious in the Strumpet to practise such a Profession, but 'tis not vicious in her to receive the Fees of her Profession. The Meaning of which Determination is no more than this: Tho' to make an open Trade of Lewdness, and to own as much before the Ædiles, did not fall under the Penalty of the Laws in the Roman State; yet all good and virtuous Men thought it most base and scandalous to engage in such a way of Life. However, when Persons had once fix'd themselves in so vile a Calling, they contracted no new Vileness, by making the usual Gain and Advantage of it. Or to speak more concisely, the Business was thus; the Romans granting Toleration to Courtesans, the Bargains and Contracts made on the Score of that Profession, were in their Law adjudg'd to hold good and valid. Ovid indeed hath accused these Bargains of Injustice upon another Score,

*Sola viro mulier Spoliis exultat ademptis :
Sola locat noctes, sola locanda venit.
Et vendit quod utrumque juvat, quod uterque petebat,
Et pretium, quanti gaudeat ipsa, facit.
Quæ Venus ex æquo ventura est grata duobus;
Altera cur illam vendit, & alter emit?

'Tis the Nymph's Privilege the Spoils to win,
To let her Nights to hire, and traffick with her Sin.
She sells what both enjoy, what both invite,
And sets the Price upon her own Delight.
What both with Pleasure doth alike supply,
'Tis hard if one must sell and t'other buy.

This still remains true, That a Man cannot fairly pretend to be displeas'd with a piece of Wick- edness, which has been undertaken with his Con- sent, and for his Service.

XI. The third Question moved on this Head is, whether a Reward given for villainous Service, may be redemanded or recover'd? And here the Law of Nature affords no Pretence for such a Recovery, provided the Receiver has not dealt deceitfully with the other Party. And the other has not sustained a great Damage¹. In as much as the Giver by delivering up the thing promis'd, intended no doubt to transfer the Propriety of it; and this too in way of Debt, in Consideration of a Service perform'd for him, which he himself valued at this Rate. Now we know that when any thing is given, even Gratis, all Right of Recovery ceaseth. Nor will it alter the Case to urge, That the thing was here obtain'd on an unjust Title, and by Ways and Means expressly forbidden by the Laws. For this Allegation cannot with any colour be made by the Person who gave the Reward; in as much as he voluntarily bargain'd for the wicked Service, and when that was perform'd for him, thought himself to receive somewhat equal in Value to the Price agreed upon; nor can he complain of a Villany, of which he himself was the principal Author. Indeed the Illegality of the Means by which the Reward was required, if consider'd in regard to the publick Authority, shall produce this Effect, That it shall be in the Magistrate's Power, to take the thing from the Receiver by way of Punishment, and (if he sees fit) to restore it to its first Owner. For Instance, if a cunning Strumpet should chouse an unwary young Man out of a considerable Sum of Money, she may fairly be obliged to refund; since even in the most vicious Bargains some Shadow of Justice is kept up, and the Laws of Contracts in some sort observ'd.

But farther, since it is accounted most base and vile in a Man, to demand a Reward for doing a thing which it is his Duty to perform Gratis, it is made another Question, whether what he have promis'd or given for a thing before justly due to us, may be with-held or recover'd. Some answer absolutely², That if we respect the Law of Nature, Promises of this kind are good and valid, since those likewise are so, which we make without any particular Reason or Prospect. Yet at the same time whatsoever Damage is sustain'd by violent Extortion, ought to be fully repair'd. Perhaps the Business may be more clearly settled, if we distinguish whether the thing which we say was before due to us, was due upon an imperfect, or upon a perfect Obligation. If the former, our Promise of a Reward for it shall hold good, and we cannot sue for Recovery. Thus for Instance, although the Law of Humanity obliges me to set a Traveller in his Way, and though such a piece of Service may perhaps cost me no Trouble, yet if I bargain to receive some Consideration on that Account, I may fairly demand the Payment, and the other Person cannot recover what he thus parts with; unless I forced him to make a large and unreasonable Promise, by filling his Head with false Frights, or any other Stratagem of Knavery. Those Promises are likewise valid, which we make to incite another to the more ready, and the more exact Performance of his Duty. For these pass for matters of free Bounty and Gratuity. But if the thing was before owing to us in a perfect Manner³, and yet the Person who is to perform it, refuses Compliance, unless upon our Promise of a new Reward, we take this Case to be the same, as in Engagements made through Fear or Guile; and therefore to require the same way of Proceeding. If then, in a State of natural Liberty, a man refuse to pay me my due, it is plain he does it upon Presumption of his own Strength, and because he believes it is not in my power to compel him. And consequently, if he deny to fulfil a Covenant fairly made, without a new supplemental Condition, he immediately gives me just Cause of using Hostility to reduce him. And if my present Affairs will not permit me to engage in a Method of War, but incline me to agree, though on hard Terms⁴, I may afterwards require Satisfaction for the Damage I now suffer; unless I end the Matter by an Act of voluntary Forgiveness. Yet it quite alters the Case, if his denial did not proceed from meer Unfaithfulness and Wickedness; but from his being able to shew that he was exceedingly injured in the former Covenant, to which he now demurs. As for the Members of Commonwealths, if they refuse to answer an old Bargain without some additional Reward, they will be compell'd to be honest by a Course of publick Justice.

To this we may add the Distinction of the Roman Lawyers⁵ in Cases of vicious Service, whether the Fault or Wickedness was on the part of the Receiver only, or of the Giver only, or of both. In the first Instance, they allow an Action of Recovery; not in the other two.

X. We are likewise morally unable or incapable to perform any thing¹, or to oblige ourselves to such Performance, about the Goods or Actions of other Men; which are not subject to our Pleasure and Disposal. And being thus independent from us, we cannot by any Act of ours, whether of Promise or of Bargain, give another a Right over them, by Virtue of which he should claim them as his Due. Hence 'tis a Rule with the Civilians², "That in case one Man promise that another shall give or shall do such or such a Thing, neither of them shall

I receive only those Advantages which the Law allows me; and where is the Favour in this Case? He that hath been obliged with Kindness, ought to make Requital to his Benefactor. But we can owe no such return to a Judge, who doth not act out of Favour to us, but as the Necessity of the Law directs him.

“stand obliged.” Which is very just and true, if we stick to the bare Words of such a Promise: But because it seems inconvenient, that an Act seriously undertaken should produce no Effect, we are apt commonly to interpret Promises of that kind in this Sense, that the Person promising will take the Care to bring the other Party to performance³, in whose Name he now seems to make the Engagement: But if I make a Promise to a Man in so express and direct Terms as these, that I will endeavour to prevail on a third Person, to do for him so or so; I am then obliged to labour by all means morally possible, to move that Person to a Compliance. We say by all means morally possible, that is, so far as the other Man can honestly desire me, and so far as is consistent with the Nature and Method of civil Life. And if in this Case, I omit nothing on my part⁴, and yet the third Person refuse to grant the Request, I am not bound to make good the Default; unless this was an express Part of my Promise, or was imply'd in the Nature of the Business⁶. But if I promise in this manner, Unless a third Person do so or so, I will forfeit thus much, it is manifest that if the third Person fail, my Engagement will stand good against me. Somewhat like this we meet with in the *Roman Constitutions*⁷, which decree that in case a Person disposes in way of Legacy, a thing which belong'd to another Man, and which he knew so to belong, the Heir shall be obliged to redeem, and to restore it, or if it cannot be redeemed, to give the Value of it to the Owner. Yet certain it is, that a Promise of what kind soever, cannot lay an Obligation on the third Person, nor give the other Man a Right of requiring any thing immediately from him.

But if the third Person be one placed under my Governance and Command, his Things or Actions are not accounted another's, but my own; so far as my Authority over him extends. And thus far I can by Promise or other Engagements effectually dispose of them, so as not only to bind myself to see the Agreement made good, but to cause that the Person in whose behalf I transact, shall as soon as he is acquainted with my Pleasure, be obliged by virtue of my Power over him, to perform the Condition. Tho' the common and regular Way of proceeding in these Cases, is to apply to the principal Promiser, and to require him to force the Person under his Care and Direction to a Compliance; and upon the Obstinacy and Default of the govern'd Party, the Action at Law shall lie against his Governor, unless he has resign'd his Charge, and left him wholly to his own Disposal.

XI. Lastly, I am morally incapacitated to make a Promise with any Effect, to a third Person, about such Things or Actions of mine, to which another has already acquired a Right; unless perhaps this other Party be content to wave his Claim¹. For he who by a former Engagement has made over his Right, can have no Power left to dispose of it anew. And all Pacts and Promises might be cancell'd and eluded with very little Trouble, were we allow'd to enter into new ones, either directly contrary to the former, or any way inconsistent with them, as to the Performance. In this Case therefore, the latter Contract is disannul'd and render'd ineffectual by the former, or as we should rather speak, the former shews that the latter can be of no Force or Use. Hence, for instance, are all those Covenants void, which Subjects make either among themselves, or with others, in prejudice of the

⁶ This hath place only in such Engagements where both Parties are concern'd, and not in such as are the pure Effect of the Liberality of one of the Parties. See the Examples cited by Mr. Hertius in the Discourse last mention'd, Sec. 1. § 8.

⁷ These are the Words, Non solum autem Testatoris vel Hæredis res, sed etiam aliena legari potest; ita ut Hæres cogatur redimere eam, & præstare; vel si non potest eam redimere, æstimationem ejus dare — Quod ita intelligendum est, si defunctus sciebat alienam rem esse, non si ignorabat. Instit. l. 2. tit. 20. De Legatis, §. 4. Idemque Juris est, si potuisses emere, & non emeris. Dig. l. 32. leg. 30. §. 6. The Reason of this Law, which appears at first Sight very harsh and rigid, is, That the Testator is presumed unwilling to do a thing so ridiculous as to give away what he had nothing to do with. So that he is accounted to have bought the thing bequeathed, if it can be, if not, the Legatee must have an equivalent. See Mr. Daumal's Laws in their Natural Order, Part I. Lib. 4. tit. 2. Sec. 3. §. 3, &c.

Duty and Allegiance they owe to their lawful Sovereigns².

It is a common Rule, That he who has the Precedency in Time, has the Advantage in Right: Not that Time consider'd barely in itself can make any such Difference; but because the whole Power over a thing being formerly secur'd to one Person, bars all others from obtaining a Title to it afterwards. And hence too it comes to pass, that a Servant cannot dispose of his Labour³, otherwise than his Master pleases, to whom by virtue of a former Contract it entirely belongs. By the Roman Laws, a Slave could not enter into any Obligation, even with his own Master, besides the general Obligation imply'd in that State and Condition of Servitude; and the Reason of this was, because his Master had before a full Right over all that he possess'd, and all that he could do to any advantageous Purpose.

If a Man, contrary to these Duties, shall have deceived and prejudiced another by promising a thing, which either was not his own, or was before otherwise bestow'd and secur'd; he shall be oblig'd to make good the Damage; and in many Cases shall be liable farther to suffer the Penalty of *Cozenage*⁴.

Our Author observes here, that according to the Roman Laws a Servant can't oblige himself to his Master, Sed Servus quidem non solum Domino suo obligari non potest, sed ne quidem ulli alteri. Instit. l. 3. tit. 20. De inutil. Stipulat. §. 6. And the Reason is, adds he, that the Master has a Right to all the Goods, and profitable Actions, or Labour and Service of his Slave, as he is so. So that a Slave can't oblige himself to his Master, but by the general Engagement he is under as his Slave.

⁴ Thus Cheats and Tricking is call'd in the Roman Law, which have not a Proper Name; but chiefly that sort which our Author is speaking of, as when one engages for a thing that belongs to another, or one thing for another; especially if the first be of more value than the last. As for example, If one gives Copper gilt for Silver gilt. See Digest. l. 47. tit. 20. Stellionatus. And Mr. Dauemar's Civil Laws, &c. Part I. l. 1. tit. 18. Sect. 3.

Concerning Engagements by Promise, this is further to be observ'd, that some are made purely or simply, and some under Condition¹, or that sometimes we oblige ourselves absolutely to such or such a Performance, and sometimes we suspend our Obligation, till certain Clauses or Proviso's are made good.

II. A Condition is an *Appendage*¹ added to such Acts, as are productive of Rights and Obligations.

MR. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on Chap. VIII. §. I.

¹ The Roman Lawyers add to this Division, the Determination of the Time and Place of their Performance. Id. Instit. Book III. tit. 16. §. 2, & 5. Our Author himself also speaks of these two Circumstances a little farther. The Words in the Institutes are, Omnia stipulatio aut pure, aut in diem, aut sub conditione fit — Loca etiam inseri stipulationi solent — Pure, veluti QUINQUE AUREOS DARE SPONDES? Idque confestim peti potest.

MR. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on §. II.

¹ Sub conditione stipulatio fit, cum in aliquem casum differtur obligatio; ut si aliquid factum fuerit, vel non fuerit, committatur stipulatio, veluti, SI TITIVS CONSUL FUERIT FACTUS, QUINQUE AUREOS DARE SPONDES? Instit. ubi supra, §. 4. We ought also to observe that there are tacit Conditions included in an Agreement, which are not expressed. As if a Person selling his Estate makes a Reserve of the Year's Profits, this Reserve supposes a Condition that there shall be some Fruits on its Interdum pura stipulatio ex re ipsa dilationem capit, veluti si id quod in utero sit, aut fructus futurus, aut domum ædificari stipulans fit. Digest. l. 45. tit. 1. De Verbor. Obligat. leg. 73. In Princip. See what is said above c. 6. §. 2. Further, Mr. Hertius observes here, that we must distinguish Conditions properly so call'd, viz. what the Lawyers call a Modus, and what we call a Condition. For example, I have Land engaged, and I sell it upon Condition of freeing of it at such a time. In this Case the Roman Law allows the Buyer to have an Action against the Seller to force him to free his Land at the time appointed, or let him into Possession. Nam si id actum est, ut omni modo intra Kalendas Julias venditor fundum liberaret, ex empto erit actio, ut liberet; nec sub conditione emptio facta intelligitur, veluti si hoc modo emptor interrogaverit, Erit mihi fundus emptus, ita ut intra Kalendas Julias liberet? vel ita, ut intra Kalendas à Titio redimas? Si vero sub conditione emptio facta est, non poterit agi, ut conditio impleretur. Digest. l. 18. tit. 1. De contrahend. empt. &c. leg. 41. init. So that such a Clause does not suspend the Obligation, nor disannul it, that it has no Effect, but only prevents the Execution of the Engagement till it takes place. This sort of Agreement may be referred to the Laws which the Lawyers call Sub Modis, on condition that the Legatee shall do this or that thing, or with a Prospect of it. See the Interpreters upon the Digests, l. 35. tit. 1. De Conditionibus & Demonstrat. &c. Hence it is, that Mr. Hertius calls the like Clause consider'd in mutual Promises and Engagements, Causa finalis, propter quam aliquid fit vel præstatur, which implies, that it is not altogether just, since in the Example that I have alledged after him, we may clearly see that there is no final Cause or Mo-

gations, by virtue of which their whole Force and Efficacy is made to depend on some particular Event, proceeding either from Fortune, or from human Pleasure². So that to the true Nature of a Condition, these two things are requisite, first that it have the Power of deferring and suspending the Force of the Obligation, and secondly that the Event express'd in it do not as yet appear; at least that it be at present uncertain, as to our Understanding.

III. Hence we may conclude, that those additional Clauses are not properly Conditions (tho' they seem to be such in a Grammatical Sense) which refer to the Time present, or past. For Futurities only are dark and obscure to mortal Apprehensions, but as for things which are now before us, or have already gone over our Heads, we have usually a clear Knowledge of them; and therefore they can include no Power capable of suspending our Assent. And therefore it is given as a Rule in the *Institutions*¹, that Conditions which regard the time present, or the time past, as suppose I should say, I will give such or such a Thing, if Titius has been Consul, or if Mævius be still alive; do either immediately cancel and annul the Obligation, or else do not put it off at all, nor hinder it from being pure and absolute. For if the things annex'd for Conditions, are not as they are suppos'd to be, the Engagement is to no purpose; but if they are so, the Promise is valid as soon as it is made, and begins absolutely to oblige. Yet here it must be observ'd, that a Condition regarding the time present or past, may be added to an Obligation, in case both or either of the Parties transacting be uncertain of the Thing. And Promises of this kind seem to imply a convenient Space of Delay. Inasmuch as nothing can be demanded by virtue of them, until it shall be made clearly apparent to the Promiser, that the Matter insert'd as a Condition has really happen'd; and the Proof of this must necessarily take up some time. For instance, a Man unskill'd in History may be drawn in to promise another Person ten Pounds, if Cæsar ever pass'd the Rhine. Now here before the Sum can be claim'd, it must be made evident from the Authority of creditable Historians³; that such an Adventure was actually perform'd. Again, if I promise in this manner, "I will give so much Money, in case Mævius, who is travelling abroad, be still alive;" the other Person can then only require the Money, when I have receiv'd certain Assurance of Mævius's Life. But if we take a closer View of these Matters, we shall find that the above-mention'd Promises, and the rest of the same Nature, ought to be interpreted in this Sense, I will give you so much if you prove to me that Cæsar pass'd the Rhine, or that Mævius the Traveller is now living; and thus they become truly conditional; but then the Condition is not the Truth and Certainty of the present, or past Act, consider'd in themselves, but the future Proof of it to the promising Party. It is certain therefore, that if the Truth of the Matter insert'd was known on both sides, and the Persons were in earnest, the Promise is not conditional, but absolute. Again, if both knew the Matter to be false, the Promise shall pass for a Jest, and consequently produce no Obligation. If a future Thing be added which they knew must infallibly come to pass, as suppose, if the Sun rise to-morrow, 'tis generally agreed that such a Clause ought not to be reckon'd a Condition; inasmuch as the future Event being already known to be most certain and necessary, does not delay the Obligation, nor hinder it from taking place this very Instant. Yet because we ought not easily to presume that the Clause is added for no reason, it is worth while to consider, whether in such a Promise, the Particle if be not put for the other Particle *when*³; so that the Engagement shall not be conditional, but only made for a Day hence; as suppose thus, I will give such or such a thing to-morrow, when the Sun riseth.

And thus we find that every Condition, properly so call'd, includes somewhat which is at present uncertain, at least to one of the Parties, between whom the Business is transacted; and the Obligation remains in Suspence⁴, till the thing shall hereafter come to pass, or shall be demonstrat'd, by good Evidence, but only a Stipulation, by which the Seller puts off the Delivery of the thing sold, till he can redeem it, which he engages to do at a certain time. These sorts of Promises may be referred to those which are made for a certain Day, because the time is always prefix'd, or which will come sooner or later, tho' it be not appointed. Mr. Hertius maintains with Reason, as some others do, that where there is a doubt, a Promise ought to be thought purely conditional rather than made on a sure Foot.

² Our Author here includes fully the Effect of Conditions, for they not only suspend the Effect of an Engagement, but disannul or change them where they are already. Mr. Daumat in his Civil Laws, &c. Part I. l. 1. tit. 1. Sect. 4. §. 6. says well, that Conditions are of three sorts, according to the different Effects which they produce. The first is, such as accomplish the Engagements that depend on them, as when 'tis said the Sale shall take place if the Goods be deliver'd on such a day. The second is, such as dissolve a Bargain, as when 'tis said, in case such a Person comes at such a time, the Hire of the House shall be void. The third is, such as neither accomplish nor dissolve an Agreement, only making some Change in it, as if one agree that in case an House that is Lett be resign'd to the Tenant without certain Moveables which are promised him, the Hirer shall have it so much the cheaper. Read the fore-quoted Section of Mr. Daumat.

MR. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on §. III.

⁴ Quia quæcumque sub conditione traduntur, ita demum fieri possunt propria & peculiaris, si conditio consummata est. Quintilian Declam. 336. Mr. Hertius, who quotes this Passage, observes at the same time that the Distinction made by the Roman Law about this Matter agrees not with the Natural Law. The Lawyers say, that there is a Difference between Engagements upon condition, and such as depend on a Promise at a certain time. In the first nothing is due before the thing suppos'd exists, where as in the other there is a due from the Moment the Promise is made, tho' the Person can't demand any thing till the time is come. Cedere diem signi-

Evidence,

Evidence, to have already happen'd. When the Condition appears true, the Obligation begins to have a pure and absolute Force; if the Condition fail, the Obligation expires with it.

IV. Conditions are commonly divided into possible and impossible. The former are such as make an Obligation depend on some Event, which may naturally or morally happen. And are again subdivided into casual, arbitrary, and *mixt*¹. A Casual Condition is such as depends, either on the pleasure of a third Person, not obnoxious to our Power and Authority, or else on mere Chance and Fortune in respect of us, as suppose in such a Promise as this, I will give you Ten Pounds, if Caius marries Titia; or if it don't rain within these three Days, &c. an arbitrary Condition is such as depends, as to its being or not being, on the Will and Power of him, to whom a Promise is made under that Limitation². But should a Condition be annexed, depending on the Pleasure of the Promiser³, the Engagement would be insignificant; as if one should say, I will give you Ten Pounds, if I think fit. For the Sense of such a Speech amounts to no more than this: I make you an absolute Promise that at present, and hereafter too, it shall be my Choice to promise absolutely, or not. And therefore the other Party can hence acquire no Right, unless the Offer be afterwards improved to a full and perfect Engagement; since the Condition here mention'd may be perpetually stopt, or eluded by the Promiser. So that we may reasonably say, That what is perfectly in our Power, ought not to be confounded with, or thrown amongst, Matters of Chance or Accident. If the Condition be indeed in the power of the Promiser, and yet such as he is not able, or is not willing always to elude, it must be enforced by supposing a particular Time, beyond which it cannot be deferr'd; as if I say, I will give you such a Sum of Money, if I marry, that is, when I marry.

From what has been hitherto offer'd, we may be able to explain more accurately the Assertions of Grotius^a upon the same Head. He says, That if the thing promised be not at present in the Power of the Promiser, but may be hereafter, then the Strength and Efficacy of the Promise lies in suspense; for it must then be supposed to have been made conditionally, that is, in case the Promiser should have it in his Power. Now this Rule we allow to hold good, provided that the other Party knew the thing not to be at present in the power of the Promiser. For otherwise it looks like Knavery, when a Man expects an absolute Promise, which shall begin to bind immediately, to put him off with a conditional one, which cannot take place till hereafter. He adds, If the Condition whereby the thing is promised, may be brought into our Power, be it self in our Power^b, we are obliged to do whatever is morally fit and just, for the Performance of it: That is, if I promise you any thing, which at present is impossible to me, but may by my Pains and Care be hereafter rendred possible, I am bound to use all my Endeavours, that I may become able to discharge my Engagement⁴. For Instance, a young Student in the Law promises a Man to plead all his Causes in the Court, if he arrive at any good Skill in his Profession. Here according to Grotius's Rule, the Student is under an Obligation to ply his Business with his utmost Strength and Diligence, that he may make himself fit for the Bar. But this will not hold, unless the Person promising has expressly declared, or given fair Presumption, that he will set himself in earnest to the acquiring strength for the Performance. Otherwise the Condition may be delay'd in infinitum. We may observe too, that Grotius here useth the Term, Conditio Potestativa, quite contrary to that Sense in which we have above defined it; he makes it to be in the power of the Promiser, we in the power of him to whom the Promise is directed.

Lastly, A mixt Condition is that the fulfilling of which depends partly on the power of him who receives the Promise, and partly on Chance; as thus for Instance, I will give you a Sum of Money, if you marry such a Gentlewoman. Now this is not purely at your Pleasure; for the Gentlewoman may refuse your Suit, or may die before the Match is finish'd.

We have only this to add, That a Condition is then look'd upon as perform'd, when the other Parfecit, incipere deberi pecuniam. Venire diem significat, eum diem venisse, quo pecunia peti possit. Ubi pure quis stipulatus fuerit, & cessit, & venit dies; ubi in diem, cessit dies, sed nondum venit, ubi sub conditione, neque cessit, neque venit dies, pendente adhuc conditione, Digest. l. 50. tit. 16. De verbor. signif. leg. 213. Hence they infer, that what Men pay through Mistake, before the Condition is fulfilled, may be recovered, as if it were not due; but 'tis not so in Payments made before the time. In diem Debitor, adeo Debitor est, ut ante diem solutum repetere non possit—sub conditione debitum, per errorem solutum, pendente quidem conditione repetitur, conditione autem existente, repeti non potest, l. 12. tit. 6. De Conditione indeb. leg. 10. 16. See Laws 17, 18. But Mr. Hertius thinks, that if we judge by the Light of Reason only, we may require our Due as well in the Mistake, before the Existence of the supposed Fact, or the Term agreed on. In both the Obligation descends upon the Heirs, in both there can be no Action at Law. All the difference then that can be is this, That the Condition may fail sometimes, whereas the Term, either fixed or uncertain, will come certainly. Hence Mr. Hertius concludes, contrary to the Opinion of many Doctors, that when we promise a thing which is not in Nature, and which can't take place, but on the account of a future Engagement regulated by the Laws, the Promise is really conditional, tho' there be a time fixed; as if a Man promises any one the Fruits of a Year, and to give such a Portion with his Daughter. For it supposes that there will be Fruit, and that the Marriage will be completed. Vid. Digest. l. 23. tit. 3. De Jure Dotium, leg. 21. & l. 45. tit. 1. De Verb. Obligat. leg. 73.

MR. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on §. IV.

² These sorts of Conditions, as our Author observes here, are also called promiscuous in the Digests, l. 35. tit. 1. De Conditionibus & Demonstrat. &c. leg. 11. §. 1,

³ Stipulatio non valet, in rei promittendi arbitrium collata conditione, Digest. l. 45. tit. 1. De Verb. Obligat. leg. 17. Illam autem stipulationem, SIVOLUERIS DARI? inutilem esse constat, Ibid. leg. 46. §. 3. See also, the 108 Law, §. 1. & l. 18. tit. 1. De contrahenda Emptione, &c. leg. 7. princip. &c. & l. 44. tit. 7. De Obligat. & Action. leg. 8.

⁴ Probably (says Mr. Thomasius in his Instit. Jurispr. Divin. l. 2. c. 7. §. 112.) Grotius had some Example in his Mind, as this, I'll marry you, if I commence Doctor. From whence Mr. Thomasius infers, that as he had not a stock of Learning great enough to commence Doctor in an Univerfity, a young Man who promises Marriage on that Condition may easily disengage himself.

ty concern'd, does himself hinder it from being perform'd?

V. Impossible Conditions ¹ are either naturally or morally so; that is, some matters by the Nature of things cannot be done, others by the Laws ought not to be done. Such Conditions annex'd ², especially if both Parties knew them to be such, do, according to the plain and simple Construction of the Words, render the Promise negative, and therefore null. In Business transacted between those who live in a State of natural Liberty, a Condition naturally impossible does plainly shew that the whole thing is void: Only with this difference, that to deny some Requests in such a round about way, by making the Answer run affirmatively, but clogg'd with an impossible Condition, is usually reckon'd an Affront; when a plain Denial might not have been taken ill ³. And as to this Point, if the Condition be morally impossible, the Case is ⁵ The Author says here, The other Contractor. (Si per alterum stet, quo minus conditio impleatur.) But the Law to which he refers us shews that 'tis badly expressed thro' Inadvertence. This is the Fact: A Man buys a Library upon Condition that the Magistrates shall allow him a place to set it in; but he is the Cause himself why they deny him a place. Hereupon the Lawyers determine that the Seller may force him to take away the Books, and pay the Price agreed on, because the Buyer prevented the Performance of the Condition. Labeo scribit, Si mihi Bibliothecam ita vendideris, si Decuriones Campani locum mihi vendidissent, in quo eam ponerem, & per me stet, quo minus id à Campanis impetrem, non esse dubitandum, quin præscriptis verbis agi possit. Ego etiam ex vendito agi posse puto, quasi impleta conditio, quam per emptorem stat. quo minus impleatur, Digest. l. 18. tit. 1. De contrahend. Emptione, &c. leg. 50. Further, it is certain, and it is a Maxim of the Roman Law, That if either of the two Contractors hinder the Accomplishment of a Condition which 'tis their Interest not to be fulfilled, whether the thing depend upon his own Fact, or not, the Condition is accounted as fulfilled in respect to him, and the other has a full Right to require the Performance of his Promise. The Lawyers extend this to the Promise of Emfranchisement, and to a Legacy by which a Person is made an Heir upon certain Conditions; inasmuch that when the Slave, Legatee, or Heir so made, have performed what is expected on their part, they have gained their Liberty, Legacy, and Inheritance. *In Jure civili receptum est, quoties per eum, cujus interest conditionem non impleri, fiat, quo minus impleatur, perinde haberi, ac si conditio impleta fuisset, quod ad Libertatem, & Legata, & ad Heredum institutiones perducitur; quibus exemplis stipulationes quoque committuntur, cum per promissorem factum esset, quo minus stipulator conditioni pareret, Digest. l. 50. tit. 17. De Divers. Regul. Jur. leg. 161. See also leg. 39. 174. of the same Title, and l. 35. tit. 1. De Condit. & Dem. leg. 24. where we must read with *Horatius, Olibri. 4. 28. Cujus interest conditionem NON impleri.

MR. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on §. V.

³ *Generaliter nocimus turpes stipulationes nullius esse momenti, veluti si quis homicidium vel sacrilegium se facturum promittit, Digest. l. 45. tit. 1. De Verbor. Obligat. leg. 26, 27. Item quod Leges fieri prohibent — veluti si sororem suam nupturam sibi aliquis stipuletur, Ibid. leg. 35. §. 1. The same Lawyers say, with Reason, that it hath place, when likewise the thing is afterward allowed by the Laws, because we must judge of a Promise according to the time it was made in. *Nullius momenti fore stipulationem, perinde ac si ea conditio, quæ natura impossibilis est, incerta esset, nec ad rem pertinet, quod jus mutari potest, & id quod nunc impossibile est, postea possibile fieri; non enim secundum futuri temporis jus, sed secundum præsentis debet æstinari stipulatio, Ibid. leg. 137. §. 6.

⁴ 'Tis plain, not. For every Promise made on such a Condition, is null in it self, inasmuch that none hath Right to require the Accomplishment. 'Tis another Question, whether we may require a thing actually given by virtue of a Promise made on such a Condition already executed? See what is said Note 2. upon §. 6. of the foregoing Chapter.

⁶ That is to say, the Legacies which the Testator makes to depend upon such a Condition, were not allowed to be effectual. *Sub Impossible Conditione vel alio modo factam institutionem placet non vitari, Digest. l. 28. tit. 7. De Conditionibus, Intit. leg. 1. Conditiones contra Edicta Imperatorum, aut contra Leges, aut quæ Legis vicem obtinent scriptæ, vel contra bonos mores, vel derisorie, aut hujusmodi, quas Prætores improbaerunt, pro non scriptis habentur, & perinde ac si conditio Hereditati, sive Legato adjecta non esset, capitur Hereditas Legatumque, Ibid. leg. 14. See Mr. Dauzat's Civil Laws in their Natural Order, Part 2. l. 3. tit. 1. Sect. 8. §. 18, &c. 'Tis easy to discern the difference as to Validity, which the Laws make here between Promises and Agreements made between Men when they are alive, under an impossible Condition, or dishonest, and the Disposals of a Testator attended with the like Condition. In the first the Condition is imposed by the Consent of both Parties, who knowing it, 'tis so much the worse for him, because he knows how things were managed, and could have no reason to look upon it as a serious Action. See leg. 31. of the Digests, De Obligat. & Actio. quoted Note 2. foregoing. But 'tis not so in Wills. The Legatee has no Knowledge of the Testator's Devises, and so is far from looking upon his Declaration as a Trifle, that he believes he acted seriously in his last Moments, although the Condition seem'd to insinuate the contrary.*

so very serious and grave, should be put upon with trifling and impertinent Clauses^a.

VI. If in Promises mention be made of a certain Place, without mention of a certain time, it is taken for granted, that so much time shall be allow'd for performing the Promise, as will serve to bring a Man conveniently into the Place of Action¹.

VII. But in case a limited Time be expressly added, this will cause that the Obligation shall not exert its Effect till such a Space be expir'd, or that no Demand shall be made before the appointed Day¹.

VIII. It may be convenient in the last Place to examine in what Points these conditional Promises differ from Pacts, and in what Points they may be resembled to them. In this then both those kinds of Engagements seem to agree, that as the former do not bind, unless the Condition be made good, so the latter, when one Party forbears to perform the Articles, do by no means oblige the other¹. And hence it is a common Remark, that the particular Heads of a Contract are in the manner of so many Conditions. Some indeed make one Exception to our Rule about Facts; that in case any Article should be added, not for use, but perhaps out of Gallantry or Compliment, the Non-performance of such a Matter shall not release the other Party from his Obligation. But as little Indulgence as possible should be granted to this Exception; as well lest Men should abuse it by applying it to the principal Articles, as because it is not to be presum'd, that Persons would clog a serious Covenant with Clauses impertinent and unnecessary. Groomd. Hist. Gall. l. xvi. observes of the secret Articles of Marriage between Charles the First, when Prince of Wales, and Henrietta of Bourbon, that they were added by the most Christian King in compliment to the Court of Rome; neither Party imagining that they were intended to be kept.

Promises under a potestative or arbitrary Condition, do in this agree with Pacts, that in both a Man must perform somewhat on his side, before he claim the Promise or Bargain of the other Party: But in this they differ, that in the former the Person promising does not think it much his Interest whether the thing be perform'd, or no; at least he does not intend to oblige the other Party to a Compliance, but leaves him to use his own Pleasure. But in Pacts, as the Reason why I have undertaken any Performance, is the Prospect of somewhat to be done for me by the other Person; so if he fail in his part, I am not only releas'd at present from mine, but I may oblige him by force to stand to the Agreement.

IT is very usual for us to confirm and ratify Pacts and Promises, not immediately by ourselves, but by some Agent or Proxy. What Rules are to be observ'd in such Proceedings, it is now our Business to explain. This then is certain, that a Man is oblig'd, not only when he makes known his Consent to the Person towards whom the Obligation is directed, immediately from his own Mouth, but also when he signifies the same to another Man, whom he has empower'd to transact on his behalf. The Agent in such an Affair is to be look'd on as a kind of instrumental Cause; inasmuch as he not only does all by another's Authority¹, but likewise acquires no proper Right, brings no Obligation to himself, referring to the Person with whom he is appointed to treat; but obtains a Right only for the Person who has employ'd him, and to him indeed he stands under an Obligation to manage his Concerns with Honesty and Faithfulness. For those Actions of another do produce an Obligation or a Right in us, and are consequently to be esteem'd ours, for the performing of which we have invested the other Person with full Power, and have openly profess'd that we will acknowledge them for our own. But before a third Man can treat to any Effect or Purpose with such a Person, 'tis necessary he be well assur'd that we have chosen and constituted him the Interpreter of our Will, and that we will account whatever he acts as perform'd by ourselves. On this Foundation depend most of the Rules of the Roman Law concerning Deputations against the² Matters of Ships for the Facts of their Deputies against³ Merchants, for the Transactions of their Factors, and against the⁴ Master of a Family for the Deed of his Slave, or his Son.

II. Now we are wont to depute another to covenant in our Name, either by a general Commission¹, empowering him to do whatever he thinks most convenient for our Affairs; or by an express and limited Form, prescribing him both the Subject and the Manner of his proceeding. In the former Case I stand oblig'd by whatsoever he has concluded about the Business in hand, honestly, or bona fide. It is necessary to add this Restriction; for he cannot bind me by what he does treacherously, and with a knavish Design of circumventing and abusing me; inasmuch as when I conferr'd such Authority upon him, I must be thought to have suppos'd his Integrity as an essential Condition. Nay, the acting bona fide, or uprightly and faithfully, implies this farther, that what the Substitute performs, shall not derogate from the Honour and Advantage of his Principal; at least so far as the present Posture of Things will bear. For to be ignorant of these Points is almost as gross a Fault, as open Dishonesty². The same must be said of those blank Papers with our Names subscrib'd at the bottom, which we often deliver to our Agents to be fill'd up and turn'd into Instruments of Obligation. These shall not bind us at all, if any such Matters be inserted in them, as are disagreeable to the Nature of the Affair given in Charge, and such as we cannot be presumed to have consented to³.

We have a famous Instance of such a Cheat in Blanks recorded by Zonaras, Tom. iii. and by Glycas, Tom. iii. in Roman. Lacapen. circa princip. The Patriarch Trypho being accus'd of extreme Ignorance, and as one that was not so much as capable of writing, to confute the Censure, wrote down his Name in a fair Paper, before the Judges appointed: This Paper Theophanes of Cæsarea fill'd up with a formal Resignation, and so brought it to the Emperor; who, as the Plot had been laid, took hence an occasion to eject the Patriarch. A Latin Poet, as our Author observes, sharply reproves the Pope, who by signing blank Papers hath been the Cause of a thousand Forgeries.

*An pulchrum satis est, & summo Præsule dignum, Impressas signo vacuas emittere chartas,
Quas possit lator variis inscribere nugis,
Cum volet, & miseris falsas affingere culpas?*
Gunther. Ligurin. v. 656.

If I depute a Man with limited Orders, he cannot lay an Obligation on me beyond the Bounds of his Instructions.

If any Assent be sent with a double Commission, one open, to shew the Person with whom he is to transact, the other secret, prescribing what Steps he shall take, and how far he shall proceed; it may be made a Question, Whether the Agent shall oblige his Principal, if he exceed his private and secret Orders, yet so as to keep within his open Commission, where the affirmative Side ought to be maintain'd⁴. For by my own Instructions I bind myself to the third Person, with whom the Contract is made, that I will ratify and make good what my Agent shall conclude on. And by my secret Orders I bind my Agent not to recede from such positive Terms; in which Point if he transgress, he stands accountable to me for so much as I lose by his Mismanagement: But I am still tied to perform to the third Person, what was thus granted in my Name. For otherwise there could be no manner of Safety in treating by Commissioners, it being ever to be fear'd lest their secret Directions should differ from their open Powers; neither could there be a more specious Pretence made use of to overthrow all Affairs transacted by Mediation, and to deceive and abuse Men with vain Treaties⁵: But it must be observ'd, we suppose, here, as in the former Case, that the Agent when he thus transgresses the Bounds of his private Instructions, did it not out of a dishonest and treacherous Design ⁴.

III. If we make use of a Deputy in transmitting a Promise to another Man, and the Person employ'd happen to die before he have declar'd our Proposal to the other, or obtain'd his Assent, it is plain his Promise may be revok'd ¹. For my express Will in this Case was to contract an Obligation by the Words of this Person only, whom I intrusted with the Affair: And therefore although he may have declar'd his Message to a third Man, whence it may come to the Ears of the Party to whom it was directed, yet this way of communicating the Matter can lay no Tie upon my Conscience. For it was neither my Design in the least to render my self oblig'd by the means of this third Person, nor is he so fully acquainted with my Will, as to give another any good Assurance of it. But the Case is otherwise as to a Bearer, whom I intrust only with Letters of mine, expressing my Pleasure to a Person at a Distance. Though the Bearer die before he reach the Person, and the Letters are deliver'd by another, yet this is no Hindrance to the contracting of a firm Obligation. For here the Letters, and not the Bearer, are the instrumental Cause of the Engagement; and it signifies nothing to either of the Parties concern'd, by what Hands the Deeds were convey'd and presented.

IV. On many other Accounts there is a great Difference, whether a Man act by my Deputation purely as a Messenger, and a Bearer of my Opinion and Pleasure, or as an Agent and Mediator, with a Liberty of interposing his own Judgment in some Points of the Business. Which Grotius in l. ii. c. 11. f. 17. thus expresseth in other Words: Whether the Person be pitch'd on to signify the Promise I make, or whether he be authoriz'd to make the Promise himself. In the former Case, if I revoke my Promise before it hath been accepted by the other Party, my Revocation shall stand good, although the Messenger being unacquainted with it, should go on in signifying my first Resolution. But if a Man acts for another in the latter way of Deputation, unless the Change of Mind be notified to him, it shall be void, and his Principal shall stand oblig'd, if he proceed to settle the Business ¹, as he was at first commission'd. For the Principal, when he chose to offer his Promise by such an Agent, lodg'd the obliging Power in his Person, and not in his Pocket; that is, he intended him not barely for the Messenger of his Purpose, but for one that should employ his own Judgment, as well as his bodily Service in the Affair ². The same Distinction the Civilians apply to the Question, Whether a Grant should hold good, in case the Donor die before it be accepted? Which they affirm, if the Person deputed to carry the Grant were of the former kind, because then nothing would be wanting on the Donor's Part. But they deny it, if the Agent was of the latter sort; because the Donor did not fully make the Grant, but only order'd it to be made; or had not yet actually offer'd the Thing, but only given Commands for its being offer'd. Yet see Ziegler on Grotius, lib. ii. c. 11. f. 17. where he delivers it as his Judgment, that the Donation may be accepted, in case the Person deputed made offer of it during the Donor's Life. But one would wonder how the other Party should make any Stop or Delay at Acceptance, if the Donation be suppos'd to have been thus communicated. Grotius says, that the same Rule is to be followed in deciding the Controversy, Whether a Person thus acting by a Commission, can bring an Action against the Heir of the Principal, or Donor, for Recovery of the Charges he hath been at since the Donor's Death, in executing his Orders ³? In which Case, the Author of the Books to Herennius, l. ii. c. 13. informs us, that two Roman Judges gave a quite contrary Sentence.

⁴ That is to say, There was no Tricking between him and the third Party, otherwise he is to make good the Damages of him whose Business he manages; but the Engagement itself is not less valid in respect to the other Contractor by virtue of his Orders, which are the Foundation of the Treaty, as I spake in the first Edition of this Work. Nevertheless I have observed that Mr. Hertius maintains the same thing, and sends us to his Discourse, De Obligatione mandantis & mandatarii, contemplatu tertii, §. 2. which is in Tom. 3. of his small Tracts and Comments printed in 1700.

MR. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on §. IV.

² Mr. Thomafius in his Jurisprud. Divin. Lib. ii. c. 7. §. 118. says, That we must distinguish several Cases here, and examine chiefly whether the Revocation of an Engagement be addressed to the Messenger, or to him to whom we are engaged by his Means? And further, whether the Revocation be sent before the Promise was accepted? If the Revocation be addressed to the Messenger, and he to whom he is to deliver his Commission has accepted the Promise before he knew of the Revocation, the Promiser is obliged to make good his Engagements, tho' he who was obliged to let him know it received the Countermand either before or after the Acceptation. And so all that can be done is this, if the Messenger has given it contrary to Order, he may be charged with an ill Management of his Commission. But if the Revocation be addressed to him to whom our Engagements are made, and he has accepted the Promise before he received the Revocation, we must then observe whether we had a Design to engage ourselves in case the Promise were once accepted, or we were only supposed to have notice of an Acceptation? For it is clear, that we may revoke our Word by means of such a Supposition. But if he to whom we are engaged has received our Revocation before he accepted our Promise, the Engagement is null, whether it be addressed to a third Person, or himself. For in this last Case there is a Fraud in respect of the latter.

³ 'Tis a Rule of the Civil Law, That a Commission is of no Force, when he that gave it is dead before the Execution; and that altho' he has expressly ordered his Proctor to do such or such a thing after his Death, unless it be to build him a Tomb, or buy a piece of Ground for that End. This Mr. Noodt has shewed very well, against the Opinion of some famous Lawyers, in his Observat. Lib. 2. c. 1, 2, 3, 4. But if we consider the Law of Nature, we may decide it by other Principles, viz. by examining whether the Nature of the thing or the Circumstances do probably make it appear, that he that gave the Commission intended it should be executed after his Death. For in this Case the Proctor ought to execute it, and all Persons concerned ought to yield to it. We must also suppose that the Proctor knew of the Death of him that gave the Commission; for if he were ignorant of it, whatever he did in that time is valid by the Civil Law, which here follows the Principles of Equity. Nam Mandatum solvitur morte [Mandatoris] si tamen per ignorantiam impletum est, competere actionem utilitatis causa dicitur, Digest. Lib. 17. Mandati vel contra, leg. 6. §. 10. princ. See also the Institutes, Lib. 3. tit. 27. §. 10.

V. As we may declare our Consent to an Engagement by an Agent or Minister, so it is a farther Question, Whether a third Person may accept, in our behalf, a Promise made to us by another? And here the Dispute is not about those Persons whom we have commissioned to make Acceptance in our Name; for what we do by them, we are supposed to have done our selves, and when we have intrusted a Matter to another Man's Pleasure, our Will and Consent is included in his. But the Doubt regards only those whom we have not in this manner authorized. And here Grotius observes^a, "That we ought to distinguish, whether he who makes us a Promise on behalf of a third Person, does address and bind himself immediately to us, or whether he promises directly to the absent Party, and useth us only for Witnesses of the Act; that is, whether the Words run thus, I promise you that I will give Scius such a thing, and you are Witnesses of this my Resolution. In the former Case, according to the natural Sense and Import of the Promise, so soon as I have accepted it, I acquire a Right of taking care that the thing mentioned be transferr'd to the third Person, if he too will accept it; so that the Promiser in the mean time cannot revoke his Engagement. Yet he to whom the Promise was immediately directed, may remit it before the third Man has declared his Acceptance. The Promise then seems, on the whole, to amount to this, I will give Scius such a thing, if you please. And consequently it is in your Power and Choice, whether you will transfer the Promise on Scius, or whether, by refusing the Offer, you will hinder it from coming to him by your Means. And this is all you can do; for if I am absolutely resolv'd to confer the Kindness, I may perform it without your Mediation or Assistance. But if you declare your Approbation of the Proposal, I am not then at liberty to repent, before the Matter hath been made known to Scius; and if he join his Acceptance to yours, the Promise shall by the Law of Nature be good and valid. Indeed the Roman Laws declar'd all those Stipulations to be null¹, which were made for the Benefit of a third Man, without having a Penalty annex'd to them. And the reason they gave for their Judgment is this, That the original Design of inventing Stipulations, was to enable a Man to obtain somewhat for his own Advantage; whereas if the thing promised be to pass to a third Man, he who obtains the Promise does not serve his own Interest, nor is himself concern'd in the Gain. But if I make a penal Stipulation, that is, if I procure such an Engagement as this, Unless you give Scius an hundred Pounds, you shall by way of Punishment pay me Four score; I then acquire thus much Right at least, that if you do not make good the first Sum on my Friend's account, I can demand the latter on my own. This Rule of the Roman Courts seems to have been introduced for the lessening the Number of Suits. For the Judge might well rebuke the Importunity of such a Complainant, who should give him and others a publick Trouble, without being himself concern'd or interested in the Affairs. And tho' it cannot indeed be said to be no Advantage to us, when by our Means we derive a Benefit on a third Person, in as much as we thereby oblige him to a grateful Sense of our Service; yet it was thought very improper to grant a Man an Action for the recovery of a thing in another's Name, which that other Party could not demand in his own; and consequently to give a Man the Privilege of purchasing the Friendship of a third Person at the Charges of a second.

But in the other Case, when the Promise runs after this manner, *I engage, or I declare before you, that I will give Scius such a thing, if you are not commission'd by Scius to accept the Offer*², your Agreement to it will have no Force or Virtue; you neither acquire a Right for your self, nor for Scius, who does not acknowledge your Act for his own. And therefore it signifies nothing, whether the Witnesses here yield his Consent to the Promise, or not; since it is not directed to his own proper Person. And the Promiser, in as much as Scius obtains no Right by the Witnesses acceptance of the Proposal, may revoke it without Injury; tho' not always without a breach of Constancy and Truth.

VI. It is farther certain, that if any Offer be made to a Person yet living, by Letter, Messenger, or the like, and he happen to die before he has accepted of it, his Heirs cannot accept of it for him; and consequently that such a Promise may fairly be revoked. For the Promiser seems plainly to have referr'd the Acceptance to the Choice of the deceas'd Party, not to his Heirs. Nor is he presumed to have thought of this Accident, or to have been willing that his Promise should stand good upon such a Supposition. We

² Mr. Thomasius in his Instit. Jurisprud. Divin. lib. 2. c. 7. § 119. observes, That we must carefully distinguish whether he whom we take to witness have any Interest, or no, that we give to a third what he accepts in his own Name, altho' without his Consent; a Distinction which the Roman Lawyers have not forgotten, and of which they alledge an Example of a Guardian, who making over the Management of the Estate of his Pupil to another, engaged that he should manage his Affairs well; or of a Person who obliged himself to give such or such a thing to his Commissioner; or of a Debtor, who engaged something for his Creditor, that he may not be obliged himself to pay, what he is engaged to give him, if he do not discharge him at the end of a certain Term, or to hinder him from selling a thing engaged till a certain time. For in this and like Cases, the Engagement is as valid as if the Promise had been directly made to him to whom we have promised. Sed & si quis stipuletur alii, cum ejus interesset, placuit stipulationem valere. Nam si is, qui pupilli tutelam administrare cœperat, cesserit administrationem contuleri suo, & stipuletur rem pupilli saluam fore, quoniam interest stipulatoris fieri, quod stipulatus est, cum obligatus futurus sit pupillo, si male res gesserit, tenet obligatio. Ergo & si quis Procuratori suo dari stipulatus sit, quod sua interest, ne forte vel pœna committatur, vel pœdia distrahantur, quæ pignori data erant, valet stipulatio, Instit. Lib. 3. tit. 20. De Inutil. Stip. § 19. In fine, this Remark of Mr. Thomasius is delivered in such a manner in the Edition of this Work, which I have; which is the last printed in 1702. that he seems to have fallen upon another sort of Promise, which is accepted by a third Person without his Consent; for having made mention of this after the other, he adds, Sed in posteriori casu, &c. but this, doubtless, is a Mistake in the Impression for Priori; for the Correctors have over passed a great number of others.

are often inclined to make a Grant to a Person, to be afterwards by him transferr'd to his Heirs, which we are by no means dispos'd to give to his Heirs immediately; it being a very material Point to consider on whom we bestow our Favours¹.

VII. It may in the last place be enquired, whether a Man can add a Charge or Burthen to his Promise, after the Words have been once deliver'd? For that he may before annex what Conditions he pleaseth, is true beyond Dispute. This then may be done, so long as the Promise is not yet perfected by Acceptance, nor made irrevocable, by the plighting of Faith for his Performance. For the other Party, before he accepts of the Profer, can acquire no Right to it; and therefore in the mean time, as the Promiser may, if he thinks fit, utterly withdraw it, so he may load and clog it with new Conditions. But when a Grant is completed by the Act of both Parties, no farther Terms can be annex'd to it¹. Vid. Cod. lib. iv. De Donat. quæ sub modo.

'Twill be ask'd, What if the Burthen be added for the Sake and Benefit of a third Person; as suppose I say, I'll give you such a Sum of Money, provided you'll engage to maintain Scius a Year at the University? We answer, that he who binds himself under this Burthen, may recall it so long as Scius has not yet confirm'd the Promise by his Acceptance; before which it does not of Right belong to him.

VIII. The most general Division that can be applied to Pacts, seems to be this, all of them create a Right, but in some that Right extends it self to the common use of Mankind, in others it is limited to the particular Benefit of certain Persons. For the Life of Men would have proved too plain and simple, had they not, to the Ordinances of Nature, added their own Institutions; by means of which their Proceedings were regulated, not only with more Convenience, but with more Comeliness and Grace. Of this latter kind, the principal are; Speech, or Discourse, the Propriety, and the Value of Things, together with Sovereignty, or Command; all which presuppose some universal Pacts, tacit or express, by Virtue of which they have been tied up to certain Forms and Rules. And the introducing and settling of these Engagements, was what Nature her self, supposing the Increase of Mankind to a great Number, directed and advised; as conducing in the highest degree to the Peace, and to the Ornament of human Life. Having therefore finish'd our Enquiries about Covenants in general, we will proceed to examine these Institutions, to discover on what Pacts they are founded, and what Precepts of the Law of Nature, such as we have already term'd Hypothetical or Conditional, do arise from them.

All the Duties of Society, of which our Author treats hereafter, and which flow from those three Generals, which I have spoken of above, Chap. 1. § 1. Note 3. and are only the Consequences applied to divers Objects which are presented to us in a Civil Life; Consequences from whence result such Maxims, which have a Place either without supposing any other thing than the Quality of a Man, or supposing some Deed or human Establishment. So that the Establishments of which our Author speaks make the Matter of the Duties of natural Right as well absolute as conditional. 2. All the Establishments of which our Author treats are not founded upon an Agreement. The Introduction and Usage of the Word in general depends not upon any Agreement, either express or tacit, if by Agreement we mean an obligatory Consent. See what is said, Chap. 1. of the following Book, § 5, Note 1. The Property of Goods is not originally founded upon any Agreement, as shall be shewn, c. 4. of the same Book, § 4, Note 2.

WHAT Man was design'd by Nature for a Life of Society, this alone might be a sufficient Argument, that he only of all living Creatures is endued with the power of expressing his Mind to others by articulate Sounds: A Faculty, which, abstracting from this social Condition, we cannot conceive to be of any Use or Advantage to Mankind. 'Tis well observ'd by *Aristotle*¹, Nature doth nothing in vain; and Man is the only Animal whom she hath invested with the Privilege of Speech: Not such as consists in the bare Repetition of borrow'd Sounds, like the Talk of Parrots, but such as is join'd with a Sense and Understanding of what the Words import. By means of which one may be able to teach another; one may in the most convenient manner command another, and the other apprehend his Commands; without which Assistance, there would scarce be any Shadow of Society, Peace, or Discipline among Men; or at best, such only as would be in the highest degree rude and unpolish'd. For (as the Philosopher goes on) Voice (or a certain Kind of inarticulate Sound) is no more than an Indication of Pleasure or Pain, and is therefore to be found in other Animals. Nature having in them proceeded so far, as to give them a Sense of what is agreeable or distasteful, and an Ability of signifying in some sort these Affections amongst themselves. (Whence it appears, that the Sounds utter'd by Brutes, of whatsoever kind, are determin'd by Nature, not by Custom and Institution, like human Discourse). But Speech was given to signify farther what was useful, or prejudicial; just, or unjust: It being the Prerogative and Property of Men, above their Fellow-Creatures, to have a Sense of Good and Evil, of Justice and Injustice, and the like; since from their Society and Communication proceed the united Bodies of Families and Commonwealths^a. And since that Want and Weakness, which particular Men lye under, may by the Assistance of others be conveniently remov'd, and yet another cannot apply himself to my Aid, unless he first understand what I desire; which he may do most readily by means of some Signs and Tokens, and especially by articulate Words; therefore, that the most useful Instrument of human Life may duly obtain its End, in uniting Men in Society; and lest by the Abuse of Speech Man should be render'd less sociable, than if he were dumb or silent, it must be suppos'd a Precept of the Law of Nature, That no Man deceive another by those Signs, which have been instituted to express our Meaning and our Thoughts.

II. Now to trace this Point from its first Head, we must understand, that the Nature and Ability of those Objects which affect our Senses, is such as not only gives us notice of their own Presence or Approach, but likewise affords our Reason an Opportunity of attaining the Knowledge of other Things. And this either because there is a natural Alliance and Connexion between those Objects and the Things with which they thus bring us acquainted; or because Beings endued with Sense and Understanding have, without this natural Relation, fix'd such Notions upon them, as to make them capable of representing continually the Images of certain Things to the Mind. Hence ariseth the Distinction of Signs into those which are natural, and those which owe their Force and Validity to Custom and Compact. Of the former kind, we are on every side supplied with Instances from the Frame of Nature; as the Day-break is the Sign of the Sun's rising quickly after; Smoak is the Sign of Fire; and the like. By Compact, Men have impos'd the Use and Power of Signifying, on certain Things, Actions, and Motions, and above all, on Words, or articulate Sounds form'd by the Tongue, and afterwards reduced into Letters: And all these are found to be in use either with some certain Persons, or with the greatest Part of Mankind, or in general, with all the World. Under the first of these Classes may be rank'd the Light-houses and nightly Fires on the Coasts, for the Direction of Vessels: By the Abuse of which Nauplius of old is reported to have driven the Greeians, in a Tempest, upon the Rock of Caphareus, to revenge the Death of his Son Palamedes^b. As likewise those other Marks set up to guide Ships by Day, and to point out the Rocks and Quick sands, together with the Mercuries, pointing Hands, and other Conveniences for Information of Land-travellers. And thus heretofore the Persians by lighting Fires all along on the tops of their Hills, used in a very little time to spread some Reports or Alarms thro' every part of the Kingdom^c. An infinite Variety of these Signs are met with in Commonwealths, employ'd for the acquainting the Subjects with some particular Matters. To which Head belong Clocks, Bells, Spears set up at Auctions, Bushes, Signs before Houses, and the like. In War, the Sound of Trumpet, Beat of Drum, Discharge of Cannons, Waving of Colours, &c. And so too, certain Gestures and Motions have been taken up amongst most People to denote such or such Intentions of the Mind: To go out of the way, to rise up, to bow, to kiss the Hand, are Signs of Honour and Respect with the greatest part of the World. To uncover the Head in the Ceremony of saluting, or to pluck off the Shooes in some Places is interpreted as a Mark of Honour, in others of Contempt. It is in some Countries look'd on as reproachful to point with the Finger, to bend the Nose, to bid a Fig for one (fare le fica, as the Italians call it) with many the like Motions. To take by the Beard is in some Nations the highest Affront, with others it passes for a Token of Veneration; as with the Tartars, with some of the Indians, and, as some think, with the antient Gauls^d. 'Tis likewise a common Practice to express by some Gesture our desire of performing such an Action as would require that particular Motion of the Body, by which in strange Countries we, after a sort, supply our Ignorance of the Language. To affirm a thing by gently bending our Head; to deny by throwing it on our Shoulders; to refuse by turning our Back, are Customs almost universally receiv'd. As for our pointing out a certain Thing or Place by stretching our Hand or Finger towards it, this perhaps ought to be reckon'd amongst the natural, rather than amongst the arbitrary Signs. What Discoveries may be made by Nods, Winks, Motions of the Fingers, or of the Feet, when particular Men have once agreed on those ways of Intelligence, is vulgarly known, and need not be farther insisted upon in our present Design^e. Lucian^f tells us of a famous Artist in Nero's Court, who express'd the Amour of Mars and Venus as well by dancing, as he could have done by Narration; whom for this reason a certain barbarous Prince begg'd of the Emperor for an Interpreter. And the Sieur De Sancy, the French Ambassador at the Otto- man Court, gives an account of two Mutes whom he saw there, one by Nation a Turk, the other a Persian, who by reason of their using different Signs and Motions, could not understand each other; till at length a third Mute was found out, who was able to perform an Interpreter's Part between the two former.

III. But that which we are chiefly concern'd about in our present Enquiries, is Speech or Discourse, the most common and the most useful Sign amongst Men, and introduc'd for the sake of communicating Notions and Thoughts. Of the Rise of which Diodorus Siculus, Lib. i. p. 8. Edit. Rhodom. thro' his Ignorance of the true Origin of Mankind, gives this fabulous Account: The first Men who were born into the World, led a savage Life, without Culture or Refinement; going out in Herds to the Pastures, and feeding on the most juicy Plants, and those Fruits which plain Nature produced. Being infested with the Wild Beasts, Use taught them to assist each other, and Fear compell'd them into Society; by means of which they grew acquainted, by degrees, with the Resemblance of their Shapes and Features. And having from confus'd Voice, and without Signification, arriv'd by slow Attempts to pronounce articulate Words, shewing every thing by Signs, that they had occasion to observe, and to communicate; they at length gain'd ability to inform one another of all Matters by Discourse. But, inasmuch as there were many of these Communities establish'd in different Parts of the World, and every Man join'd his Words together meerly as it happen'd, all did not speak in the same manner. And hence arose the Number and the Variety of all sorts of Languages. Lucretius's Description is exactly of a piece with this, l. v. v. 1027, &c.

*At varios linguæ sonitus natura subegit
Mittere, & utilitas expressit nomina rerum;
Non alia longè ratione, atque ipsa videtur
Protrahere ad gestum pueros infantia linguæ,
Cum facit ut digito, que sint præsentia, monstrant.
Proinde putare aliquem tum nomina distribuissè
Rebus, & inde homines didicissè vocabula prima, Desipere est: nam cur hic possèt cuncta notare
Vocibus, & varios sonitus emittere linguæ,
Tempore eodem alii facere id non posse putentur?
Præterea, si non alii quoque vocibus usi
Inter se fuerant, unde insita notities est
Utilitatis? & unde data est huic prima potestas,
Quid vellet, facere ut scirent, animoque viderent?
Cogere item plures unus, victosque domare
Non poterat, rerum ut perdiscere nomina vellet;
Nec ratione docere ulla suadereque surdis,
Quid sit opus factò: faciles neque enim paterentur;
Nec ratione ulla sibi ferrent amplius aures
Vocis inaudito sonitus obtundere frustra.*

Kind Nature Power of framing Sounds affords
To Man, and then Convenience taught us Words;
As Infants now, for want of Words devise Expressive Signs, they speak with Hands and Eyes,
Their speaking hand the want of Words supplies.
That One the various Names of Things contriv'd,
And that from him their Knowledge all deriv'd,
'Tis fond to think: For how could that Man tell?
The Names of Things, or lisp a Syllable,
And not another Man perform't as well?

Besides, if others us'd not Words as soon,
How was their Use, and how their Profit known?
Or how could he instruct the other's Mind,
How make them understand what was design'd?
For his, being single, neither Force nor Wit,
Could conquer many Men, nor would they submit
To learn his Words, and practise what was fit.
How he persuade those so unfit to hear?
Or how could savage they with patience bear
Strange Sounds and Words still rattling in their Ear?

Mr. Creech.

He concludes, that since brute Creatures could by different Sounds express different Motions of their Mind,

— *Quid in hac mirabile tantoperè est re,
Si genus humanum, cui vox & lingua vigeret,
Pro vario sensu varias res voce notarent?*

— Since Organs fit, since Voice and Tongue,
By Nature's Gift bestow'd to them belong;
What wonder is it then, that Men should frame,
And give each different Thing a different Name?

Mr. Creech.

The chief Design of Lucretius, in these Arguments, seems to have been to oppose Cratylus in Plato, who celebrates the first Inventor of Words, and the first Author of the Names of Things, as a Person of the highest Wisdom: An Opinion which we shall examine by and by. And indeed those who believ'd the first Mortals to have crawl'd out of the Earth,

Mutum & turpe pecus,

A Dumb and Dirty Herd, could not easily hit on any other Account. For 'tis manifest, that no Languages are born with a Man, but all are learnt by Use and Experience. Whence it comes to pass, that Persons born deaf, are likewise dumb. And 'tis look'd on almost as a Prodigy, when such an one is taught to speak; as hath been in the present Age perform'd on the Brother of Velasco, Constable of Castile; who having been deaf from his Cradle, was made to speak, to write, to read, and to understand Authors. And an Instance of the like wonderful Operation was not long since given by Dr. Wallis at Oxford. Nor doth it look probable, that some one Man in the Beginning should have fram'd a whole Language, with an exact Contexture of Words, and a just Agreement and Conformity to the Things which they were to represent. But 'tis the general Opinion of Christians, founded on the Authority of the Holy Scriptures, that the first Language was by Almighty God immediately infus'd into the Original Pair, which their Children easily learnt, by the Use and Custom of hearing. And that, as for the Diversity of Tongues, this was miraculously produced by the Confusion at Babel. Yet some have doubted, whether even the Language which Adam spoke, was at first compleatly full and perfect, and rich enough to express all manner of Conceptions; inasmuch as the Scripture directly mentions only the Names which he set on living Creatures. As it is certainly true of most Tongues, that they were at first very poor, and very plain, but were enrich'd in time with Copiousness and Elegance: As likewise that they have, in a long Course of Years, undergone very signal Alterations; and that from their Corruption and Confusion many new ones have, within the Compass of a few Ages, sprung up in the World ^a.

IV. But this is most clear and evident, That the Power of signifying determinately, thus or thus, that is, of raising such certain Ideas in our Mind, doth not belong to Words by Nature, but ariseth purely from the Pleasure and the Imposition of Men ^b; for otherwise no Reason could be given, why different Words should, in different Languages, be applied to express the same thing. Which is likewise true concerning the different Forms and Characters of Letters. St. Austin (de Doctrin. Christian. l. ii. c. 24.) hath made this Observation on the Point; "That one Letter fashion'd like a Cross (X) imports one Thing amongst the Greeks, and another amongst the Latins; not by the Appointment of Nature, but by the Pleasure and Consent of Men, in fixing such different Significations; and a Person who understands both Languages, when he would express his Mind in Writing to a Grecian, useth this Character differently from what he doth when he writes to a Roman. Thus too the Word Beta, under one and the same Sound, in Greek is the Name of a Letter, in Latin the Name of a Pot-herb: And when I say, Lege, these two Syllables are by those different People understood in different Senses. See the Art of Speaking, by Father Lami, B. I. c. 14. Edit. Amst. 1699. Nor is it any Presumption to the contrary, that we believe Adam ^c to have given Names to the Creatures, not as it fell out by Chance, but with the highest Reason and Design; such as were taken from the peculiar Nature of the Things, and fully and accurately express'd their distinguishing Properties, so as that upon the first Sound of the Words, the Nature of each Thing might be understood; as Philo the Jew reports ^d. For although we should grant that the Names set on Animals, and some other Things (for no Man can easily prove this of all) were such as denoted their Genus and Disposition, or their principal Affection; yet those very Primitives whence these Names were deriv'd, signify merely at Pleasure. For Instance, though Adam gave this Reason for the Name of Eve, Because she was the Mother of all Living; yet that the Word hava should import to live, is absolutely owing to Imposition: And though in all Languages, Things allied by Nature are usually allied in Name, there being observed in most Words of this kind, some Conformity of Structure, and which the Grammarians term Analogy; yet this is by no means constant and regular, many Words having very particular Ways and Methods of Variation; and even this Analogy it self, inasmuch as it consists in a certain Inflection and Combination of Words, is it self establish'd by human Appointment. This is the Judgment of Quintilian himself ^e; We must remember, says he, that the Rule and Method of Analogy cannot universally be drawn, since in many Places it is apparently inconsistent with it self: For Analogy was not, at the first Production of Mankind, sent down immediately from Heaven, to teach them the due Form of Speech; but was invented after they had accusom'd themselves to Discourse, and had observ'd the particular Cadences of every Word. It is not therefore built upon Reason, but Example; nor is it the Law, but the Experiment and Remark of Speaking; Analogy being indeed the Effect of nothing but Custom.

In Plato's Cratylus ^f, the Opinion of the Person whose Name the Dialogue bears, is to this purpose; that every individual Being includes in its Nature the true Reason of its Name; which is vain and absurd: And that that is not properly the Name of a Thing, by which Men agree to call it, by uttering such or such a Portion of their Voice; which in onesense may be admitted for true; that is, when some particular Men, contrary to common use, impose odd Names on Things for the Deception of others: As in the Case of Jugglers, Strawlers, and Gypsies; with regard to which, feign'd Names are oppos'd to true; being fix'd on Persons, or Things, contrary to the publick Imposition; but there is one and the same true Reason of Names, innate alike to the Greeks and Barbarians; which Assertion is likewise false. Hermogenes in the same Dialogue thus delivers his Opinion on the other side; I can never be persuaded that there is any other Rule or Standard for the

MR. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on §. IV.

^b This is the Opinion of Philo the Jew in the Creation of the World. For Mr. Hertius quotes another Passage here very unfitly, where he treats of the Suitableness of the Seventy's rendring the Original Hebrew into Greek, as Philo affirms, who says, that they have found proper Words to express the Sense of the Law of Moses, καὶ ἔτοι σωτηρέζοντα πῶς πρὸς ἡμασιν ὀνόματα ἐξέβουλον. From which last Word Mr. Hertius might have observed, that he speaks of more than one Person, and that it ought not to be translated advenit, he found out, but they, seeing the Sequel of the Discourse can't otherwise be clear. The Passage is in the Life of Moses, Lib. 2. Several of the Rabbins, and most of the Christian Interpreters follow Philo's Judgment; but nothing is worse grounded. See Mr. Le Clerc on Gen. ii. 19. and F. Malbranche in his Enquiries after Truth, p. 387.

^c The Latin of Quintilian is this, Sed meminimus, non per omnia duci analogiæ posse rationem, cum ἔσ' sibi ipsa plurimis in locis repugnet—Non enim cum primum fingerentur homines, Analogia demissa celo formam loquendi dedit, sed inventa est, postquam loquebantur, ἔσ' notatum in jermoni, quid quoque modo caderet, itaque non ratione utitur, sed exemplo; nec lex est loquendi, sed observatio; ut ipsam Analogiam nulla alia res fecerit, quam consuetudo. But here demissa is falsely printed for dimissa, which is doubtless a Fault in the Printing, though it is not set down among the Errata.

^d Our Author gives himself liberty in these four first Paragraphs of this Chapter to enlarge upon Things very evident in themselves, and well known; and therefore ought rather to be supposed than proved in a Work of this Nature; and here is particularly in this Place a long Confutation of some Reasonings which are met with in one of Plato's Dialogues. I would willingly have left it quite out, but not daring to assume that Power, have thought it sufficient to let the Reader know that it is an useless Digression.

Plato's Words are, ὀνόματα (ὁ ὀνόματα ἔ) ἐκείων τ' ὄντων φύσει πεφυκίαι, καὶ ἢ τὸ πῶς ἔ) ὄνομα, ὃ, πᾶν πνεύσι (ὡς δὲ μέγιστοι καλεῖν, καλῶσι, τ' αὐτῶν σωτῆς μέγιστον ὀνομαστικῶς) ἀλλὰ ὀνόματα πᾶσι ὀνομαστικῶν πεφυκίαι, καὶ ἔλληνσι καὶ βαρβάρους τ' αὐτῶν ἀπασιν, Herm. Ὅτι ὀνόματα πιδθῆναι, ὡς ἄλλη τις ἐστὶν ὀρθότης ὀνόματι, ἢ συνθήκη, καὶ ὁμοιογία, ἢ γὰρ φύσει ἐκείων πεφυκίαι ὄνομα. ἔθεν ἔθεν, ἀλλὰ νόμα καὶ ἔχει τὸν ἐθιστικόν, καὶ καλόντων.

^e Comp. Hobbes's Leviathan, c. 4. ^f This Opinion is ill founded, as Mr. Le Clerc makes appear in his Notes upon Gen. ii. 19. See Malbranche's Search after Truth, p. 387.

Names of Things, than Compact or Consent: 'Tis my Judgment, that the Name which a Man fixeth on any thing, whatever it be, is true and proper; and that if he afterwards alter that Name for another, the last is no less true and right than the former; as 'tis usual with us to change the Names of our Servants (which will hold good, provided no Prejudice be hence done to the common Agreement) for nothing naturally hath such or such an Appellation, but derives it purely from the Law and Custom of Speaking. What Socrates disputes on the side of Cratylus, doth by no means turn the Cause; thus for Instance, when he scouts it as an Absurdity, If I should give the Name of a Horse to what we commonly call a Man, it would follow, that the same thing might be truly stiled, A Horse and a Man. It may be answer'd, in short, that Words of publick Use derive all their Force from publick Imposition, which private Persons ought not, to its Prejudice, to contradict; as we shall shew more at large hereafter. Again, that Argument of his is no better than a Fallacy; If a whole Proposition may be false, therefore a part of it, as suppose, the Noun, or Name of a thing, may be likewise false. For a single Word is not capable of that Falsty, which we sometimes discover in entire Propositions. The long Discourse he afterwards makes about the Propriety of Terms, will only hold in some Derivatives, but not in Primitives. And since the same things are in different Countries express'd by different Words, it likewise frequently happens, that Words which signify the same thing, have an Etymology utterly distinct. Thus Θεός, the Greek Name for God, is deriv'd from θεῖν to run; because the Stars which are perpetually running their Course, were look'd on as Gods by the Antients: But what Affinity is there in the Latin Tongue between Deus and Curro? So Man is in Greek term'd ἄνθρωπος, quasi ἀναθεῶν ἀποπνεύων, from considering or contemplating the Objects which he beholds. But must we therefore say, that homo in Latin comes from contemplatio? The Soul in Greek is named ψυχή from ἀναψύχων, to cool or refresh: But is refrigeratio in Latin for this Reason, the Theme of Anima? And the same may be shewn in any other Instances. In short, however diligent any Person may be in tracing Etymologies, and assigning the Reasons of Words, yet when he hath gone as high as he can, to the primitive and simple Terms, he will be forc'd to acknowledge, that they are purely owing to Imposition^a. What can be more ridiculous, than that of Socrates, when, in the Disputation of which we have been speaking, he is required to give a Reason for the Words πῦρ and ὕδωρ, he can say nothing else, but that they owe their Original to the Barbarians? Indeed he himself confesseth, that there can be no farther Questions or Answers, about Reasons and Derivations, when we are once arriv'd at the first Element of both. Though he afterwards is very ingenious to no purpose, in tracing out the Reasons even of primitive Words: And yet after all, when he hath argued so long, in all Appearance, for Cratylus's Opinion, he at last fairly doubts on the whole Matter.

Sospater Charisius^{*b} the Grammarian, thus discourseth out of Varro, The Latin Tongue is made up of Nature, Analogy, Custom, and Authority. The Nature of Verbs and Nouns is immutable, and delivers to us neither less nor more than what is receiv'd. Thus if a Man should say scrimbo instead of scribo, he would be convinc'd, not by the Power and Virtue of Analogy, but by the very Constitution of Nature. But we must confess ourselves at a loss to find out this Necessity of Nature, unless it be said, that the Latin Tongue having in it an extraordinary Sweetness, wonderfully agreeable to the Ear, it must hence come to pass, that we reject, at the first hearing, any harsh and untunable Conjunction of Letters in that Language^d. Arnobius^{†c} speaks excellently to this Point; No way of Speaking, says he, is by Nature either true and right, or false and improper: For what natural Reason can be given, or what Law, in the general Constitution of the World, that we should say, hic paries, and hæc sella? Since neither do those things admit of different Sexes, so as to be distinguished by the Masculine and Feminine Genders; nor can the most learned Critick inform me of the Original Reason and Meaning of these Terms, hic and hæc; or why the first should be applied to the Male, and the second to the Female Sex. All this proceeds from the arbitrary Appointment of Mankind.

Grotius[‡] rightly rejects the Opinion of those who make this to be the difference between Things and Words, that the latter are naturally the Signs of our Thoughts, the former not. Indeed if the Meaning of the Assertion be no more than this, that Words were instituted for no other end, but to be the Signs of our Conceptions, and that therefore their whole Nature and Essence consists in their Power of signifying; whereas when Things are used for Signs, this is merely extrinsecal and accidental to them; we ought then by all means to admit it as true. But if it be intended in this Sense, that the Power of signifying such or such a particular Matter inheres naturally in Words, but not in Things, the Position is false and groundless. And on the contrary it is true, that Words naturally, and without respect to human Imposition, signify nothing at all, unless it be some such confused and inarticulate Sound as we make use of in Sorrow, or in Laughter, which ought rather to be call'd Noise, than Speech. If the said Notion be

^a To this we may add the Remark of Quintilian, Instit. Orat. l. 1. c. 6. p. 64. Edit. Lugd. Bat. Shall it be affirm'd likewise, that Man took his Name of Homo, because he was, Homo natus, born of the Earth? As if all Animals had not the same Original! Or, as if those Primitive Mortals first set a Name upon the Earth, and then upon themselves!

^b Instit. Grammat. l. 1. ex Varrone. ^c We meet with the same in Diomedes, l. 2. ^d Vid. Huart. Tryal of Wits, c. 11. The Reason alledg'd by P. Nigidius, to prove that Words signify according to Nature, in Aul. Gell. l. 10. c. 4. is altogether vain and frivolous. ^e Lib. 1. adverst. gent. p. 45. Edit. Parisi. 1605. ^f Lib. 3. c. 1. f. 8.

thus explain'd, that such is the Nature of Man above all other Animals, that he can signify to others the Conceptions of his Mind, and that Words were invented to be the Instruments of Communication, then the Assertion is true, but not complet: For it should be added, that these Discoveries are conveyed, not by Words alone, but by Nods and other Motions. As we find several dumb Persons who are able to express their inward Conceptions after a very surprizing and artificial manner. Hence, in the Roman Law^a, those who have not the Gift of Speech, are yet supposed to say thus or thus, By that Striving and Straining which they use, and that Sound and inarticulate Voice which is utter'd by them. And 'tis a Rule in the same Law^b, That dumb Persons may contract Matrimony, by mutual Consent, without Words; that is, it shall be sufficient if they express their Agreement by dumb Signs. Nay Pliny^c tells us of some Nations of Ethiopia, who had no other Speech amongst them, besides these Gestures and Motions of the Body^d.

To the same Head belong those Marks and Characters which do not denote Voices or Words, but immediately the very Things themselves. And this, either upon account of some Agreeableness which they bear to the things represented; as in most of the Egyptian Hieroglyphicks; or because the Imposition of Men hath invested them with such a Power, as in the Chinese Characters, by which they express entire Notions and Sentences.

It may not be inconvenient to remark somewhat concerning that kind of Imposition, by which such a peculiar or proper Name is affix'd to Persons, Places, and some other Things; the Design of which is, that one Man, one Place, one City or Country, may be distinguished from another; and that by these Marks there may be a mutual Understanding between Men, in determining their Words or Actions. Now as the proper Terms of other things follow the manner of appellative, or common Nouns, so with regard to the proper Names of Men, it is to be observ'd, that the Power of imposing them usually belongs to those who have others under their Authority and Government: Thus Parents are wont to give Names to their Children, Masters to their Slaves and Vassals, and Princes to those of their Subjects, on whom they confer any signal Honour. In case this Office be omitted by those Superiors who have such a right to perform it; or in case many have been invested with the same Title; it shall be lawful for every Person to take upon himself some Term and Note of Distinction: But as no Man ought to assume another Name; when by such an Act of his, the general End of imposing Names may be intercepted and hindered; or when upon this Alteration, any Damage or Prejudice, or any probable Danger and Suspicion of it, is likely to accrue to another Person; so neither ought any Man to hide or dissemble his true Name; unless in such a Case, when by this Concealment we do not prejudice the Rights of others, and yet procure some Advantage to our selves, or effect our Deliverance from Loss or Danger; according to those Rules which we shall hereafter deliver about the Obligation to speak Truth. Add. Valer. Max. l. ix. c. ult. and l. vii. c. 3. n. 8, 9. See the Oration of M. Anton. Majoragius on the same Subject, and Casaubon ad Baron. Exercitat. XIII. n. 13.

V. As all Signs, except those which we call natural, denote some determinate thing by virtue of human Imposition, so this Imposition is attended with a certain Agreement, Consent, or Compact, tacit or express; from the Force of which there ariseth a Necessity of applying such a Sign to such a particular thing, and to none else. The like Covenant must be supposed in relation to all those Things which we use for Signs, whatever Account we follow of the Origin of human Speech. For although we conceive the primitive Languages to have been immediately infused into Men, yet since each Person separately enjoy'd his Power of Discourse, and could use it freely as he pleas'd, by applying any Words to any Things; this Faculty would not have obtain'd its proper End and Use, unless an Agreement had pass'd between Men, that each Party should exercise their Talent in the same uniform manner, and constantly express the same Things by the same Words¹. For since he who is placed in a State of natural Liberty, doth not hold his Powers at the Beck and Controul of others, but hath the Privilege of using them as his own Judgment shall direct, another Person would have no manner of Right to require of me, that I should apply my Powers in such a particular way², and

¹ It is more probable, that the Signification of Words is settled by a bare Consent, where there is no Obligation to consider it in itself. For, 1. Men never met together to agree upon the precise Signification of Words, or Rules of Speech. It came to pass insensibly, and without any Reflection; neither was there any tacit Agreement properly so called. We may every Day discern new Words, Expressions, and Turns of Speech to come into use, which put a new Sense upon the Terms already received. And how comes it to pass that they are practis'd by others? No Man pretends to lay any Obligation upon them, farther, than as they serve to convey the Truth from one to another in Conversation. 2. If the Signification of Words were settled by any obligatory Agreement, either express or tacit, the least Change, contrary to common Usage, would make it criminal, though no Man received any Damage by it, which none will dare to maintain, and which is daily confuted by our usual Practice, which all must own, and which on the contrary serves marvelously to set off and enrich all Languages. This is what Mr. Titius says very near, Obsere. 245.

² This proves well enough the Necessity of a bare Constitution, but not of an obligatory Consent. The Obligation, which respects the use of a Word, depends upon other Principles, as will appear from what is said, §. 7, &c. both in the Text and Notes. Whenever we are obliged to speak and manifest our Thoughts clearly, we ought to follow the common Usage, and choose the most suitable Terms; but in any other Case we may put a different Sense upon Words, which is not used, and speak in Terms clear contrary to what we think, which could not be done, if there were any Agreement, either open or tacit, which accompanied the Institution of Language.

ten the Style which those People bestow on themselves. It is here likewise worthy to be consider'd, that most Terms of Speech, besides their principal, have a kind of accessory ⁴ or additional Signification, by which we at the same time express our Judgment, Passion, or Esteem. And this is the reason, that of many Words which as to their main Importance exactly fall in with each other, some are opprobrious and injurious, others not; because this additional Signification is found in some, and not in the rest. Thus if I give a Man the Lye, I not only signify that his Speech is disagreeable to his Thought, but further denote, that he did this with an ill Intention, and on account of procuring my Prejudice or Hurt. And 'tis on the score of this latter Indication that the Words are look'd upon as contumelious and injurious. So if I call any Person an Impostor, or an Ignoramus, I affront him; because those Names, besides their proper meaning, include, by the bye, somewhat of Contempt and Reproach: Whereas there are many other Words, by which I may, without any such Affront or Abuse, signify myself to have been hurt by another, or shew that another is ignorant of some things; and which consequently shall only declare the direct Sense, without any such Indication of Disgrace. Sometimes this additional Mark ariseth, not from the general Imposition of Men, but from the Tone of the Voice (which is different according as we either teach and admonish, or flatter and court, or chide and reprove) from the Lines of the Face, from particular Gestures, and other natural Signs, which are wont very considerably to alter, diminish, or increase, the principal Signification of Words. And thus too a figurative Speech very often denotes some Passion in the Speaker, whereas a plain Expression barely imports the thing asserted: Usque adeone mori miserum est^a? denotes no more than if we should say barely, non est usque adeo miserum mori; because it includes a Contempt of Death. From the same accessory Meaning it comes to pass, that some Words are accounted obscene, others not; tho' as to the main they signify the same thing; nay, tho' the thing be not really in itself foul or indecent. The reason of which Difference seems in part to be this; that since some Words express a Thing or an Act more loosely and generally, others in a more distinct manner, and with particular Circumstances; therefore he who makes use of the latter sort, at the same time betrays his Lust, with regard to such a Thing or Act, and discovers a Satisfaction and Approbation which a Man of Virtue and Breeding would be asham'd of. Sometimes too the Obscenity of Words proceeds from hence, that they either denote a Contempt of the Thing signified, or else are used only among the baser People, or towards such to whom we owe no Reverence or Respect^b. Casaubon, in his Comment on Persius^c, hath disputed at large, whether it be allowable to apply obscene Words even to the Reproof and Correction of Vice, which is the ordinary Practice of satyrical Writers.

Those Words are grounded on special Compact, which either have been invested with a peculiar Signification, different from what they bear in common Use, or which are utterly unknown to the ordinary Methods of Speech. Of which kind are all those Terms of Art, used by Mechanicks, and others; which on account of either the Multiplicity and Confusion of Things, or the meer Pleasure of the Authors, have either been invented a-new, or apply'd to another Meaning than what they obtain'd in vulgar Discourse. Now that no Man may be deceiv'd by these Terms, amongst Persons who understand the particular Art, the very Nature of the Business in hand will be a sufficient Caution and Security. And amongst the unskilful they ought to be explain'd and limited by common Words. Which Explication and Settlement is likewise necessary, when either Artificers differ about the use of their Terms; or when any Person for some particular Reasons thinks fit either to coin new Words, or to fix a new Sense on old ones^d. Some few Persons in Confederacy may, and often do frame to themselves peculiar Words and Marks of Things, or put a different Signification on vulgar Terms, so as to be understood by each other, and by none besides. (And how far this Practice is lawful, will appear from the Sequel of our Enquiry.) In which Point it is enough, if those Words or Marks rightly discover my Mind to those, with whom I have thus enter'd into a particular Covenant about their use: And this holds too in other Signs, determin'd by the peculiar Imposition of certain Men. Amongst these the principal are the military Tokens and Signals of War; of which Silence itself hath been sometimes used for one. Thus in Polyænus^e the Arcadian General undertaking by Night to surprize the Spartans at the Togæa, gave his Soldiers no other Sign but this, That they should kill all who ask'd for any Sign. The Arcadians therefore were silent; but the Spartans not knowing their Fellows in the dark, and so demanding the Word, were slaughter'd by the Enemy. And so Pammenes, in the same Author^f, put a Cheat upon his Enemies by altering the Signal of the Trumpet, and quite inverting the ordinary Method and Use; commanding his Men to fall on when a Trumpet founded a Retreat, and to retire when it seem'd to call them to a close Engagement.

VII. But we must carefully observe, that altho' by this general and special Compact we are bound to use our Words and other Signs in the manner that hath been agreed upon; yet we are not hereby in the least oblig'd to open and discover our Minds to all Persons. To which may be apply'd the Saying of Apollonius Tyanæus (in Philostrat. l. iv. c. 11. p. 191. Edit. Par. Morel An. 1608.) Palamedes invented Letters, not only for the sake of writing, but likewise that Men might come to the Knowledge of those things which were not to be written. But to effect this, it is necessary that another Obligation be added, arising either from some particular Covenant, or from the general Command of the Law of Nature: Or lastly, from the Quality and Condition of the Business which is at

^r To explain this Matter distinctly, we are to observe, that Speech, as all other Actions of an indifferent Nature, is to be govern'd by three great Principles of Duty, of which we have spoken before, but must now repeat them, viz. Religion, Self-love, and Society. I. When we speak to God, we must always speak the Truth freely. This is evident of itself, tho' our Author proves it briefly in the beginning of §. 10. Nor may we ever abuse our Speech, when we speak to Men, to the Dishonour of God. See what I have said after our Author in Note 2. upon Lib. 2. Chap. 4. §. 3. II. When we make use of Speech in behalf of ourselves, either to secure or defend ourselves, or to procure ourselves some innocent Advantage, which neither trenches upon the Glory of God, or the Rights of our Neighbour. In this Case 'tis not only permitted, but expressly ordain'd by the Law of Nature, either to speak the Truth, or be silent; or to feign and dissemble, as a lawful Defence of ourselves, or our innocent Advantage requires. III. The Duties of Society oblige us also, either to speak the Truth plainly, or be silent, or feign and dissemble, if by that Means we can either do good to others, or avert the Danger which threatens them, without doing any thing contrary to the Glory of God, or to the Damage of any Man. Thus, as our Author speaks, Lib. 2. c. 3. §. 4. we must give Counsel faithfully to them that desire it, and shew them the right way, who are out of it. But on the contrary, we must be silent in things which may be prejudicial to any Person when spoken, either as to their Person, Goods, or Reputation. Thus if a mad Man running after another with a Sword in his Hand to slay him, asks us which way he went, we may not only, but we ought to shew him another way than that which the Person pursued took to save himself. And I can't think that any Man will dare to maintain the contrary. By the same Reason the wise Midwives of Egypt did very well to find out so good an Excuse to Pharaoh, as we may see by the Reward God gave them. In short, the greatest Abuse of Speech is, without Contradiction, this, To make it an Instrument of Damage to another. See §. 15. following. Hence it follows, that Men ought above all things to act sincerely in Bargains, and keep their Word inviolably when they have made a serious Engagement. Moreover, we ought to remember what I have elsewhere observ'd, that when the Duties of Society and Self-love are equally concern'd, these last ought to be follow'd, and so we may lawfully use our Speech for our own Advantage rather than any others. This is grounded upon Mr. Titius's Observ. 248, &c. tho' his Opinion is not a while the less singular. It is certain, that, as Grotius has observ'd, Lib. 3. c. 1. §. 9. most of the Heathen Philosophers and Antient Christians believed with St. Augustin, That whatever may be call'd a Lye, is always unlawful, altho' that Matter be not well explain'd, as our Author has done after Grotius. And since these two famous Works have appear'd in the World, very few, who have been conversant in the Study of Natural Right, but have embraced their Notions. See, for example, Mr. Thomasius, Jurisprud. Divin. Lib. 2. c. 8. Mr. Buddeus, Elem. Phil. Pract. Part. II. Sect. 6. §. 3, &c. Mr. Fabricius in a Note upon the false Abdias, which makes a part of the Apocrypha of the New Testament; Mr. Noodt De Forma emend. deli mali, &c. c. 3. and several other famous Writers. I might also alledge a great Philosopher of our Time, who had not occasion to explain this Point in his Writings, but he does not treat of it with Authority, wherefore I shall come to examine their Reasons. Those that maintain, that all Speech which is utter'd contrary to our Thoughts, is essentially faulty, ought to alledge good Proofs for it, taken either from the Nature of the Thing, or from some convincing Passage of Scripture. 1. As to the Nature of the Thing, I have not yet seen any thing satisfactory produced. Our Author proves it well; and I will examine in a few Words the new Hypothesis of a modern Author in Note 2. on §. 10. All that has hitherto been said with any shew of Reason, may be reduced to these two or three Difficulties, which are not hard to be resolv'd. The first is this, If the Opinion, say they, that allows Men to feign and dissemble upon certain Occasions, either in Deed or Word, be once received, all Confidence in one another must be banish'd from the Earth, and by consequence all Society destroy'd. For a Man can't open his Mouth, or do the least Thing; but it will be first demanded of him, Whether he does not believe, that he may in that case do otherwise than he thinks? But this Argument seems to be built on a Supposition entirely false, viz. That the Confidence by which our Dealings in this Life are maintain'd, is grounded only on this Persuasion, that they who speak, ought to say or do nothing but what answers exactly to their Thoughts, their own Conscience being Judge. For Experience and the Knowledge of the World prove the contrary evidently. I own, that Professed Liars, Natural Dissemblers, False Dealers, or Slaves to vile Interest, in a word, all those whose Honesty is dubious, are not proper Objects of our Confidence, and we ought not to trust them, but with very great Caution, if they shew that they believe that one may lawfully sometimes speak contrary to Truth, or profess, that they believe it always allowable. But when we have to do with honest Men, we put not the less Confidence in them because we know they may use an innocent Feint or Dissimulation, and because we have seen them used ourselves in certain Cases with good Reason for their own particular Advantage, or that of their Parents and Friends. As every one is willing to have that Liberty, so he readily grants it to others; and he can't refuse it them, or impute it to them as a Crime, without being accounted, and that justly too, unreasonable and foolishly nice. But, say they, the Benefit which may be obtain'd by a Lye will vanish into nothing, if we once teach that a Lye is allowable. For a Lye can be of no Advantage but upon this Supposition, that they to whom we Lye, believe that we do not Lye, and that we make a Conscience of speaking the Truth. If there be an Occasion offer'd wherein 'tis lawful to Lye, 'tis to administer a Medicine to a sick Person that may save his Life. But supposing that we are taught that Physicians are exempted from speaking Truth upon that Occasion, it will happen that they will not be believed, tho' they speak Truth; and so we shall fall into Inconveniences infinitely greater than those which we endeavour to avoid, by allowing them sometimes to Lye. Either the sick Person believes that the Physician will not Lye, or at least that he may as well speak the Truth; but how can he believe the first, if he knows that upon such Occasions he may Lye? And will not the Doubt keep him from taking the Medicine presented to him? To this I answer, that all this is made evidently false by Experience. Whatever rigid Divines and Casuists may say, 'tis certain, that there are a thousand little Lyes, which almost all the World believe allow'd, and which nevertheless fail not to produce their Effect. When one is in general persuaded that others are innocent, he is not always upon his guard to examine upon every Occasion particularly, whether the Person we have heard may not have reason to persuade us that a Thing is false, which is not. We are not so ready to distrust one another when we have no Cause of Suspicion; and there is scarce any Man, who, tho' he has been innocently deceived by his Physician or Friend, will not nevertheless believe them again upon the like Occasion, if they know how to take him aright, and behave themselves well. He may perhaps doubt a while after, but the first Impressions, and the innocent Artifice, when it has had effect, is soon forgotten; but if sometimes it is not successful, it only proves that there were not good Measures taken, or that some Circumstances render'd the Thing unprofitable, but that proves not that it was unlawful and criminal in itself. Some object farther, that if to speak contrary to a Man's Thought is an Action of like Nature with local Motion, and other outward Actions, which having nothing unlawful in themselves, may become good or evil, according to the different Intentions by which they are done, there will be no evil to make use of that Means for our most vile and trifling Interests, as if I desire a Pin when it is necessary, or stoop to take it up when I see it lie upon the Boards of my Chamber, nothing hinders but that I may tell a Lye to get it, provided I do no Man any wrong by it. But this Consequence does not seem to be well drawn. For the use of Speech is not only guided by Justice, Humanity, and Charity, but also by Maxims of Prudence. For no wise Man will have recourse to the least Disguise, but in Cases of Necessity. Let us hear a pleasant antient Writer upon this Subject, whom neither Grotius nor our Author have quoted. Οὐδὲ περὶ τῶν ἡρότων, ὅσοι τὴν χρείαν ἐνεκα ψεύδονται, συζῶντες τιναξὺν ἐπιγεμαλλον καὶ ἐπάμειπτες αὐτῶν ἀξιοί, ὅσοι καὶ πολεμίας ὀνητήρησαν, ἢ ἐπισωτηρία τῶν τοιῶν φαρμακῶν ἐχρήσαντο ἐν τοῖς δεινοῖς, οἷα πολλά, καὶ Ὀδύσσεος ἐπίειε, τὴν τε αὐτῆς ψυχὴν ἀρνύμενον, καὶ τὴν ῥόσον τῶν ἐταίρων, ἀλλὰ περὶ ἐκείνων, ὧς αἰεὶ, φημί, οἱ αὐτὸ ἀνέν τῆς χρείας τὸ ψεύδωσθαι, ἢ ἀληθείας τίθειν, ἢ ὁδύσσει τῶν πραγμάτων, καὶ ἐνὶ ταῖς βίαις ἐπ' ἄλλοια προσοσσι ἀναγκαῖα, Lucian in Mendac. vel Incredul. in Princip. "I speak not, says the Discourser in the Dialogue, of them who Lye for their Profit, they are to be excused, and some commended; as for example, such as Lye to deceive their Enemy, or them who make use of it as a Remedy to escape some great Danger, as Ulysses often did to save his Life, or to procure the return of his Compa-

and Hiring) to explain and communicate to him a Person with a Commission to search into the all that belongs to that Art or Profession. If I send State of such or such an Affair, he is bound by nions, but that which surprizes me most, is to see some Men, without any Advantage to themselves, to delight more in Lying than speaking the Truth, and continue in it all their Days without Necessity. Indeed, when Men lye in Bravery, and make a Trade of it, they lose all Credit with the Wife. Otherwise, though an honest Man believes he may innocently, for some good Reason, by his Discourse and Actions, make another understand him of a thing he thinks not, yet he does not therefore neglect a Correspondence between his Words, and Actions, and Thoughts, as the most natural Use of the Tongue, and other outward Motions, so that this Agreement is disturbed against his Will, being forced to it by the Constitution of humane Affairs, and by the Indiscretion, Imprudence, and Malice of the greatest part of Mankind; at least, if he be not engaged in a thing that brings Trouble, his Candour and Freedom, which are the Characters of a truly good Man, will hinder him from speaking or doing any thing which may make his Sincerity and Fidelity be suspected in the least. But there is another thing which ought to keep us from using any Equivocation, but with much Reserve and Circumpection, which is, that we ought not only to avoid all Evil, but every thing that tends to it. For it is certain, that by Lying, Feigning, and Dissembling upon slight Occasions, Men get a Habit of Dissimulation and Counterfeiting, which degenerates into a Vice, because it will incline us to be insincere with those to whom we ought faithfully to discover our Thoughts. For this Reason it is, that we ought to take very great Care to keep Children from Lying (See Montagne's Essays upon this Subject, l. 1. c. 9. and the Treatise of Educating Children, by Mr. Locke, §. 134, &c.) because this Artifice can serve only to hide their Faults, and they are not of Age sufficient to discover the Occasions, when Dissimulation and Counterfeiting is innocent, and so they'll come in time not to speak one Word of Truth, but always have a Lye ready for the least thing. But as to such as are become Men of Understanding, 'tis not to be feared but that they'll be able to set due Bounds to this Permission of Feigning and Dissimulation, provided they seriously labour to regulate their Conduct by the Light of right Reason, without which they may abuse the least disputable and commonly received Moral Principles, and by which they'll be full of Reverence toward God, Lovers of Justice, careful to give every Man his Due, averse to all fraudulent Dealing, and in a word, a truly good Man; and I dare answer for him, will never be guilty of any unlawful Dissimulation, and as far as is possible, he will so order himself, that his Words and Actions shall exactly agree with his Thoughts. I say, as far as is possible, for as the famous English Chancellor, the Lord Bacon, judiciously observes, "Serm. fidel. c. 6. Dissimulation is a necessary Consequence of Silence and Secrecy (Taciturnitatis) inso- much, that whosoever will conceal a thing, must dissemble, do what he can. In truth, Men are too cunning to suffer us to remain in a perfect Indifference, without shewing any Inclination to one or other of the things which they desire to know. They'll attack you, examine and pump you with a thousand Questions, so cunning, that unless you maintain an obstinate and ridiculous Silence, you must discover something of your Sentiments; and if you do nothing to discover them, they'll make such Conjectures upon your Silence, that it will be all one as if you had spoken. You may guard your self a long time by Equivocation, and dark Expressions, but, in a word, there can be no perfect Concealment, if some Degree of Dissimulation be not allow'd; and so Dissimulation is nothing else but a necessary Dependent upon Silence. To keep a just Temper, every Man must get himself a Reputation for Sincerity and Veracity, an Habit of Silence and Secrecy, and an Ability to feign and dissemble, when it is necessary. It is easy to answer all the other Difficulties raised against the Opinion of our Author, and to oppose greater to the contrary. It shall content me to observe, that if this last be true, thousands of Actions which the World accounts innocent, must be condemned, and are practis'd every Day with Deliberation. I do not say, by most of them who are zealous Defenders of this Opinion, but by all Men generally, we may say, that the Question comes to this, Whether (for Example) a Man may say, that such a one is not at Home, or find out some Trick to free our selves from an indiscreet and importunate Person? I do not believe that any Man of Sense will deny himself to have committed such Faults, tho' he is sorry for them. Nevertheless, there is no Medium; either we must condemn our selves for it, or resign our selves to the Indiscretion, Imprudence, and often to the Malice of another, by a general Sincerity, and without Reserve, or we must allow a Permission to speak and act contrary to our Thoughts. Further, to shew the Weakness of the Opinion I am now opposing, I desire it may be consider'd, what Absurdities they engage themselves in, who maintain the contrary Opinion: For these are three Maxims of St. Augustin, which Mr. La Placette approves in Part 1. Moral Essays, 1. That if all Mankind were at the Point of Destruction, and 'twere possible to save them all by a Lye, the Lye must be avoided, and all Mankind perish. 2. That if by telling a Lye we could prevent one or more of our Neighbours from sinning, we ought rather to suffer our Neighbour to sin, than tell a Lye. 3. If by Lying we could keep our Neighbour from eternal Damnation, we should rather leave him to perish, than save him by the loss of Truth. In fine, it is in no wise necessary to determine, when and how many times we are permitted to lye; that depends upon Circumstances, which are infinite, and every Man's Judgment. Here, as in many other moral Subjects, we can give general Rules only. As often as they to whom we speak have no Right to require of us to speak freely what we think, we do them no Injury if we conceal the Truth from them. And so the disguising of the Truth has not the principal Property of a true Lye, which is to give them with whom we treat reason to complain, that we have not dealt sincerely with them. But it does not follow, that we may always speak or act in a manner different from our Thoughts, when a Person hath a Right to require the contrary of us. I have alledged the Reasons that concern our selves above, or the Consequences of taking too large a Liberty. I own that this Permission may be easily abused, and therefore the surest way is to use it as little as possible; but a good use may be made of it; and in what a bad Case shall we be, if we must condemn and disuse all those things, by which Men take an Occasion to excuse or justify their Irregularities? But, II. If it be true, as we have shewed, that the Principles of natural Right afford nothing to prove, that all Discourse, and in general, every exterior Sign differing from our Intentions and Knowledge, is criminal of it self. There is no Evidence to prove that the Holy Scriptures condemns it absolutely, at least, if we may say (what indeed I don't believe) that the Law which forbids Lying and Dissimulation, is a positive Law only. Thus we can't alledge any Text, either in the Old or New Testament, where Lying or Dissimulation is mention'd, but it is accompanied with some Fraud or Cheat, and by which at least some Duty of Charity is broken. Nothing is more common in the Writings of the Hebrews and Hellenists, than to understand by Truth, Fidelity in keeping our Engagements; and by Lying, Perfidiousness, Deceit, and Injury done our Neighbour, after some manner or other. The Reason that St. Paul gives for his Exhortation, To avoid Lying, and speak the Truth every Man to his Neighbour, insinuates plainly enough, that he did not extend his Prohibition to Lyes profitable, and altogether innocent. See Velthuisen De Princ. Justi & Decori, where we may find Reflections which I have omitted. Farther, we may observe in the Scripture several Examples of good Men, who are not blamed for having used Dissimulation, and an innocent Lye. See Mr. Le Clerc on Gen. xii. 13. Moreover, there is one that proves plainly, that it is sometimes commendable to speak contrary to what we think, and that is, of the Egyptian Midwives mentioned before by the Bye. See Exod. i. 20, 21. As to my self, I think an unanswerable Argument for my Opinion may be drawn from it. 'Tis evident, these Women did not speak the Truth to Pharaoh; and if any one doubt of it, he will be convinced, if he reads what Mr. Le Clerc says about it in his Remarks upon the 17th Question of his Uncle; and most of our Interpreters and Divines agree with him. Nevertheless, God hath greatly rewarded that Lye, and consequently not only excuses it, but approves it. For it is an empty metaphysical Subtlety to say, That God rewarded not the Lye, but the Act of Mercy, which those wise Women shewed; as if one and the same Action could be good and evil in divers Respects, or as if a good Intention could render an Action, in its own Nature evil, good. But if this Example do not satisfy, behold another, which will make it plain, that God permits, yea, requires sometimes, that Men use an innocent Delusion. 'Tis of the Prophet who is spoken of, 1 Kings xx. 35, &c. This Holy Man, by God's Order, having caused himself to be beaten, set himself in the way where King Abab was to pass, and cover'd himself with a Veil, that it might not be known that he waited for him; when he perceived him coming, he cried out, and implored his Help; and he tells him how he came in that Condition by an Accident, which he had feigned. He says, That being in the middle of the Battel, a certain Man brought a Prisoner to him, and charged him to keep him safe upon pain of Life, or paying a Talent; but while he was busy up and down, his Prisoner got away. Hereupon the King sends to the Prophet that he had condemned himself; and then the Prophet unveiled himself, declared to him why God had ordered him to use such an Artifice, viz. That Abab might condemn himself by judging in the like Case. See Mr. Le Clerc's Notes upon the Place.

Covenant to acquaint me with all the Discoveries and Informations he hath gain'd about that Matter. If I am to exercise towards another any Duty of Humanity, which must be perform'd by Speech, it is manifest my Words must be agreeable to my Thoughts and Intentions. If a Man undertake to write an History², he is to deliver nothing which he knows to be false, by virtue of that general Obligation by which we are bound to promote the Use and Benefit of others. As we are likewise by a common Engagement tied to express our Minds by the clearest and plainest Signs, in all such Cases, when if we do otherwise, we may bring some Hurt or Prejudice on innocent Persons. So, lastly, in all Commerce and Business between Men, in which, by the Consent of the Parties, some Right or Obligation is to be produc'd, we are to declare our Meaning openly and clearly to the Persons with whom we deal. For otherwise there could be no possible way of rightly adjusting those Concerns. But since it doth not always so happen, that I am bound by any of these Rules to open my Thoughts to another about any Affair, especially such as is private and particular, it is evident from hence, that I am not under an Engagement to unfold all my Opinions and Intentions to Men alike, but those only which they have a Right (either perfect or imperfect) to understand; which Right supposeth a correspondent Obligation on my part: And that therefore I may fairly conceal and dissemble those Things, which another hath no Right to know, and which I myself have no Obligation to disclose³: Nay, in such Cases, where no body else is injur'd in his Right, and where the Advantage or the Safety of myself, or of some other Person, cannot otherwise be procur'd, it shall be allowable for me apply the common Signs in such a manner, as to express what is really contrary to my Judgment. For since the Compact about applying Signs in such a certain way, bears a regard to other Obligations, which are by the means of these Signs to be fulfilled; therefore when those Obligations cease, there appears no reason why I may not make a different Use of the Signs, if I injure no Man, and at the same time have no greater Convenience of benefitting myself or others.

VIII. From these Principles and fundamental Rules, it is easy to understand both the Nature of Truth, which Men are obliged to speak and profess; and the Nature of a Lye, which is so abhorr'd by all the good and honest, and the imputation of which every Man looks on as the foulest Disgrace⁴. The former then consists in this, That the Signs which we make use of, and especially our Words, do in a proper and convenient manner represent our Thoughts to another, who hath a Right to understand them; and to whom we are bound, either by a perfect, or an imperfect Obligation to discover them: And this to the end, that he, by apprehending our Meaning, may obtain some Benefit, or may escape some undeserv'd Evil, which would have follow'd upon our deceiving him. So that besides that Logical Truth, which consists in a Conformity between Words and Things, this Ethical or Moral Truth, of which we are now treating, superadds the Intention and Obligation of the Speaker: On which Score, he who declares the Truth out of Error, or Imprudence, hath barely recited the Logical Truth, but hath not exercis'd the Moral. And he who blabs out any Matter without any Obligation in himself, or any Right in the other Party, ought to be esteem'd rather an idle Prattler, than a Speaker of Truth. And hence 'tis easy to gather, what must be the Nature of a Lye; namely that it is, when our Signs or Words bear a different Sense from our real Conceptions; whereas the Person to whom the Signs were directed, had a Right to understand, and to judge of those Conceptions; and we on our part lay under an Obligation to make him apprehend our Meaning. I take this to be a more clear and distinct way of shewing the Necessity we stand under to declare our real and undisguis'd Intentions, than if I should derive the Sin and the Baseness of Lying, barely from that general Rule of natural Law, that No Man is to be hurt; as if the whole Nature of a Lye consisted in its Power of hurting. For strictly speaking, we do not hurt another by with-holding from him what he hath only an imperfect Right to receive; and yet the Violation of such an imperfect Right is sufficient to constitute a Lye. For the same Reason Philostratus's Notion of a Lye is confus'd and unaccurate, when he reports⁵, That amongst some of the Indians, any Student in Philosophy who was found guilty of this Vice, was render'd incapable of bearing any Magistracy or Honour, Because he had by Lying cheated the common Society of Mankind. But, as in all Acts by which we recede from Law, Error, Imprudence, and Rashness are distinguish'd from Malice, or wicked Design, so neither is any Man properly said to lye, but he who with evil Intention, and pre-conceiv'd Malice, tells another what is really different from his Sentiments or Resolutions, either to prejudice or to delude him. And hence, he who having been deceiv'd by another Man, delivers things which he himself takes to be true, reports a Lye, but is not himself the Lyar. Yet a Person, who catching up Things with too hasty a Credulity, afterwards disperseth them amongst others, exposes himself to the Censure of Rashness and Folly. Nay, the spreading of another Man's Lye, or of a Matter not certainly known, may in some Cases bring an Obligation on the Publisher to repair the Damage occasion'd by the Report; especially when such a Publication approacheth near to that Trespass which the Civilians term *culpa lata*⁶.

IX. Having thus discover'd the true Source, and the genuine Foundation of Truth and of Lyes, we may assure our selves, that those Authors are mistaken, who assert, That a Lye and an Untruth are really the same thing, and that he deserves to be branded with the Name of a Lyar, who says any thing differing from his Judgment; and that consequently to speak otherwise than we think, is in its own Nature base and sinful. An Untruth is when you apply Words in such a manner, as that another shall conceive from them a Sense not agreeable to your inward Imaginations. But now, if the other Party have no Right, by Virtue of which he ought clearly to understand my Meaning; and if I do not hereby prejudice any Man without Cause, there seems to be no Reason, why, if I find it convenient for me, I may not use those Words rather according to my own Pleasure, than the Pleasure of another. Hence every Lye is an Untruth, but every Untruth cannot come under the Name of a Lye: And if we take *Aristotle*¹ in this Sense, when he affirms, That a Lye is in itself foul and disgraceful, there will be no need of Grotius's Limitation, who explains καθ' αὐτὸ, in itself, by Generally, or without regard to the Circumstances. For such an Untruth as escapes Censure, by virtue of some particular Circumstances, ought, on no Account, to suffer the odious Character of a Lye. And, on the other side, that every Lye, properly so called, is in its own Nature base and scandalous, seems to be beyond dispute.

It is worth remarking on this Head, that the very speaking what is true may sometimes create and constitute a Lye: Which not only happens when a Person affirms the Truth with the Air and Address of a Lye, and by his² Manner, his Gestures, and his Actions, which used to be as it were the Life and Soul of Discourse, makes his Hearers believe the contrary to what he delivers; as Quintilian shews us how 'tis possible to be guilty of a Lye, as well as of a Solecism, by a base Action, when we speak one thing, and hint another, by a Posture or a Nod; but it chiefly takes place in those, who by a Practice of frequent Lying have depriv'd themselves of all Credit and Belief. Now such Persons as they are not easily regarded, how willing soever they may be to deliver serious Truths; so they have an opportunity of abusing the Diffidence of a Hearer³, to his Deception and Delusion; who thinking them to be always like themselves, may easily be cheated by believing quite the contrary of what they avow. The Instance in the Fable is well known, where the Boy so often tricked the Countrymen with a false Alarm of the Wolf, that at length, when the Wolf really appear'd, he could not gain Credit enough for their Assistance. *Agessilaus*⁴ turn'd this Fetch into a Stratagem of War. For in as much as 'tis reckon'd most impolitick in a General openly to proclaim his Resolutions, for which reason the Enemy is not wont to believe what is given out in this free and secure manner, Agessilaus by this piece of Subtlety prevail'd on the Persian Nobleman who oppos'd him, to march his Army quite another way than what he had thus publish'd that he would take himself⁵.

But as no Man will presume to condemn the wise Gravity of *Epaminondas*⁶, who could not bear to utter a Lye, tho' in jest: So, on the other hand, it is very weak to believe, that a Person always incurs a heinous Guilt, when, without injuring any one else, and for the Advantage of himself and others, he delivers Words differing from his real Thoughts. It were therefore to be wish'd with *Cicero*⁷, That all Simulation and Dissimulation were utterly banish'd from human Life, and that Men were arriv'd at such a happy Temper, as that no one should envy the Goods of another, or plot to rob him of them: that no one should abuse the Simplicity and Credulity of others to their Prejudice or Deception: and lastly, that no one should in any instance resist the Command of right Reason: Such a strict and accomplish'd Person Achilles pretends to be in *Homer*⁸; it is his brave Declaration,

Ἐχθρὸς γὰρ μοι κείνος, ὁμῶς αἰῶδα πύλησιν,
Ὅς γ' ἕτερον μὲν κεύθει ἐνὶ φρεσίν, ἄλλο δὲ βάζει.

Like Hell I hate the Man, whose Tongue reveals
A different Tale from what his Heart conceals.

But since he, who is ever freely publishing and declaring his own Concerns, lays himself open to the Fraud of wicked Men; and since most Persons are inclined rather to be won upon by Artifice and Shew, than to be convinc'd by solid Plain-dealing; therefore it may not be advisable for us to exclude from human Society, the Art of innocent Dissimulation, till all the Wickedness, and all the Folly of Mankind is turn'd into Probity and Wisdom. Pindar's Remark is excellent to this Purpose, Nem. Od. v. v. 30, &c.

⁶ Not Truth with open Face and open Heart
Is serviceable always, always wise:
But often 'tis in Life the noblest Art,
To know the prudent Use of Silence or Disguise.

But, says Vega, I took another course sometimes, for I answer'd their Lyes with as many Truths; and I found that it turned to as good an account: For they never believed me. Theſeus's Wiſh in Euripides, Hippol. Coron. v. 925, &c. is but vain and fruitleſs. Tho' 'tis certain at the ſame time, that he who makes uſe of theſe practiſes of Concealment and Cunning farther than is neceſſary for his own Defence, renders himſelf unfit to be truſted, and uncapable of being dealt with in any honeſt Affair or Buſineſs; in as much as 'tis impoſſible, but that ſuch a Perſon muſt be ſuſpected in all that he ſays or does.

The Arguments by which ſome attempt to prove that every Untruth is in itſelf odious and ſinful, are of no weight. They tell us, "That the Faſe-speaker deſileth and diſgraceth his Tongue, "that moſt noble Member, by ſuch an Abuſe; "that he deprives himſelf of Credit, to the great "ſtop and hindrance of many good Offices amongſt Men; ſince he never fails to gain this "amongſt other Diſadvantages, not to be believed tho' he ſpeak the Truth. But this Charge holds good only againſt a ſtrict and proper Lye, not againſt ſuch Falſities as Prudence often adviſeth and recommends. They add, "That to falſify, argues "a Man to be of a low and abject Spirit; ſince "he who could rely upon ſolid Plainneſs and "Truth, would have no need to ſeek Refuge in "Tricks and Shifts. But thoſe Untruths, which are both innocent and unneceſſary, do not always proceed from meaneſs of Soul: And ſometimes, amongſt wicked Men, Honesty and Truth itſelf cannot be ſupported, but by indirect and artificial Methods. Others are more fond of this Argument; "Speech is given to be an Interpreter "of the Mind; ſince then every Untruth is contrary to this End, it ought likewiſe to be eſteem'd repugnant to the Order of Nature: and "farther, that to have the Tongue diſſent from "the Mind, quite diſturbs that Harmony which "ſhould appear in the Powers and Faculties of "Man. In Reply, we willingly allow, that Speech is the Interpreter of the Mind; but 'tis in ſuch a manner, as that it ought not to blab out more than the Mind gives it commiſſion to diſcloſe, the Mind being to judge what is convenient to be declared, and what to be concealed.

N. We have aſſerted every Lye to be a Violation of ſome Right; but what kind of Right this is, and how acquired by Men¹, all are not agreed in explaining. Some conceive, that ſince both God and Men have a natural Ability to underſtand the Truth, which is obſtruded by the contrary Speeches, therefore they have, on this very account, a Right of requiring others to expreſs themſelves in an intelligible manner. Now with regard to Almighty God, the thing is beyond diſpute: For to uſe any kind of Falſity in our Addreſſes to him, is not only extremely irreverent, as if bare and open Truth were not as prevalent with the Divine Majeſty, as Colours and Fictions; but alſo in the higheſt degree fooliſh, ſince God doth not ſtand in need of the Information of Men. And therefore Cain^a was not only impious, but ſtupid, in endeavouring to conceal his Brother's Murder from God, eſpecially by ſo impudent and ſo rude a Reply. And thus far that of Sophocles^b will hold good, I hate a Man, who being taken in Wickedneſs, attempts to make his Excuse. But otherwiſe, this is no good Conſequence; A Perſon is naturally capable of underſtanding a matter, therefore he hath a Right to underſtand it; nor doth a physical Ability always infer a moral. As for that which ſome add to what we are now ſaying, That he who hears an Untruth, doth yet underſtand the Words; and therefore that Falſe-speaking doth not take away the Right of Underſtanding; this is nothing at all to the purpoſe. For ſuch an one underſtands indeed; but he underſtands only a Shadow and Fiction, inſtead of the Truth which he deſires.

Others there are which derive that Right which is violated by Lying, not from Nature, but from the Art of Men; that is, from ſome tacit Compact: For, ſay they, ſince Diſcourſe, and other the like Marks and Tokens were introduc'd by human Inſtitution, Men at the ſame time laid a mutual Obligation on each other to uſe theſe Signs in ſuch a manner, as to be able hence to make a Judgment of the Perſon's Sentiments, with whom they ſhould confer: Becauſe, without ſuch an Obligation, and if every Perſon were allow'd to apply Words how he pleas'd, and to hinder others from apprehending his Meaning, this Invention of Signs had been altogether vain and fruitleſs. This is the Opinion of Grotius^c, on which we may make this Remark, That there is not ſufficient ² Mr. Placette in his Treatiſe of Lying, c. 6. affirms, "That that which makes a Lye evil, is the Sin committed, and not the Original Compact, which is much eaſier to imagine than prove; but a New and Particular Compact, which is made with them to whom we ſpeak, every time we ſpeak to them. For indeed, adds he, when I ſpeak to any Man, I do two things; I oblige my ſelf to ſpeak what I think, and require that he ſhould believe me. If he to whom I ſpeak believes what I ſay, the Bargain is not only made but executed on the part of him to whom I ſpeak. If I lye on my part, I break the Treaty I am making with him, and conſequently I ſin againſt the Law of Nature, which requires, that all Agreements be faithfully executed. When he to whom I ſpeak reſuſes to believe what I ſay, and ſo accepts not the Agreement I propound, he ſtill appears to diſcredit my Proceedings, as if I deſign'd to make an Agreement which I would not keep. So that whether a Man believes what I ſay, or not, I am always oblig'd to ſpeak Truth. But I fear that this New and Particular Compact of Mr. Placette will be more hard to prove than the Original Compact, which he rejects. For in both theſe ſorts of Agreements the Conſent is implied only. There ought to be ſomething to ſecure it by a clear Conſequence. And ſo it lies upon Mr. Placette to prove that this New and Particular Compact reſults from the very Nature of the Action, which we always do when we ſpeak to any other, (i. e.) from the Nature of Speech, conſider'd barely as ſuch. I own, that the Natural Intention of Speech is to communicate our Thoughts one to another; but it is ſufficient that we do it on all occaſions when any one hath right to require it. The eſtabliſh'd Cuſtom and Good of Society require no more. Farther, as I have already ſaid in Note 1. Men never pretend to engage to ſpeak always, and to all the World, whatever they have in their Minds, ſo that they never reſerve to themſelves a Liberty of ſhewing a contrary Intention by their Actions or Words, and a Man may not reaſonably require the like of others.

Care taken in it to distinguish between those two Obligations, one of which regards the applying Signs in general in such a due manner, that another may understand our Thoughts; and the other engageth us to discover by those Signs our real Meaning to such or such a particular Person; which two are very different, and proceed from distinct Principles: For in as much as Words borrow their Signification from the Force of Imposition, we must suppose some Agreement to have passed between Men who speak the same Language, that in common use they would apply such Signs to express such things. But the Obligation which ties me actually to address those Signs to another, or to open my Mind to him about such a certain Affair, ariseth either from some general Command of the Law of Nature, or from a particular Covenant, as has been above explain'd. Hence it appears what Judgment we should make of their Notion, who deny the Nature of a Lye to consist in the Violation of a Pact, on this Principle, "That whatever is constituted, not by Nature, but by the Compact of Men (especially tacit) is to be derived and to be valued from the point of Profit, and from that alone, Whereas that Men should understand all that others say, doth not seem to be a thing so very profitable and beneficial. On the contrary, it is much for our Interest, that we should have a full Liberty of covering either with Silence or proper Colours, such Matters as may be kept secret without the Prejudice of other Men, and with our own Advantage. Here those Points are confounded, which ought to have been with Accuracy distinguish'd. For in this, that a Man should understand the Thoughts of all others; or that all others should understand his, there is indeed no Profit; nor did Men, by introducing of Speech, lay any such mutual Obligation on themselves. But we have already shewn how far any Person is bound to declare himself to another, and how far the other hath a Right to understand him. Supposing then an Obligation in us to communicate our Thoughts to such or such a Man, upon this the other Obligation which attended the Introduction of Speech falls in, and exerts its Force, engaging us so to apply our Words, that the Party may apprehend our Meaning. And of this the Profit or Advantage is so very great, that without it there would be no manner of use in Speech.

XI. Thus much being premised, it will not be difficult to judge how rightly those several Cases, in which the Truth is not precisely spoken, are yet, in common Estimation, exempted from the Character of Lyes. And here first of all some distinguish between speaking what is Falſe, and not speaking or dissembling some part of what is True; affirming the former to be unlawful, but the latter to be often innocent. On which point we are to know, that although to hold our Tongue cannot properly be term'd a Lye, especially if we used no other Sign equivalent to Speech; yet our Silence may on another account become criminal: As suppose we hinder by it some Good which we were obliged to procure; or cause some Evil, which we were bound to avert. This is what the Poet calls

The Soul with ſilent Miſchief to deſile.

Thus a Watchman, who is ſet to give notice of the Enemy's Approach, ſhall incur the ſevereſt Punishment upon Neglect of Information. Polybius ^a ſays, that an Hiſtorian, who profeſſeth to give an account of Affairs, is no leſs a Liar, if he ſuppreſs and conceal what really happen'd, than if he relate what is falſe. But in a matter which I am not obliged to declare to another, if I cannot with Safety conceal the whole, I may fairly diſcover no more than a part. An Inſtance of this is uſually given in the Caſe of Jeremiah, who in the xxxviiith Chapter of his Prophecy, v. 25, &c. ^b being conſulted by the King concerning the iſſue of the Siege, prudently hides that Particular from the Princes, as the King expreſſly order'd him; aſſigning another Reaſon of the Conference, which notwithstanding was alſo really true. Here the Prophet told only a part of the Truth, being in no wiſe obliged to diſcloſe the whole. To the ſame purpoſe the Story of Athanaſius is produced, who meeting himſelf with thoſe who were ſent to apprehend him, and being ask'd, Whether he had ſeen Athanaſius? answer'd, That he ſaw him lately paſs by this way, and that he was now gone on board. For here he was under no Obligation to betray himſelf. As to the Example of Abraham in Geneſis xx. 12. ſome queſtion whether that moſt holy Man acted prudently in calling Sarah his Siſter, and concealing their Marriage: For he knew her Beauty to be ſuch, as might kindle a Paſſion in the Beholders, and at the ſame time that unmarried Perſons are reckon'd more capable of Addreſſes than others ². Nor, ſay they, was Abimelech's Expoſtulation with him unjuſt; and on the contrary, it was moſt inhuman in Abraham to ſuppoſe that there was no Piety or Honesty in a State, before he arriv'd to be their Inſtructor: Others excuſe the Patriarch on this Argument, That the hope of Life commonly bends the greateſt and moſt ſtubborn Souls; and that ſcarce any thing is lock'd on as baſe and infamous, which is undertaken on the ſcore of declining Death. But this Point we leave undecided.

XII. Grotius diſtinguiſhes likewiſe between thoſe Signs which have been invented and determin'd μετὰ ſυνθήκης, or with a mutual Obligation, and other things about which no ſuch Agreement hath paſſ'd (for no doubt when a Compact hath been made concerning the uſe of any thing, we are exactly to conform to that ſpecified Uſe) and as to the latter ſort, he is of Opinion, that 'tis allowable to ³ This is true; but, as is aboveſaid, that Conſent has no Obligation in it ſelf; and if there were no other Reaſon to lay a Neceſſity upon us to make known our Sentiments, nothing would hinder but that every one might ſignify what he pleaſed by all Terms, ſo that of the two Obligations, of which our Author ſpeaks, one is only a Condition neceſſary to acquit us of the other.

misapply them, even when we foresee that the other Party will thence be led into a false Judgment, provided either that no farther Hurt follow this Deception, or that the Hurt which follows it, is (setting aside the Consideration of the Deceit) lawful; and when we might fairly have hurt him in an open manner: And to this we willingly subscribe. For since no Agreement, either general, or particular, is suppos'd to have pass'd, which might have laid a necessity on me to apply the thing in such a manner, and no otherwise, to the end that the said Party might gather my Meaning from it; therefore I am presumed to be left at full liberty as to its Use, so long as I hurt no Man injuriously, or without Cause. The Party may thank himself for the wrong Notion he hath form'd; and attribute it to his over-curious Impertinence in passing Judgment on other Mens Business. Whilst I am exercising my proper Right, I am not always obliged to hinder another from taking up a false Opinion in other respects harmless. For instance, if a Man, to keep himself from being frighted in the Night, or to have a Light always at hand for some occasion, should sleep with a Candle in his Chamber; he is not bound to put it out, how deeply soever his Neighbour may fancy that he sits up at his Business. The Example of our Saviour, Luke xxiv. 28. is a Case of no Difficulty. For every Man may at his pleasure use the Gesture there represented: And nothing is in common Life more frequent, than to feign our selves in a readiness to be gone, that we may discover whether or no we are welcome Guests: we being seriously resolved to depart, unless we are solicited and importun'd to stay. The Case of St. Paul in Acts xvi. 3. seems a Matter of higher Consideration¹. But as to the other Instance alledged by Grotius, of deceiving an Enemy, by counterfeiting Flight, Clothes, Colours, Sails, Arms, and the like; this Practice is allowable beyond Dispute; since we might lawfully have done him what Mischiefe we could, by the most plain and open Means.

XIII. It is the Judgment of the same Author², “ That we do not always contract the Guilt of “ Lying, when we use an ambiguous Word or Ex- “ pression, which admits of divers Significations, “ either in common Speech, or by the Custom of “ Art, or by some Figure unusual or not intelli- “ gible, provided our inward Meaning is agreeable “ to any one of these Significations; although we “ believe that the Person to whom we speak will “ understand it in a different Sense. But he very “ rightly adds, That such equivocal Speeches are “ not rashly to be approv'd of and allow'd; being only justifiable when they serve for the In- “ struction of one committed to our Care; or for “ the avoiding some pernicious and insinuating “ Question^b; or for the procuring some Benefit “ to our selves, without the Damage of others^c: For else, if you are under an Obligation to discover your Mind clearly to me, 'tis the same thing whether you deceive me by a plain Lye, or by a doubtful Expression; especially since the latter must, to serve your Purpose, be so fram'd and contriv'd, that I may lay hold on the more obvious and vulgar Sense, whilst the more abstruse and uncommon answers to your inward Conceptions: Otherwise, if both Significations are alike probable, scarce any Person will be so supinely negligent, as not to ask you which way you would be understood? But to speak ambiguously or obscurely to one whom we intend to instruct, or whose Proficiency we would thus try and examine, is on no account faulty; if the good End we propose may by this means be better obtain'd, than by more plain and direct Application. To this Purpose is the Instance in St. John vi. v. 5, &c.^d. So if I am not obliged to declare my Mind at all to such or such a Person, nothing hinders but that I may as well let him be mistaken, as let him be ignorant, if, besides that Mistake, he incur no other undeserv'd Prejudice. And therefore no one will censure Athanasius^e for the Deception he put on his Pursuers, which we have already recited^e.

It is hence evident, that we ought to interpret Grotius, with some Caution, when he says^f, “ It “ is requisite to the general Notion of a Lye, that “ what is either spoken or written, or by any “ Marks and Tokens express'd, cannot other- “ wise be understood, than in such a Sense as is “ different from the intention of the Person thus “ declaring. For in Cases where a Man is bound clearly to discover his Meaning, he ought so to frame his Expressions, as that the same Sense which either the Nature of the Business in hand, or the common Use and Custom of Speech suggests, shall be likewise agreeable to his real Thoughts; nor can he, with the least Reason, bid the Hearer thank himself for the Mistake or Damage he suffers, only on the account of not diving into all the remote Quirks and Terms of Expression, utterly foreign to the present Affair; that is, for not being a Conjuror. And the Remark of Isocrates^g must be own'd for a certain Truth², That to use ambiguous Sayings in judicial Contentions about Bargains, and Matters of Interest and Moment, is scandalously base, and shews a very high degree of Wickedness.

MR. BARB. NOTES on §. XII, XIII.

¹ We may be well satisfied with what Grotius hath said about this Matter, which I shall set down. St. Paul was not ignorant that the Jews went this way, that the Command to be circumcised, which was then abolished, did yet oblige the Posterity of the Israelites, and as even St. Paul and Timothy himself were once persuaded. But this was not in St. Paul's Intention, but his Design was thereby to gain a familiar Converse himself with the Jews, and procure it at the same time for Timothy. In truth, the very same Moment that the Divine Law which commanded Circumcision was abrogated, Circumcision could no longer be a Sign of the Institution which every one was indispensably to bear. But the Evil, which the Error in which the Jews were for some time, and which they ought to be deliver'd from, was not so considerable as the Good which St. Paul labour'd to draw from it, I mean the Establishment of the Doctrine of the Gospel. The Greek Fathers often give the Name of Oeconomia or Wise Management to this Dissimulation, &c. See Gataker upon Marcus Antoninus, l. 11. §. 18.

XIV. Much more ought we to abhor and detest those *mental Reservations*¹, which the wicked Artifice of some Men hath invented, by wresting Words to a quite contrary Sense to what they outwardly and plainly import; and this even in Cases where there was an Obligation to speak the Truth, and in Assertions confirm'd by Oath. The Effect of which is, that a Person seems outwardly to affirm what he inwardly intends to deny, and so vice versa. A Practice by which the whole Use and Design of Speech is utterly perverted, no Man being sure in what Sense he ought to take the Words of another. Nor is the Invention less absurd than it is pernicious. For since Discourse was originally introduced as a means of declaring what we conceive in our Minds; and since our Thoughts, so long as they do not come abroad, are of no manner of Use or Effect in human Life; by what Authority can these secret Reserves, so repugnant to the common Custom of Mankind, take away that Effect which the uttering of Words would otherwise naturally produce? Thus much indeed is usual with us, to annex to a general Expression some tacit Condition or Restriction, taken from the subject Matter, or some other Circumstances; by means of which we dextrously adapt our Speech to the Business under Debate, and free it from Confusion or Inconvenience. But where would be the Reason, or where the Subtilty of my Proceeding? If, for instance, being ask'd, whether I have done such a thing, I swear I have not done it, meaning another thing, or the same at another time? Or, if when a Man desires Money of me, I tell him, I have none; that is, none to give him? Or, if I promise that I will give it him; that is, meetly for Form and Fashion's sake, so as to take it immediately again? 'Tis a foolish Argument which is urged to excuse such Persons from the Sins of Lying and of Perjury, That they do not indeed speak that particular determinate Truth which the Hearers apprehend, and which the Words imply, yet they speak another Truth of a different kind. As if it were at all satisfactory to my Question, to be told a Truth of any other different kind, and utterly foreign to the Business which I am now upon: Or, as if a Man did at all promote my Purpose, or the Reason of my Enquiry, if when I ask of Chalk, he answers me of Cheese^a! No less ridiculous is that other Plea, that if in these Cases we put the open Speech and the mental Re- servation together, they will make an entire Proposition; which taken in that united Sense, shall not be false. As for instance, if I say, I am not a Priest, keeping this Clause in my Mind, so as to be under any Obligation of telling you that I am; this whole Proposition taken together will be true, I am not a Priest, so as to be under any Obligation of telling you that I am. But in as much as Discourse was invented with regard to others, not that every Man should talk to himself; to the Truth or Falshood of it is measur'd according to that which we openly declare to those with whom we converse.

XV. That we are not guilty of Lying, tho' we speak a thing which bears a wrong Signification^b, to Children or Persons out of their Senses, is generally asserted; and therefore 'tis thought very allowable. The Reason assign'd by Grotius^{*} is, Because since such Persons have not the liberty of Judging, they cannot suffer Injury with respect to that liberty which they want. This Principle we do not take to be sufficient: For to speak chiefly of the Case of Infants, it is plain indeed, that they so far want the Faculty of Judgment, as simply and rashly to catch at any thing, spoken or represented to them in a wrong manner; not being able by reasoning to distinguish Truth from Falshood: Yet since they make a part of Mankind, and on that account have a Right not to be hurt by others, as they have likewise to receive the common Office of Humanity, and to be furnished with good Notions, particularly by their Parents, and those who have the Care of their Education^b, and are at least capable of apprehending what is easy and familiar; we are by all means to hold, that they have thus far the same Right with Persons of advanced Age, that what ought to be shewn or declar'd to them, shall be propos'd in such manner as that they may understand it. But for as much as through the weakness of their Reason, and the strength of their Passions, they have scarce any Relish for plain Truths, therefore 'tis convenient to instruct them by Fables, and to keep them in Awe by false Terrors, till such time as they grow weary of Trifles, and are able to apprehend and to value the real Solidity of things. And thus we address to them by Fiction and Disguise, not to sport with their Ignorance, or to procure their Harm; but only because they cannot well be applied to in any more serious Method of Information². Strabo is

² For the same Reason we may invent something false to deceive an Infant innocently, and to accommodate ourselves to its Capacity: As also, we may so behave our selves towards such as use feeble Reasonings, either because they think them well grounded, since they are suitable to their Understandings, or they are pre-possess'd, and there is no other way to make them receive the most profitable Truth. Hence it is, that we find in the New Testament several Texts of the Old deliver'd in a Sense in which the Jews commonly understood them, tho' they did not agree to the Original; and several Arguments ad hominem founded upon them, or upon other Opinions of the Jews, which were false and uncertain. admirable admirable on this Point^a: “ Not the Poets alone, says he, but long before them publick Societies and States made choice of the Art of Fables; and the Lawgivers themselves, in regard to the common Advantage, when they had first reflected on the Genius and Temper of Rational Creatures. For Man is led on with a most greedy Desire of Knowledge; and our earthly Acquaintance with these feigned Relations is the first step this Passion makes towards its own Satisfaction. Here Children begin their Information, and willingly improve their Stock, for the sake of communicating it to others. The Reason of all this is, because Fables do ever carry somewhat of Novelty in them, whilst they report not common and consistent Things, but what is very strange and unusual. But now whatsoever is thus new and surprizing, and what Men never heard of before, cannot fail to be sweet and agreeable: And ’tis this which breeds in them a covetous Solicitude, and an Eagerness after farther Delight. In case the Story be wonderful and prodigious, this Delight is highly increas’d; which is the Bait that tempts the young Learners to Industry and Study. It is fit therefore that they should at first be thus caught and insnar’d with Pleasures, but when they have attain’d to a more mature Age, they are to be disciplin’d and instructed in the solid Knowledge of Things; their Mind and Judgment being now strengthned and confirm’d, and they no longer standing in need of being flatter’d and humour’d in their Good^b. In the same manner it is very lawful to apply Fictions to Persons out of their Senses, in all such Cases where they are not capable of apprehending true Reason.

XVI. And indeed, all in general, upon whom we cannot by plain Speech obtain the good end we design, we may, without the Censure of Lying, by feign’d Addresses lead into a Mistake, for their own Interest and Safety. Nor is it needful to draw the Reason of this Practice from hence; “ That we may presume, in such a Case, the other Party will not think hard of our Trespas on his Liberty of Judgment; nay, that he will give us Thanks for the Advantage he receives from it: “ And therefore what is done with his Consent and Approbation, can be no Injury to him. For he had indeed a Right, that our Speech should procure him some Benefit, or deliver him from some Mischiefe; but not that it should produce the quite contrary Effect; which it would have done, had he understood the plain Business without Art or Colour. And therefore in these Cases we ought as much to accommodate our Discourse to the Temper and Condition of the Hearer, as Physicians do their Medicines to the Patient’s Strength and Constitution. Since then no Person can be said to have had a Right of hearing Words under such a Form as would have prov’d fatal to him, it cannot be properly affirm’d, that there is any waving or remitting of Right in the present Case. And then for the Speaker, since he was in his part obliged to perform this Office thro’ the mediation of Speech, either by the Law of Humanity, or by some stricter Engagement, ’tis manifest, that he cannot be bound to apply his Speech in such a manner as shall make it lose its End and Effect. Therefore all such feign’d Speeches, as either save and protect Innocence, appease Rage, allwage Grief, or procure any Benefit or Convenience to others, which could not have been obtain’d by direct and open Expressions, are not only to be exempted from the number of Lyes, but to be applauded as so many Instances of Wisdom. We have a famous Example of this proceeding in the Story of ² Rahab the Harlot, Josb. ii. 4. Thus a Physician often deceives his Patient, a General his Soldiers, a Master of a Ship his Crew, and we censure neither of them upon this account. For in some Cases, a feigned Story doth Men good, when the plain Truth would do them harm³. Though I know not whether Agesilaus's Stratagem of this kind deserves Commendation; who, when he saw his Soldiers in some Fright and Concern at their being like to be over-power'd by the opposite Forces, wrote in his Hand the Word VICTORY; and taking the Beast's Liver out from the Sacrificer, printed those Letters upon it, and then shew'd it to the Troops, as a Divine Promise of Success⁴. For the same Reason Physicians are not to be accounted Lyars, when they persuade a nice or a froward Patient of the Sweetness or Mildness of what they apply for his Cure. Liban. Declam. 29. p. 664. D. Edit. Parif. Morell. We see the Physicians beguiling their Patients Appetite with harmless Deceits. The same we ought to practise towards those that are in Health, so often as 'twould be better for them to be deceiv'd, than to be truly inform'd. + Yet I question whether the Artifice of Erasistratus, Physician to King Seleucus, in making him believe that his Son Antiochus was in Love with his Wife, may be admitted into this Number. Vid. Lucian, De Dea Syra. The Conduct of Joseph is justifiable on the like account, who, to work his Brothers to a serious Repentance for their Crime in selling him, and to judge how they stood affected towards his Father and towards Benjamin, held them a long time in Consternation and Suspence by feigned Accusations^b. Lastly, that the Fables of the Poets, by which they insinuated Truth under a taking Disguise, are not to be condemn'd for criminal Falsties, every one will easily admit^c. And thus far the Saying of Sophocles will hold good,

Δουλώ μὲν ἔδδεν ῥῆμα σὺν κέρδει κινδύν^d.

I judge no Speech amiss that is of Use^e.

XVII. The Governours of States may sometimes too very lawfully use a manner of Speaking not strictly true^f; in as much as their Councils and Resolutions, if divulg'd, frequently come to nothing, or perhaps turn to the prejudice of the Commonwealth. And therefore when bare Silence is not a sufficient Covering, they may veil their Designs with feigned Speeches, to divert the Curiosity of inquisitive Men. Lying, says *Plato*¹, is useful to Mankind only in the way of Physick; and therefore should be allowed to publick Physicians, but ought not to be touch'd by private Patients. Princes and Governours (if any Persons else) may be permitted to use the same Stratagem², either for the Ruin of the Enemy, the Preservation of the Subjects, or any

Mr. BARB. NOTES on §. XVI, XVII.

* The Greek is, Neopt. Οὐκ ἀισχρὸν ἡγήσθητα τὰ ψεύδη λέγειν: Ulysses, Οὐκ εἰ τὸ σωθῆναι γὰρ τὸ ψεύδος φέρει.

⁵ But these Words do not signify what our Author supposes, following the Latin Translation (not excepting the Oxford Edition in 1705. of the two Tragedies of this Poet.) There is nothing that one may not speak innocently, if it tends to our Advantage. Mr. Dacier translates them differently, but perhaps to no better Purpose. He gives us the whole train of the Discourse, to shew us that these Words ought to have a different Sense. At length, faith Oristes, "What evil is it to me if I pass for Dead, if I shew by my Actions that I am full of Life, and I have gain'd an immortal Name? As for me, I am persuaded there can be no sad Prefage, where there is so much Profit." But there may be, as I believe, a better Translation given, more agreeable to Oristes's Thoughts, and to the Greek, thus: "I am persuaded that no Report can tend to our Dishonour, and hurt our Reputation, when so much Profit may arise from it." This appears from what follows. "How many of the Sages, who were for a long time taken for Dead, have returned to Life again, and were the more honoured by all the World? I hope I shall have the same good Luck, and after the Report of my Death is dispersed every where, I shall of a sudden appear again to my Enemies, &c. In these last Words the Original thus imports, τῆς δὲ τῆς Φήμης ἀπό, &c. From whence it appears, that ῥῆμα is the same as Φήμη. In fine, We may compare this Expression, ῥῆμα κινδύν, with a like one in the New Testament, Happy are ye, when Men shall speak all manner of evil (πᾶν πονηρὸν ῥῆμα) against you falsely, Matth. v. 11.

way for the advantage of the Community: But all others ought strictly to abstain from this Practice. A famous Instance we have in Solomon's Judgment, 1 Kings iii. 25. And so Claudius in Sueton^a, brought a Woman to own her Son, whom she first, on probable Arguments, deny'd, by commanding her to marry him. Thus a Father and a Son being arraign'd together for Murder of a Priest, when it could not be made out which of the two had committed the Fact, each refusing to accuse the other; Charlemagne, as we are told, gave Sentence of Death upon them both; upon which the Father confess'd himself the Murderer. So, it being a Law in Spain, that in case a Female-slave be with Child by her Master, she shall be immediately restor'd to Liberty: Once it happen'd, that a Nobleman's Maid was discover'd to be in this Condition; the Nobleman denied the thing, and the Proofs alledg'd not being evident, King Alphonso order'd the Child to be publickly sold into Servitude; the News of which Sentence mov'd the Father to discover himself. So when Nleus, being about to lead abroad a Colony, was commanded by the Soothsayers to purge his Army of all polluted Persons; he pretended that he himself had murder'd a Child, and so stood in need of Expiation; and by this means persuading others to confess themselves guilty, he left all those behind him, whom he had thus convicted of Impurity^b. 'Tis a Proverb with the Spaniards, Tell a Lye, and you'll get out the Truth. To the same Head belongs the Disimulation and Concealment about the Sickness or Death of Princes, for the prevention of Tumults. Though we are not willing to extend this Liberty so far as to justify the politick Devices of Numma^c. Nor will the same Privilege hold at all in the case of Promises and Engagements^d.

XVIII. But farther, Grotius^e having thus asserted, "That every Lye ariseth from the impairing of some Right which one Man may have to understand the Mind of another; concludes from hence, That we cannot be charg'd with this Fault^f, when we direct a feigned Discourse to one who is not deceiv'd by it, tho' a third Person should thence happen to entertain a wrong Opinion. For 'tis to be suppos'd, that I and he, to whom I address'd my self, are transacting some private Business, which doth not at all belong to the Person who overhears us. Therefore the Man with whom I am dealing is certainly not deceiv'd with my manner of Speech, because he well apprehends my Meaning by it, just as if I should relate a Fable, or use an Irony or Hyperbole to one who knew how to put the right Construction upon the Words. And as for the third Man, I do not contract the Guilt of Lying in respect of him, because I have no business with him, and consequently he hath no Right to understand my Sentiments. So that if he take up a false Notion, from Expressions applied to another Person, not to himself, he is to lay all the blame on his own Curiosity and Impertinence. But lest this Position should be abused to ill purpose, we are to add, as a necessary Caution, that 'tis by no means allowable for two Persons to make use of such Occasions as these by way of Stratagem to delude or expose a third. For altho' it be never so true, that this third Man hath not a perfect Right to know my Judgment, yet the Law of Humanity and Charity requires that my Speech do not occasion his undeserved Prejudice. Therefore we ought on all accounts to make this Distinction, whether the third Party overhears our Discourse without his own Fault, or whether out of a busy, or a malicious Humour, he purposely intrudes into our Secrets. And therefore this Assertion chiefly holds good against those inquisitive gossiping Knaves, who make it their employment treacherously to catch up what other Persons drop in private Company. Now when we apprehend our selves to be watch'd by such sly Designers, and yet are not inclin'd to be altogether silent, we are wont to disappoint their busy Curiosity, by throwing in a sett of Talk quite impertinent to the Affair which we were before debating of; or by agreeing to tell some Story, which our politick Eyes-dropper hugging as a mighty Discovery, may, upon his communicating it to others, be sufficiently laugh'd at for his Pains; provided neither he nor any Person else suffer any farther damage by this Contrivance. We know very well 'tis a general Duty, not to lessen the Honour and Reputation of others, nor to ridicule and expose them. Yet, as we do not think ourselves guilty of any Sin, when we discover the Mistake of another, supposing it to be done without either Bitterness or Insolence (things so unworthy of Men of Sense and Breeding) although we should hereby rather diminish, in some respect, than improve his Credit: So what should hinder us from correcting a Fault in a Man's Morals, when it proves troublesome to us, even by Sport and Ridicule, that we may incline him to leave off the Habit? For to amend and reform others cannot therefore be judg'd unlawful, because it tends to the Disparagement of their Worth and Excellency. Thus, since 'tis the common Interest of Mankind, that each Man should not understand the Secrets of all, it is establish'd as 'twere by the general Consent of Nations, that seal'd Letters should be open'd by him only to whom they are directed

MR. BARB. NOTES on §. XVIII.

² See Mr. Hertius's Discourse, De Commenta Literarum, §. 3. in Tom. i. of his Comments, and small Tracts, where he also observes, that it has always been taken for a great Incivility and an inhuman Baseness, to publish the Letters we receive from others, because it may produce some Prejudice to the Writer. Upon which occasion it may be seasonable to rehearse the brisk Reproof which Cicero gave Marc Antony long ago. "He also read a Letter, which he said he had received from me. O Man without Humanity; and who knows not what it is to live! For is there any Man, who has convers'd so little with honest Men, directed : Therefore if I find any Person intercepting and searching my Letters, it can be no Crime if I contrive to let some Writing fall into his Hands, which shall give him no great Satisfaction in the reading. As a greedy Boy, who hath got a trick of plundering the Cupboard, suffers no injury, if amongst the other Provision he meets with a Bait not very sweet or savoury. It was a pleasant piece of Deception, that which Herodtus^a reports of Nitocris or Semiramis, who order'd the following Words to be engraven on her Sepulchre, If any Babylonian Prince happens to be in great Distress for Money, let him open this Tomb, and take out as much as he pleaseth. King Darius^b afterward removing the Stone, found no Treasure, but only this Rebuke, If thou hadst not been insatiably covetous, thou wouldst never have plundr'd Coffers to enrich thee : Or, as Maximus Tyrius^c gives the Story, *All Curses follow thee, thou most greedy of Mankind ; who for the sake of Gold hast presum'd to disturb and violate the Dead. To give Credit to such Intcriptions is no more an Argument of Avarice than Folly. In the Story of Papyrius in Gellius^d, the Senators rightly commend the Cause of the young Gentleman's Fiction ; that is, the Wit and Secrecy of so unexperienced Years ; but adjudge the manner of it to be a little undutiful and disrespectful to his Mother ; especially since the Jest occasion'd a Petition not much to the Honour and Credit of the Ladies, That one Wife should rather have two Husbands, than one Husband two Wives. Nor could I ever prevail with my self to be heartily angry with that Senator in Plutarch^e, who, to divert his Wife's Importunity in asking about the Secrets of the House, told her a strange Tale of a Quail^f, said to be seen fly through the Forum with a golden Helmet. Though he ought indeed at the same time to have taken care that this babbling Dame should not put others into a groundless Fright by her Report. For then the present Mistake, which lasted but an instant, would have been sufficiently recompensed by the Diversion and Satisfaction which follow'd it. Now if we are bound to use Caution, that the Person whom we have justly and deservedly impos'd upon, should not deceive others ; much less will it be allowable to persuade one Man of what is false, with design that he may delude a third Person ; although perhaps the former do not hereby suffer any particular Hurt. For indeed to be thus made the Instrument of deceiving another, is in itself mean and unworthy : And as for our part, 'tis the same thing, whether we abuse a Man immediately by our own Act, or by the Intervention of some Person else, whom we have suborn'd for that Service. Though 'tis an Art which many practise ; first, to cheat those whom they intend to make use of for the cheating of others. Vid. Senec. Thyest. v. 320. As Davus observes^g, there's a great deal of difference, ex animo omnia, ut fert natura, facias, an de industria ? Whether a Man acts according to real Intention and the plain Guidance of Nature, or according to the Affectation of Art and Design, Terent. Andr. Act iv. Scen. 4. Add Gell. l. xii. c. 12.

XIX. This is manifest, that since the Obligation to disclose our Mind ceaseth with regard to Enemies, it cannot fall under the Sin of Lying, to give them a feign'd Relation^h, to terrify them with false Rumours, or any ways to procure their Prejudice, provided no undeserved Loss or Damage ensue to a third Party who is our Friend. For why may not we by Stratagem and Subtilty, and without endangering our own Persons, hurt him whom we have Licence to attack with open Violence ? The Reason why some have disdain'd this Method of Hostilityⁱ, was not because they thought any Right to be violated by it, but because among the most fierce and martial Souls no Action against an Enemy is look'd on as glorious, but such as carries in it some sort of Vigour and Force of Body and Mind. But what we speak about deceiving and circumventing an Enemy, is by no means to be extended to any Paſſes^j or Treaties set on foot about concluding or intermitting the War. For since the Law of Nature commands us to maintain Peace as far as may be done with Convenience, and to repair any Breach that may happen in it, we must suppose ourselves commanded at the same time to use those Means without which this End can ne'er be obtain'd. But now Enemies cannot possibly come to an Accommodation, unless there be on both sides an Obligation to the clear Discovery of their Mind, in reference to what is transacted between them ; and consequently unless their mutual Diffidence be remov'd by a Necessity and Engagement to speak the Truth in all Articles and

“ as upon a little trangle with a Friend to make no scruple to publish and read the Letters he has received from him before all the World? Is it not to banish all Friendship out of the World, to take away the liberty of Friends writing one to another when they are absent? How many Trifles do we put into our Letters, which being divulged, will appear ridiculous? And how many serious things, which ought not to be made publick? At etiam literas, quas me sibi misisse diceret, recitavit, homo, & humanitatis expert, & vitæ communis ignarus! Quis enim unquam, qui paululum modo honorum consuetudinem nasset, literas ad se ab amico missas offensivas aliqua interposita, in medium protulit, palamque recitavit? Quid est aliud tollere de vitæ vitæ societatem, quam tollere amicorum colloquia absentium? quam multa joca solent esse in epistolis, quæ prolata si sint, ineptæ videantur? quam multa seria, neque enim ulla moris deusculanda. Philip. ii. 4. See an Example of this indiscreet Rudeness in the News of the Republick of Letters, December 1685, where Mr. Bayle censures the Author of the Dialogue between Phoebus and Irenæus, &c. which was the famous Mr. Gaultier a Minister.

³ This Example seems not much to our Author's Purpose, relating only the manner how Darius was cheated by the Inscription which Nitocris Queen of Babylon had caused to be engraven on her Tomb. For, says he, he must be a simple and covetous Man to believe such an Inscription.

* The Greek is, Ὁ πάντων ἀνθρώπων ἀπληρότατε, ὃς ἔτιλης νεκροῦ θίγειν δι ἔρωτα χρύσεο.

⁷ See what is said, l. v. c. 9. §. 3. And l. viii. c. 7, 8.

Conditions of Peace. And when 'tis asserted as lawful to delude or mischief an Enemy by any feign'd Report; this ought on no account to be carried so far as to justify the spreading of false Crimes and Imputations, in order to the impairing his Honour and Credit. The state of Hostility doth indeed license me to conceal my Meaning from my Foe, or by scattering false News to open my way to his Hurt. But he that goes about to charge an Enemy with any grievous Crime, and would have his Accusation believ'd by those who are at peace with him, must lay aside all the Stratagems and Deceits of War, and set up for an Assertor of plain Truths; and therefore, with regard to those Persons who are suppos'd to be his Hearers, he is to play the part of an Historian, or ordinary Relator. Whence, if he voluntarily recede from the Truth and Reality of things, he cannot avoid the double Guilt of Lying and Slandering. Again, to charge an Enemy falsely to his Face, is a Mark of a low and impotent Reviler. To return Lyes for Lyes, is to imitate the Folly and Vanity of the Adversary^a. As for the Notion of Lippius, in his Treatise of Politicks^b, who reckoning up the Persons towards whom we may be allowed to practise Simulation or Dissimulation, joins Foreigners to Enemies; this ought no farther to be admitted, than as it is for our Advantage to hide our Designs or our Affairs from their Notice. For that we should by feign'd Speeches procure their Harm or Loss, is what Nature itself will not bear; on account of that nearness of Blood by which all Mankind stand related and allied to each other.

XX. 'Tis a Question of more Difficulty, Whether a Criminal or an Offender arraign'd on any account may deny the Fact^c with which he is charg'd, or endeavour to elude the Accusation by feign'd Arguments, and yet not incur the Guilt of Lying? And here we do not speak of the Divine Tribunal, in respect of which the safest Course is to fly immediately to humble Confession, and an earnest imploring of Pardon: Since it would not be less Impiety than Folly, to use Excuses or Denials before an Omnipotent Judge. And 'twas on this Principle that Joshua made the Exhortation to Achan, which we have in Josh. vii. 19, 20. For there the Criminal was before detected by the Hand of Heaven. The present Enquiry therefore is confin'd to human Judgments; which are principally design'd for these two Ends and Uses: First, that every Man may obtain what is his Right and

Due: And, Secondly, that fit Punishments may be inflicted for the Correction and Restraint, both of those, who have dared with wicked purpose actually to violate the Rights of others; and of those too, who by reason of their cold Affection towards Justice would have proceeded to the same Commissions, did they not dread the suffering those Evils, which they have seen fall so heavily on other Offenders. Now, to decline the Severity of this Process, some think it by no means allowable to make use of false Speeches: First, because the Judge hath an especial Right to understand the Truth. Wherefore, neither the Sanctity of the Magistrate, who presides in the Name of God, nor the Necessity which the Subject lies under to Obedience, will give the least place or countenance to Contumacy or Circumvention. Besides, they say, this Permission appears rather dangerous than needful or beneficial; in as much as conceal'd Crimes do the more Mischief. Especially if what is deliver'd in excuse, be not only false in Fact, but in Theory; every such Untruth being of ill Consequence, not only consider'd by itself, but likewise in regard that one Error gives Occasion and Rise to an infinite Train of others. Yet the contrary Opinion is by many prefer'd; who say, we ought to distinguish in every Crime between the Damage done, and the base Guilt or Commission; to the former of which Restitution properly answers, and to the latter Punishment. By the Law of Nature every Man ought to make Restitution for Damage occasion'd by his Fault; and at the same time the suffering Party ought, upon his Sorrow and Reparation, to admit him to Pardon. Therefore every guilty Person is, by an Obligation strictly so call'd, bound to be always ready to repair any Damage he hath caus'd.

But no Man is tied to offer up himself freely to Punishment, and to be an Informer against himself. So that if the Fact be not known, and an open² Restitution would be a Confession of the Guilt, in this Case the Restitution is to be made in some indirect and secret manner. All Punishment must be inflicted upon Men against their Wills; otherwise it could never obtain its due End, which is to deter the present Offender, and all other Persons from Sin. But whatever we lie under an Obligation to perform, is to be undertaken by our own free and voluntary Motion. Since then no Person is properly obliged to invite and call down Punishment on his own Head³, but must, indeed, as he is a Man, naturally abhor it in the highest degree; especially if it tend to Death, or some other grievous Evil; there appears no reason why he may not decline it any way possible, provided he do not hereby injure a third Party^a. Nor can it much conduce to the Interest of a Commonwealth, that after Reparation hath been made for the Damage, any such Fact, as we now speak of, should be punish'd; that is, a Fact not open and notorious, and which consequently might be disguis'd or excus'd by some Colour or Plea. Therefore, as none but a Fool will deny manifest Faults, so from what hath been here alledg'd, it seems allowable for a Man to wipe off an Imputation by a false Defence. Tho' for a Prisoner to urge false Opinions, can seldom turn to his Advantage, the Court being suppos'd well skill'd in Right and Equity. A Judge indeed hath Power and Liberty to get out the Truth by any possible Means⁴, in case the Fact be of such Consequence, that the Safety of the Publick absolutely requires it should be punish'd. And therefore he cannot be tax'd with Lying, if to bring the Party to a Confession, he make use of some Stratagem or Fiction: As suppose, by pretending that he hath receiv'd full Information some other way, or by threatening that he will proceed to such or such Severities, if the Person accus'd persist in his Obstinacy, and the like. But it cannot hence presently be concluded, that the Criminal himself is bound to own the Charge: Because neither doth every Power, which denotes the bare Exercise of some Act, infer an Obligation in the Object towards which it is directed: And besides, there are other ways for the Judge to penetrate into the Business, as by Arguments and Witnesses, which Witnesses, when examin'd about the Crimes of others, are oblig'd, though unsworn, to declare the Truth, in Obedience to the Command of Authority. Farther, Self-preservation is a thing which challengeth so much Favour and Allowance, that 'tis reckon'd odious to punish the most notorious Offenders, without giving them a Hearing⁶. On which account, no Person is blamed for casting any Veil or Colour over his Fault. The Divine Tribunal and the Human are not in all respects alike; nor doth a mortal Judge preside with such Majesty and Authority as Almighty God. And if a Prisoner be not bound to make a voluntary Confession, his Denial cannot in the least impair that Obedience which he owes to the Civil Power. 'Tis true, a Crime, which hath been resolutely and stubbornly disown'd, commonly meets with the severer Punishment; because free Confession is generally a sign of Penitence, which much lessens the Malignity of the Offender: Yet whether it be more advantageous cunningly to deny a Fact, or to embrace the Ingenuity of an open Acknowledgment, is a Point which belongs to another kind of Enquiry, not to that which we are now engag'd in, and which confines itself to Matters of strict Duty, what a Man is bound to do, and what not⁷. Which of these two Opinions ought to be chosen rather than the other, any Man will apprehend, who hath Judgment enough to weigh the Arguments offer'd on both sides. 'Tis very remarkable, that which Hayton reports in his History of the Tartars, c. 48. That although in other respects they are most notorious Lyars, yet in two things they strictly observe the Truth: First, that no Man among them arrogates to himself the Glory of an Exploit which he really hath not perform'd: And, Secondly, that whoever hath committed a Crime, though such as he knows will cost him his Life, when examin'd by his Lord, never conceals the Matter. And amongst the Japoneses, to be discover'd in a Lye before the Judge is a capital Offence.

XXI. But 'twill be ask'd, What liberty may the Council or the Advocate fairly take in this Case? Our Opinion is, that we ought here to distinguish between civil Cases and criminal. In the former it doth not appear that the Advocate can with a safe Conscience hinder the injur'd Party from obtaining his Right as soon as possibly he may. And therefore in such Controversies we condemn, as unlawful, not only false Allegations and feign'd Reasons, but likewise all dilatory Exceptions and Demurs; in as much as all these are a Let and Hindrance to the one Party from paying what he owes; and to the other from receiving what is due to him^c: But in criminal Cases, where the Dispute regards only the Punishment, we judge it ought farther to be consider'd, whether the Council be assign'd by the publick Authority, or by the particular Appointment of the Prisoner. If by the former, it doth not seem allowable for them to make use of feign'd Arguments and false Colours; since the Design of the Court, in deputing them, was only that they might wipe off any Calumny thrown upon the Prisoner, and take care that he suffer no Injustice. Which End is sufficiently answer'd by a bare Refutation of the Proofs offer'd by the Accuser. But he whom the Prisoner particularly chooseth and retains to plead in his behalf, since he only acts as his Client's Interpreter, may, in our Judgment, lawfully use the same Method of Defence which the Prisoner might have used, had he answer'd for himself. He is under a very great Mistake, says *Tully*¹, that supposes he hath got our real Opinion and Authority for all that he meets with in our Judiciary Orations. Whatever we deliver'd on those Subjects is to be ascrib'd to the Causes, and to the Times, not to the Man, or to the Pleader. And

⁷ We may easily discern that our Author embraces the last Opinion.

in his Second Book of Offices: he maintains, sometimes to defend a guilty Person, is not contrary to any Duty of Religion. Nor is Justice in any great danger of suffering by this Permission: For, since the Judge is supposed fully to understand the Law, the Advocate, by producing false Laws or false Authorities, is not likely to prevail to any purpose: And he is never credited upon his bare Assertion, but obliged to produce sufficient Proof. And therefore, if a guilty Person do by this means sometimes escape unpunished, the Fault is not to be charged on the Advocate, or on the Prisoner, but on the Judge, who had not the Wisdom to distinguish between Right and Wrong: Yet Plato^a would not grant even this degree of Indulgence in his Commonwealth. And the antient Egyptians held it for a certain Maxim, That the Hurangues of the Lawyers very much darken'd and perplex'd the Law^b. Especially, since, as Euripides^c observes, Truth always speaks plain; and therefore doth not stand in need of the Windings and Turnings of Interpreters: Whereas, * unjust Speeches being always sick and weak in themselves, require strong and subtil Medicines for their Support. 'Tis a Saying of Pindar †, Three Words are enough to set off a good Cause. And Isocrates, amongst his other Rules to Demonicus, adviseth him, Never to undertake in Court the Defence of a Wicked Man: For, says he, People will think you are inclined to those Practices your self, which you defend in others §.

It is hence evident how far we may admit of Quintilian's Assertion^d; A Wise Man, says he, is on some Occasions allow'd the privilege of Lying: and an Orator, if he cannot otherwise bring the Judge to Reason and Equity, must necessarily apply himself to the moving his Affections. And again, That which at the first Proposal appears so harsh and strange, may however be maintain'd upon reasonable Grounds; namely, that a good Man in defending a Cause may sometimes go about to perplex the Truth, and deceive the Judge^e. But the instances which he offers require a more strict Examination. First, he affirms, That a Person arraign'd for plotting against a Tyrant may be defended by false Allegations^f. And this is built upon the Grecian Hypothesis, which makes the killing of Tyrants lawful. Otherwise, to defend by feign'd Arguments, a Person guilty of Treason against the Prince to whom we have our selves sworn Allegiance, is therefore unlawful, because every Subject is bound to guard and preserve his Sovereign to his utmost Ability. Whereas the desire or endeavour of sheltering a Conspirator from just Punishment would be utterly inconsistent with that Obligation. He proceeds to urge, What if a Judge should be about to condemn a Man for some good Actions, unless we can prove the Actions not to have been perform'd, shall not the Orator who appears in his behalf be allow'd the use of such Means to preserve this innocent, and what is more, this worthy and commendable Member of the State? But indeed such a Case as this can hardly be suppos'd. For nothing ought to be honour'd with the Name of a good Action, but what is agreeable to the Laws of the Commonwealth. And it doth not appear how any Man should be brought into Judgment for such a Performance. Let us imagine therefore, that a Person by some good and noble piece of Service hath incur'd the Envy of Wicked Men, and that these Wicked Men have afterwards got possession of the Seat of Justice. Here if the Fact were openly known, and an Accusation brought against him for it, 'twould signify nothing to disown it. As 'twould have been idle for Cicero, had he been arraign'd for putting to death the Associates of Catiline, to deny the Charge. But if the Fact may still be dissembled with some colour and probability, there's no reason why an innocent Prisoner may not be defended by feign'd Arguments before a wicked Judge. As for the other instance of Quintilian, When a Man is to dissuade from some Undertaking, just indeed naturally and in itself, but in the present Juncture of Affairs disadvantageous to the State^g; there's no need he should endeavour by false Reasons to prove those just Things to be unjust; but 'tis sufficient for him to shew, that what may justly be done, is not always necessary to be done; and that the Times now require us to choose what is useful and profitable, rather than what in strictness may seem more commendable and right; and all this may be urged without receding from the Truth. Another Case propos'd by Quintilian is, When an Orator hath good Hopes of the Criminal's future Reformation^h. And this indeed may prevail with him to be the more willing to lend the Prisoner all his Parts and Cunning in order to his Deliverance, because he is assur'd that 'twill not be to the prejudice of the Publick, that such a Person should go unpunish'd. But to rescue a good Commander from suffering for a manifest Crime, when his Life is necessary for the Honour

Vult hoc multitudine, patitur consuetudo, fert etiam humanitas.* Our Author reflects upon the beginning of this Sentence, and falls thereby into a present Mistake. For having read these Words of Cicero, Habendum est Religioni, he supposes him to mean, that 'tis not contrary to Religion; and so says of him, Religioni non contrarium tradit; whereas Boys know, that habere Religioni signifies only, To make a scruple of a thing.

- XX. Of the ways of dispensing with Oaths.

WE proceed to examine and state the Nature of an Oath, which is judg'd to add great strength and confirmation to our Discourse, and to all our Acts which have any dependence upon Speech: which though we might have treated of very properly and conveniently hereafter, when we come to explain the enforcements of Paçts and Covenants; yet we chose to assign it this particular Place rather than any other, because the Custom of Swearing is us'd for the Establishment and Security not only of Covenants, but of bare Assertions. (To which purpose it may not impertinently be observed, that amongst the Jews no Oaths or Vows were esteem'd obligatory, but such as were openly deliver'd in ^a Words.)

An Oath the very Heathens look'd on as a thing of so great Force, and of so sacred Authority, that they believ'd the Sin of Perjury to be pursued with the severest Vengeance; such as extended itself to the Posterity of the Offender, and such as might be incur'd by the bare Thought and Inclination, without the Act. Vid. Grot. l. ii. c. 13. s. 1. Philo Jud. de Sacrificiis Abel. & Cain. p. 113. E. Edit. Genev. Our Assertion derives its Force from the Oath, the Oath from God¹. Thus Diodorus Siculus^{2 b} reports of the Egyptians, That by their Laws Persons who had forsworn themselves, were adjudg'd to capital Punishment, as guilty of the two greatest Crimes; in violating that Piety which they ow'd to God; and in destroying Faith from amongst Men, the strongest Pillar of human Society.

II. An Oath then is a religious Asseveration, by which we either renounce the Mercy, or imprecate the Vengeance of Heaven, if we speak not the Truth. That this is the Sense and Purport of Oaths, appears from those Forms of Words in which they are commonly express'd; as, So help me God, God be my Witness, God be my Avenger, and other equivalent Terms, which amount to much the same. For when a Superior, who hath a right of Punishing, is appeal'd to as a Witness, his Vengeance is likewise invoked in case of Breach of Faith; and God who knows all things, being ever a Witness, is ever an Avenger. Plutarch, Quæst. Roman. 44. observes¹, that every Oath terminates in the Cause of Perjury; or, that is the Ground and Bottom upon which all Swearing depends. In the same place enquiring into the Reasons why the Flamen Dialis amongst the Romans was not allow'd to swear, he delivers himself to this purpose: Was it

MR. BARB. NOTES on Chap. II. §. I, II.

because an Oath is a kind of Torture, or the only Force that may be applied to the Souls of free Subjects ; whereas the Priest ought to be exempt from all Violence, as well in Mind as in Body : Or because every Oath terminates in the Curse of Perjury ; whereas all Cursing is ominous and unlucky ; which is the Reason that the Priests are forbidden by the Laws to use Imprecations towards others ? And indeed the Conduct of the Athenian Priest was commended, who being order'd by the People to devote Alcibiades with the usual Ceremonies, refus'd ; alledging, That his Business was to preside in good Wishes, not in bad. Or, was it, because the Guilt of Perjury might turn to the Danger of the Publick, if an impious forsworn Wretch were to offer Vows and Prayers in behalf of the State, and to perform the Offices of religious Worship ? Nor can a more grievous Punishment light upon Mankind, than their losing all Title to the Protection and Assistance of Providence. Yet when we say, that God is invoc'd as a Witness in Swearing, it ought on no account to be hence infer'd, that an Oath should be look'd on as the Testimony of God ; or as if God himself gave Attestation to the Veracity of the Swearer^a ; which seems to be the Opinion of Bishop Sanderfon^a. But when an Omniscient and Omnipotent Being is call'd to be both a Witness or Guarantee, and likewise an Avenger, we therefore presume upon the Truth of what is deliver'd, because we cannot conceive any Person to be arriv'd at such a pitch of Impiety, as lightly to stir up the Divine Vengeance against himself. And hence Perjury appears to be a most monstrous Sin, in as much as by it the forsworn Wretch shews, that he at the same time contemns the Divine, and yet is afraid of human Punishment ; that he is a daring Villain towards God, and a sneaking Coward towards Men^b. The scope and meaning of Oaths is likewise suggested by the End for which they have been introduc'd : and that is, that Persons might be the more firmly engag'd to declare the Truth, or to perform their Promises, by the just Awe and Dread of the Divinity, infinite in Knowledge, and infinite in Power ; whose Wrath they thus invite down upon their own Heads, if they knowingly deceive : Whereas perhaps there would not have been Force and Security enough in the Fear of Men, whose Strength they might fancy themselves able to baffle or to decline ; or whose Discovery they might hope to escape^c. For in Cases where the Party with whom we transact, if he deceive us after his bare Word or Promise, cannot possibly lie conceal'd, nor avoid human Punishment, it seems superfluous to put him to his Oath. 'Tis the Advice of Demosthenes^d,

Those who escape your Justice, leave to the Vengeance of the Gods ; but those on whom you can lay hands, never consign over to Providence, without punishing them your selves. And for this reason we should judge it to be an Absurdity in the Civil Law^e, when, on the contrary, it allows a Woman to swear that she is not with Child. This Caution will appear to have the more Weight, if we consider that the too frequent use of Oaths doth in many Persons much impair the Reverence due to them. It was an excellent Lesson which Pythagoras^f gave his Scholars ; Very rarely and very hardly to be brought to an Oath, but if they had once sworn, most inviolably to observe it. Nor is Isocrates's Precept on the same Subject to be despis'd ; Never swear, says he, on the account of Money, though you would do it with the greatest Safety and Assurance ; lest you draw upon your self a double Imputation, of Perjury with some, and of Avarice with others^g.

But as 'tis just and right to pay the most religious Reverence to Oaths, so is it vain Presumption to expect or desire that their Truth or Falshood should be evinc'd by an immediate Miracle ; as if God were obliged to exercise his judicium Office, at the pleasure and humour of Men. And yet this was a Superstition which very much obtain'd of old, not only amongst the Heathens, but in the ignorant and barbarous Ages amongst Christians themselves. Sophocles^h plainly speaks of the Fiercy Ordeal ;

καὶ πῦρ διέρπειν, καὶ Θεοῦς ὀρκιωμετεύ.

Prepar'd we stood to lift the burning Steel,
To tread the Flames, and by all Heaven to swear.

'Tis remarkable what P. Baldens in his Treatise of the Idolatry of the Indians reports of the Malabars, That amongst them, the Person who is to take a Purgative Oath, bath his three first Fingers dipt in melting Butter, and then wrapt up in Leaves, which three Days after are uncover'd, to see the Effect. Others are order'd to swim over a River between Colchis and Cranganor, full of Crocassiles : Others to reach an Apple out of a Pot stuf'd with Serpents, and by the success of these Attempts a Judgment is made of their Innocence^k.

And indeed if we would confess the Truth, Oaths either infer or presuppose the Diffidence, Unfaithfulness, Ignorance, and Impotency of Mankind. For what need would there be of such Engagements, if we could securely rely on the Faith and Constancy of others ; or if there were no Examples extant of Perfidiousness; or if we had strength enough to compel Persons to make good what they owe? Lastly, what Occasion would the Judge have to enquire the Truth of sworn Witnesses, unless he were ignorant of it himself? And from this Principle I should draw the Reason of that Speech of the Emperor Frederick in the Poet ^a.

*Juramenta petis? Regem jurare minori
Turpe reor. Nudo jus & reverentia verbo
Regis inesse solet, quovis juramine major.*

Dost thou desire an Oath? it is below
A Prince to Subjects such Respect to show.
The Sacred Awe that guards a Prince's Word,
Hath stronger Tyes than strictest Oaths afford.

Not only to have Faith and Honesty kept up inviolably in the World, is in the highest Manner the Interest of Princes; but likewise because 'tis unbecoming their Majesty, to seem liable to the least suspicion of Perfidiousness, Falshood, or Deceit. Thus we are told, that amongst the old Peuvians Oaths were not at all in use; but the Persons who were to give their Testimony, barely promised they would confess the Truth to the Ynca ^b.

III. Since GOD alone is of infinite Knowledge, and of infinite Power, the Absurdity is manifest of Swearing by any thing which we do not look upon as Divine; in such a sense as to invoke it for a Witness of our Speech, and for an Avenger of our Perjury. Hence as it was usual for the Heathens to swear by the Stars, because they judg'd them to be so many Deities; so for a Christian to imitate them in that Practice, would be a Mixture of Impiety and Folly. As for those Forms attributed to some of the Antients, as that of Socrates ², by a Dog, by a Goose (whatever Porphyry ^c pretends to the contrary) and by the Plane-Tree, that of Zeno, by a Caper; and that of others, by Crambe ^d, we are to esteem them meerly jocular. They swore by these, as Apollonius ^e saith, not as by Gods, but to avoid Swearing by the Gods; when by the practice of the generality of Men it was grown into an ill Custom, to apply Oaths as the supplemental Ornament of Speech.

But that which was most in use by the Antients, was to swear by those things which each Person held most dear, or set uppermost in his Veneration and Esteem. So Ascanius in Virgil,

Per caput hoc juro, per quod pater ante solebat;
Æn. IX. v. 300.
By this my Head; my Father's Oath before.

So we every where read of Persons swearing by their own Life and Soul, and by the Life and Soul of those Friends who stood first in their Affections. And the Lovers thought themselves very Religious in swearing by the Bright Eyes, the Sweet Lips, the Golden Tresses of their Mistress ^f. All which Speeches are by no means to be interpreted in this sense; either that those things were invoked as Witnesses and Avengers of Falshood, as Apuleius ^g amongst others believed; nor that they were cited to give Testimony under the Notion of belonging to God, and expressing somewhat of the Divinity, namely, his Truth, Goodness, and Power, and which the Person thus swearing hereby acknowledgeth, that he enjoys by God's Mercy; and that he is unwilling to lose by God's Justice; as if he should say, I swear by my Life, that is, by God to whom I owe my Life; which is the Opinion of many, and particularly of Bishop Sanderfon ^h. But they only thus invoc'd GOD himself, desiring that if they swore falsely, he would be pleas'd to punish their Crime in those things especially, for which they were most nearly and tenderly concern'd ⁱ. Thus it was the ordinary Custom of the Athenians, in their solemn Oaths to devote themselves and their Family to Destruction, if they deceiv'd; and on the contrary to beg all Happiness from the Gods on themselves and Friends, if they swore truly; as is evident from frequent instances in Demosthenes ^j. And they firmly believ'd, that the Violation of such Engagements would draw down the Anger of Heaven upon the Heads of others, as well as upon their own. Pliny ^k tells a Story of one Regulus,

Mr. BARB. NOTES on §. III.

¹ What Confusions, Absurdities, and Contradictions the Notions of the Heathens were! These two Attributes of the Deities, which are the Foundation of an Oath, were so well known to them, as to give a great Force to that Act of Religion. They believ'd that God was present in all places, and saw all things, the most secret Thoughts of the Heart not being excepted. This appears, for Example, by this Fragment of the Comedian Philemon, who takes the Air for Jupiter.

Ἐγὼ δ' ὅ θεῶν ἔστιν ἔργον, εἰμὶ πανταχοῦ.
Ὅ δὲ παρὼν ἀπανταχοῦ,
πάντ' ἐξ ἀνάγκης οἶδε, πανταχοῦ παρών.
Stob. De Rerum Nat. Tit. 3. Collect. Cler.

And so in the Prologue of Plautus's Amphitryo, ver. 57, &c. Mercury thus speaks, Utrum sit, annon, voltis? Sed ego stultior,
Quasi nesciam vos velle qui Divus siem,
Teneo quid animi vestri super hac re fiet.

See Lucian in Chronosol Tom. ii. p. 614. Ed. Amst. As to God's Omnipotence, these Verses of Ovid are sufficient to alledge, God's Power's immense, and has no Bounds:

Non habet: & quicquid Superi voluere, peractum est.
Whatever the Gods will have done, must be perform'd.

² See Menage upon Diogenes Laertius, lib. ii. §. 40. where he hath amassed together many things relating to this Matter. It shall suffice at present to relate the Words of Philostratus, of which our Author quotes only a part. πρὸς ταῦτα ὁ Θεσπεσίαν, ἐγένετό τις ἔφη, Σωκράτης ἰθιναῖος ἀνίστος, ὡσπερ ἡμεῖς, γέρον, δεῖ τὸν κύνα, καὶ τὴν χίνα, καὶ τὴν πλάτανον, εὖς τε ἤγειτο, καὶ ἄμυν ἔκ ἀσθήτος, εἶπεν ἄλλοι θεῶς, καὶ ἀπεκνήσ, σοφός ἄμυν γὰρ ταῦτα, ἐκ ὡς θεός, ἀλλ' ἵνα μὴ θεός ἄμυν.

who made a gainful Trade of Perjury, in relation to Wills and Testaments; that giving a Visit to a sick Lady (Verania Wife to the famous Piso) and persuading her that by his Astrological Observations he foresaw she should recover: The Lady being easily credulous under so great an apprehension of Danger, call'd for her Will, and set down Regulus for her Heir; but soon after falling into Extremities, she died with this Exclamation against her Deceiver; O wicked and perfidious! O worse than perjurd Villain, who forswore himself by the Life and Safety of his own Son! The Reflection which Pliny makes on the thing is this, Regulus useth this Stratagem not more frequently than wickedly; whilst he imprecates the Wrath of the Gods, whom he every day deceives, upon the Head of the unfortunate Youth^a.

And hence too we may gather the Meaning and Design of those Oaths, which were heretofore made by the Life, the Genius, the Safety of Princes; which we are told are still customary amongst the Persians, and are esteemed more strict and sacred, than those in which the Name of God is immediately invoked. For they did this, not as thinking there was any Divinity in their Princes, whilst alive, nor as imprecating their Displeasure if they spoke false; but because many of them either in good earnest, or at least in Flattery, intended hereby to shew, that they prefer'd their Prince's Safety to their own; and therefore look'd upon it as a more horrid Perjury to devolve the Wrath of God upon Him, than upon *Themselves*³. So that the sense of those Protestations was properly this; So may my Prince be happy and safe, as I perform what I now Promise; that is, unless I fulfil my Engagement, I desire the Divine Judgment may light upon my Prince's Head. St. Augustin^b speaks very pertinently to this purpose. What else, saith he, is that which we call (Jurare) to swear, but (Jus reddere) to pay the Due or Right; to God, if we swear by God; to our Children, if we swear by them? And what Right do we owe to our own Safety, to our Children, or to our God, but the Right of Love and of Truth, not of Treachery and Falshood? When any Man says, By my Safety, he pawns and engageth his Safety to Providence, for the truth of what he affirms; when he says, By my Children, he consigns over his Children as so many Pledges to God; desiring that whatever comes out of his own Mouth may fall upon their Head; Truth, if he declares Truth; Falshood, if he speaks falsely. Whatsoever therefore a Person names in his Oath, whether his Children, his own Life, or Safety, or any thing else, he devotes and binds it over to Almighty God. And hence, although Philo the Jew is justly to be prais'd for condemning rash and profane Swearing, yet we can by no means approve of his Doctrine, when he delivers himself so loosely, as in the following Terms^c: *If, says he, the Exigency of Affairs necessarily requires an Oath, it is more becoming to swear by the Health or the prosperous Age of our Father or Mother, if alive; or by their Happy Memory, if they are dead. For their Act of producing their Children into Life from nothing, makes them the Images and Representatives of the Divine Nature*⁴. *They too deserve Commendation, who, as often as they are urged to swear, by delaying and hesitating strike an awe, not only into the Spectators, but into those very Persons who require the Oath at their Hands. For 'tis a Custom with some, when they have pronounced the first Words of the Form, So help me, to leave off abruptly, adding what they please besides in their Mind and Thoughts. For the Sentence may be fill'd up by subjoining not only the Highest, or the Creator of all things, but the Earth, the Sun, the Heavens, or the World. Nor do I see any Excuse that can be brought to justify that Oath of the Christian Soldiers recited by Vegetius^d, which carries in it too gross an excess of Reverence towards the Emperors. They swear, says he^e, by God, and by Christ, and by the Holy Spirit, and by the Emperor's Majesty, which next to God is to be loved, and to be worshipp'd by Mankind. For when our Prince hath been once invested with the Title of Augustus, we are to pay to him, as to a present mortal God, faithful Devotion and most watchful Service. For though we should grant the following Clause, A civil or a military Person then serves God, when he faithfully loves him who reigns by God's Appointment and Authority; yet this is by no means a Reason why they swear by the Majesty of the Emperors in the same manner as by the Name of God. Nor is it to be supposed, that common Soldiers should be capable of so much Subtily as to distinguish the Words (by) in the same Form into two different Senses, one as apply'd to God, another as spoken of the Emperor. This is certain*

^a Lysias Orat. adverb. Diagiton. "I am ready with a well assured Mind, whenever you please to require it, to swear by the Lives of these my Children, and of those which I have since had by a second Bed. And I am not yet arriv'd at so desperate a degree of Misery, nor am so unreasonably covetous of Money, as that I should be willing to devote my Family to a Curse, only that I may leave them a Maintenance; or by an unnatural Wickedness to rob my Father of his Estate.

And here likewise it may be remarked by the Bye, that the Banjans in India, who set the highest Value and Respect on their Cows, esteem it a most sacred Oath to hold a Knife near the Cow, and say, If what I affirm be false, or if I do not perform my Bargain, may the Cow be struck through with this Knife, Pietr. della Valle Itin. MR. BARB. NOTES on §. III.

³ Hence it appears, saith our Author, that such Persons were with Reason punished very rigorously, who were perjurd, after they had sworn by the Head, Throne, or Health of the Prince, because they believed, that by such an Oath they exposed that sacred Person, upon whose Safety the whole Kingdom depended, to Divine Vengeance. See what Herodotus says of the Scythians, Lib. iv. and Zosimus, Lib. v. In the Capitularies of Charles the Great, Men are forbid to swear by the Life of the King or his Children, Lib. iii. c. 42. See the Diogenes, lib. xii. tit. 2. De Jurjur. &c. leg. xiii. §. 6.

from Eusebius's Ecclesiastical History ⁶, that to swear by the Fortune of the Emperor was accounted one of the Marks of abjuring Christianity; which therefore St. Polycarp resolutely refus'd to the last. And so too it may be justly question'd, whether we ought to approve of that Oath prescrib'd by Charles Gonzaga to his new Order of Knights, in the Form following; I swear by the Immortal God, and by the Antient Nobility which I profess ^b. Hence likewise it appears, That the Antients had good reason for punishing with the utmost severity Persons who had forsworn themselves by their Prince's Life or Safety; inasmuch as they were thought hereby to make him obnoxious to the Divine Punishment, whose Success and Preservation is yet so closely connected to the publick Security ^c. Thus we find the Scythians in Herodotus ^d, as often as their King happen'd to be sick, making strict enquiry whether any of the Subjects had sworn falsely by the Royal Throne; and if such a Person was discover'd, he suffer'd Death for his Perjury. In Zozimus ^e the Roman Magistrates declar'd they could not accept of the Proposals of Alaric, though fair and just, because they had sworn by the Life of their Prince, that they would never consent to a Peace with the Invader. If their Oath had been directed to God, they say, they might possibly have waiv'd it in this necessity, relying on the Divine Mercy for the pardon of so impious a Crime; but since they had bound themselves by the Life of the Emperor, they thought it absolutely unlawful for them to break through so solemn an Engagement. In the Capitulatory of Charles the Great ^f, we find a Prohibition against swearing by the Life of the King, or of his Sons. As to the Civil Law, Ulpian doth not deny it to be an Oath, when a Man swears by his own Safety ⁷; but says, it is not valid, unless it were expressly propos'd to him in those particular Terms ⁸. Because Oaths being taken for the Benefit and Security of him that requires them; therefore Custom makes it necessary they should be form'd in the Words which he proposeth, so that they may fully bear his Meaning, and answer his Design ^h. Whereas, if the Party who is to swear might choose his own Words, he would have an opportunity, by insidious or equivocal Expressions, to evade the force of his Obligation. Another Reason for Ulpian's Assertion may be, because such Speeches and Protestations continually losing somewhat of their Reverence by daily Use, no Man can be bound to let the trite Form of another Party (with which he often lards his Discourse when he doth not think on't) pass for a serious and solemn Oath. And Mr. Hobbes ⁱ is in the Right, when he censures these customary Expressions, as not properly Oaths, but profane Abuses of the Name of God, arising from an ill Habit of being too positive and vehement in Talk.

From what hath been offer'd it is clear, that Execrations, although strictly taken, as when a Man barely lays Curses, or imprecates Mischief on himself or others, they are not Oaths; yet are on all Accounts to be reckon'd part of an Oath, as they respect any Assertion or Promise, which they are added to bind ^k. And this is to be extended likewise to those Prayers or Wishes, by which a Man makes the performance of his Oath the Condition of his obtaining such or such a Blessing. As that of the Boy in Jelias ^l, So may I crack Timeias's Skull. Thus we find Julian, to encourage his Army, constantly swearing (as the Historian speaks ^m) not by the Graces, but by the Greatness of his commenc'd Exploits; So may I bring the Persians under the Yoke; so may I reverse the weak Condition of the Roman World: As Trajan is reported sometimes to have confirm'd his Speeches, by adding, So may I see Dacia reduc'd into the form of a Province; so may I lay Bridges over the Danube and Euphrates ⁿ. 'Tis remarkable in the Parthians, a People of Indostan, that they are so extravagantly proud, as to use for an Affirmation, May I never come to be a King in Dehli, if I don't make good my Promise. And hence too it appears what Interpretation we ought to put on those Oaths which we meet with in Scripture, when even good and pious Men swear by some created Thing ^o. That amongst the Jews of the latter Ages, nothing was more common than Oaths ^p, By the Head, by the Heaven, by the Earth, by the Temple, by the Gold of the Temple, by the Altar, by the Gift upon the Altar, is evident from St. Matthew xxiii. v. 16, &c. Where our Saviour reproves them severely for their profane Abuses, and impertinent Cavils in this Matter. The νὴν μὰ τὸ δὲ σκεπτρου in Homer ^q, Didymanus thus expounds, We are to know, says he, that in swearing by the Sceptre they swear by God himself, the great Governour and Controller of Kingdoms ^r. Yet Ovid hath given us another sort of an Explication:

*Nam sibi quod nunquam taetam Briseida jurat
Per sceptrum; sceptrum non putat esse Deos* ^s.

Who by his Sceptre swore Briseis free,
Ne'er took the Wood to be a Deity.

We learn from Procopius ^t, that the Persians, in the latter Times of that Nation, used to swear by Salt. And in one of the Byzantine Historians, we

⁷ The Words of the Civil Law are, *Qui per salutem suam jurat, licet per Deum jurare videtur respectu casu Dei ini Nominis in jurat) attamen si non ita specialiter jusjurandum ei delatum est, jurasse non videtur: & ideo ex hoc non videtur juramentum est. IV. To proceed: That part of the Form in Oaths, under which God is invoc'd as a Witness, or as an Avenger, is to be accommodated to the religious Persuasion ¹ which the Swearer entertains of God: It being vain and insignificant to compel a Man to swear by a God whom he doth not believe, and therefore doth not reverence. And no one thinks himself bound to the Divine Majesty in any other Words, or under any other Titles, than what are agreeable to the Doctrines of his own Religion; which in his Judgment is the only true way of Worship. And hence likewise it is, that he who swears by false Gods, yet such as were by him accounted true, stands oblig'd; and if he deceives, is really guilty of Perjury. Because whatever his peculiar Notions were, he certainly had some sense of the Deity before his Eyes; and therefore by wilfully forswearing himself he violated, as far as he was able, that Awe and Reverence which he ow'd to Almighty God ^b. Yet when a Person requiring an Oath from another, accepts it under a ² Form agreeable to that Worship which the Swearer holds for true, and he himself for false, he cannot in the least be said hereby to approve of that Worship. Thus a Christian, when he admits of the Oath of a Jew, doth on no account subscribe to his Opinion, who denies the one only true God, the Maker of Heaven and Earth, to be the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. Yet I doubt whether the Example ³ of Laban in this Case, alleg'd by Grotius ^c, from Gen. xxxi. 53. comes up to the Purpose; for the God of Abraham, and the God of Nahor, and the God of the Fathers, was the living and true God ^d.

V. But farther, it is requisite to the Force and Obligation of an Oath, that it be taken with deliberate Thought, and real Design. And therefore he shall by no Means stand bound, who not thinking himself to swear, hath happen'd to utter Words which imply an Oath; or who hath barely recited the Form; or who, being by Virtue of some Office appointed to give other Persons their Oath, tells them how they shall speak after him ^e. In this Case Lucian's Saying will hold good, We are not to consider his Mouth, but his Heart ^f. It was vain therefore in Cydippe to fancy herself religiously oblig'd, by reading the Oath which Acontius had wrote upon the Apple. And so indeed Ovid ^g hath taught her to argue,

*Quæ jurat, mens est; nil conjuravimus illâ.
Illa fidem diâis addere sola preest.
Consilium prudensque animi sententia jurat,
Et nisi judicii vincula nulla valent.
Si tibi nil dedimus præter sine pectore vocem,
Verba suis frustra viribus orb. tenes.
Non ego juravi; legi jurantia verba, &c.*

The Mind must swear; with that we never swore;
Yet that alone can add a binding Power.
Oaths are the Act of Wisdom and of Thought;
Words give the Thread, but Judgment ties the [Knot.

Since all we said an empty Sound we prove,
Sound without Sense hath lost its Force to move.
We did not take, we did but read the Form, &c. ^h.

But 'twould be most senseless and absurd, if a Man designing to swear, or at least pretending such a Design, should yet refuse to be ty'd by what he says; and should urge in Excuse, that when the Oath was administer'd to him, his Intention was barely to recite the formal Words, but not to lay any Obligation on his Conscience ^h. Not so much (if we consider the immediate Reason) because Obligation is the necessary Effect of an Oath, and inseparable from it; as because otherwise the whole use of Oaths, nay and the whole Method of engage-

MR. BARB. NOTES on §. IV, V.

² Mr. Placcette in his Treatise of an Oath, l. i. c. 13. distinguishes here between, requiring an Infidel to swear by his false Gods, and proposing an Oath barely to him. In the first he is induced to commit an Act of Idolatry, which can never be allowed; but in the other he tempts him not to Idolatry, though he has reason to believe that he will commit the Sin in doing what is required. The Reason is, because what he requires is innocent; for 'tis not unlawful to swear. But if he adds any thing Criminal to what is required, he does it of his own accord, without being determined or induced by him who proposed the Oath. If it were otherwise, no Man that hath an urgent occasion for a Sum of Money, which no body will lend him at reasonable Interest, could be permitted to borrow it of an Usurer, who he knows very well will not lend but at exorbitant Use, &c. This is what is said, but to me this distinction of Mr. Placcette seems not necessary. To require an Oath of a Heathen is in my Opinion the same thing as to desire him to swear by his false Gods. He can't swear but by the Object of his Religious Worship; and if he swears by any thing else, no Man will take it for an Oath. The truth is, though an Oath consider'd in itself is a Religious Act, yet in common dealing it ought to be look'd upon as no more than a Civil Act. 'Tis a Security that is required, and the Force of it depends upon the Impression that the fear of God makes upon Mens Minds; which imports no more, than that he that swears, calls the true or some false God to witness, provided we swear not lightly and without necessity. I compare it to Numan's Action, who, to discharge his Office, went into the Temple of Rimmon, and bowed himself there, to support his Mother the King of Affyria, which the Prophet Elisha did not disallow. See 2 Kings v. 18. and Josk. xxiii. 7. where the Israelites are forbidden to swear by other Gods, which refers to the rest of the Canaanites, with whom they were to have no Commerce, lest they should be won to serve and worship their Gods, to which they were too much disposed.

ing each other by mutual Signs, would be banish'd out of human Life; if any Person might be able by his secret Intention to hinder an Action from obtaining such an Effect as it was first instituted to produce. Therefore, whatever your inward Purpose might be, you shall certainly be bound by your Oath, when both the Party to whom you swore, apprehended this to be your Meaning and Design, and you your self, when you utter'd the Words, evidenc'd by all outward Tokens, that you were in earnest, and not in jest. And 'tis indeed a downright Contradiction to desire to take an Oath, and yet not to be oblig'd by the Oath; to desire to promise, and not to be bound by your Promise; to desire to utter Words in a serious Manner, and yet not to let them bear that Use and that End which hath been assign'd them by the common Agreement of Men. Thus 'twas grossly ridiculous for the Milanese to tell Frederick I. We swore indeed, but we did not promise to keep our Oath^a. And 'tis much to the same Effect, what Father Paul reports in his History of the Council of Trent^b; That during the Vacancy of the Holy See, the Cardinals are wont to draw up a Form consisting of so many Heads, for the Reformation of the Papal Government, which each of them swears he will exactly observe, in case the Election falls on him. Tho' the Experience of all Ages testifies, that not one of them so stands to the Engagement; inasmuch as immediately after their being chose Popes, they declare, that either they could not be tied by any such Bonds; or that their very Investiture with that Dignity quite releases them from the Obligation. If therefore any Person shall pretend that he took an Oath with such a preposterous Design, the Excuse shall avail nothing towards reversing what he promis'd, but shall pass for meer Trifling. We may illustrate the Case by a like Instance: A Person who hath his Doctor's Degree conferr'd on him in the Schools, is nevertheless a Doctor, though we should suppose, that he, who pronounc'd the Form of his Promotion, thought all the while of dignifying an Ass. But if a Player upon the Stage invest another with the Habit and Formalities of that Degree, he shall be just as much a Doctor as he was before. Ipsa statim scena rem fictam esse testatur, as Quintilian^c observes on a like Occasion; the Place shews the Action to have been insignificant. Whence we see that 'tis an idle Question, Whether a Person be oblig'd, who deliberately utters the Words of an Oath, yet with an Intention not to swear? for if he barely rehears'd the Words without any farther Purpose, 'tis plain he hath neither sworn, nor is oblig'd. But when the Matter hath been perform'd in earnest; that is, when he who spoke the Words, gave all Proofs of his real Design to swear, and the other Party understood him in that Sense, no doubt but the Oath is properly taken, and the Obligation contracted, whatever secret Drift the Swearer might entertain in his own Mind.

VI. We ought likewise carefully to observe, That Oaths do not of themselves produce a new and peculiar Obligation¹, but are only applied as an additional Bond to an Obligation in its Nature valid before. For whenever we swear, we always suppose some Matter, upon Non-performance of which we thus imprecate the Vengeance of Heaven. But now this would be to no purpose², unless the Omission of the thing suppos'd had been before unlawful, and consequently unless we had been before oblig'd. Tho' indeed it frequently happens, that we comprehend in one Speech both the principal Obligation, and the additional Bond of the Oath; as for Instance, if I say, So God be my Helper, as I shall pay you an Hundred Pounds. And yet it doth

² Grotius, Lib. ii. c. 13. §. 14. supposes on the contrary, that every Oath by which we engage our selves to do or not do any thing to another, contains a double Promise; the one respecting the Person that took the Oath, and the other the God by whom we swear; and that one of these Promises may oblige, though the other does not. Mr. La Placette, who had been once of this Opinion, hath retracted it publicly. He maintains, in his Treatise of an Oath, lib. ii. c. 2. "That, properly speaking, we promise nothing to God in an Obligatory Oath, otherwise there would be no difference between a Vow and an Oath. See what our Author says, §. 8. Moreover, we often swear to do things wherein God is not at all concerned, and sometimes with which he is displeas'd. For it is ridiculous to say that we have promis'd a thing to any Man, who has no Interest by it, or which will be no Advantage to him, because it displeases him. Lastly, Promises become void in themselves, when they are not accepted. If then an Oath confirms a Promise made to God directly, it can't be of force, till we know that God accepts it; and how can we be assur'd of this, that God accepts a thousand Promises confirmed by an Oath, if they have no respect at all to his Service? what then is there in an Obligatory Oath, more than a bare Promise made to the Person who is sworn to? Mr. La Placette finds nothing that can give us a better Notion of this, than Treaties of Warranty so common among Princes. "Two Men, says he, make a Bargain, but one suspects the other will break it; to assure himself of the contrary, he propounds taking of an Oath, i. e. to take God for the Warranty of the Agreement, and consents, that in case he breaks it, God shall declare against him, and punish his "Perfidiousness." I thought, when I read these Words, that he had been of our Author's Opinion, which seems to be a Consequence of it; and I thought, when I put out the first Edition of this Work, I had given three good Reasons for my Opinion, as may appear from the Extract made of them by Mr. Bernard in the News of the Republick of Letters, June 1701. but I now see, that Mr. La Placette still maintains, That Oaths may be of Force and Obligatory, although the Promises added to them be null. This he pretends to prove in the End, but the Reasons he brings are weak, and not to the purpose, as I shall shew hereafter. And we may easily foresee, that he can produce nothing satisfactory in this matter, and agreeable to his own Principles. He rejects the Opinion of a double Promise included in an Oath, because we can have no certainty that God accepts an infinite number of things indifferent in their own Nature, to which we engage our selves by Oath. But then he ought to be sure that God will be the Warranty of the Oath taken, after the same manner as the Prince, who is Warranty in a Treaty, ought to agree to it. For here is no Revelation, and I defy Mr. La Placette and all the rigid Casuists to prove that God will be Warranty in an Engagement otherwise invalid, at least, that it is his Will, that the Holiness of an Oath may secure to the wicked Man the benefit of his Extortion. According to Mr. La Placette, Fraud dispenses with keeping an Oath, and why may not Violence have the same effect?

² This Reason does not appear to be good, or at least is not well express'd. For as the Author says a little after, and §. 19. it happens ordinarily, that we engage our selves and swear at the same time, otherwise we can't conceive of an Obligation antecedent to an Oath, and valid without any dependence upon that religious Act. The Notion of an additional Bond, which the Author mentions above, is sufficient to prove what he maintains. Men engage not themselves by swearing, but swear to confirm their Engagements. An Oath, in respect of the Obligation we take on us, is as Modes and Accidents are to the Substance, without which they can't subsist. So that from the Moment that the Engagement, to which we have call'd God to witness, includes something that makes it null in itself, an Oath loseth all its Force, and we swear only with the Mouth, as all those apparently do, from whom a Promise by Oath is extorted either through fear of Death, or some other great Danger.

not follow, that an Oath is unnecessary or superfluous, because it is thus added to an Obligation before firm and good in itself. For although all Men, except downright Atheists, believe that God will punish the violation of Promises, not confirm'd by Oath; yet they believe at the same time, and with good Reason, that those Wretches will feel a more severe Vengeance, who have in express Terms call'd down the Wrath of God upon themselves, and, so far as in them lies, have shut themselves out from all Hopes of Mercy; whilst they engag'd in Wickedness with so full a Purpose and Design, as to shew, that they valued not the displeasure of Him who is able to bestow the greatest Good, and to inflict the greatest Evil. Whence we may conclude, that those Acts which were before attended with some inward Flaw hindring any Obligation to arise from them, cannot be rendred obligatory even by the Addition of an Oath. As neither can a prior Obligation, truly valid, be disannul'd by a subsequent Oath, or the Right which it gave another Person, be revers'd. Thus for a Man to swear that he will not pay a just Debt, can be no Prejudice to the Claim of the Creditor.

VII. And hence too it follows, that since in Promises and Pacts, Consent, grounded upon Mistake, is not effectual towards producing an Obligation, therefore an Oath is not binding, in case it be evidently made out, that the Person who swore suppos'd some Matter to be otherwise than it really proves to be; and which if he had not thus suppos'd, he would not have taken the Oath: especially, if his Mistake was caus'd by the Deceit of the Party to whom he swore. For here the Point suppos'd was in the nature of a Condition, which failing, all that was built upon it falls of course. Thus if a Person brings me some very welcome News from a remote Place, in consideration of which I solemnly swear to reward him; in case I afterwards find his Relation to have been false, my Oath shall fix no Tie upon me. Grotius^a adds, If it be doubtful whether a Man would not have sworn, altho' he had not been thus mistaken, then he shall stand to his Oath. Because Simplicity and plain Meaning are the most agreeable attendants of Oaths, and all Tricks and Evasions are strictly to be banish'd from them: And likewise, because the Promise was not built on that Mistake only, though such a false Prospect might be the occasion of its being express'd in larger Terms. But this doth not clearly settle the Case; for who shall be the Judge whether in this Case, abstracting from the Mistake, the Promise would have been nevertheless made? Certainly, not the Party towards whom the Oath was address'd: For how is it possible he should be able rightly to discern what Mind the other Person would have been of, upon supposal of such or such a Condition? But neither can the Person who swore give a full Determination of this Difficulty; since we are not wont to be equally pleas'd with the same things propos'd at different Times, or at the same time in different Manners. It seems probable therefore that even such an Oath is not valid; at least, so far as it is founded upon Mistake. Yet if the Party who made it, thinks he shall pay some kind of Regard to the Honour of God, in not receding from it altogether, he ought to judge by the Condition of his Affairs, how far he may conveniently go in the Performance. And whilst we are speaking of this Case, it will not be improper to make a Reflection or two on the Oath which Joshua perform'd to the Gibeonites^b. Where we may first observe, That the Subtlety used by that People was not culpable, nor did fall under the Notion of a Lye strictly so term'd. For who will blame a Man for endeavouring by some Fiction of Speech to preserve his Life from an Enemy bent upon his Destruction? Nor, properly speaking, was this Stratagem the Cause of any Damage to the Israelites: For what doth a Man lose by being hinder'd from shedding the Blood of another Person, whom he may nevertheless spoil of all his Possessions, and drag into perpetual Servitude, so weaken'd and disarm'd, as to be incapable of future Opposition or Resistance? The whole Point therefore turns upon this Question, Whether or no it was the express Command of God, that they should kill all and each of the Inhabitants of Canaan, without Distinction; even such as should voluntarily submit to their Yoke, and from whom they could apprehend no Danger hereafter? If this be absolutely affirm'd, Joshua's Oath was void. For then the only use of it would have been to evade a Divine Injunction; that is, Joshua would have invoc'd God to punish him, if he did not break his Command. Nor can it be urg'd, that Joshua was therefore willing to keep his Oath, lest it should somewhat abate the Awe and Reverence towards the Divine Majesty, in those Nations, to see him break a Covenant which he had call'd God to attest. For the Inconvenience in this respect would have been the same, had he neglected to put the Divine Command in Execution. Grotius^c therefore is of Opinion that the Order in Deut. vii. 2. and xx. 16. is to be understood with this Limitation^d, unless any People should submit upon the first Summons; which he urgeth

MR. BARB. NOTES on §. VII.

* In this Hypothesis there is more Difficulty. For when Joshua knew how things were, he still certainly determined to receive the Gibeonites; not to treat with them as Equals, and make them his Allies, but as Tributaries, or at least as Slaves to the Children of Israel. So that he could not dispense with his Word, though an Oath had not intervened in the League concluded with them. But Mr. Le Clerc has fully proved, that Grotius is mistaken in his Notion, and confutes him thus: The Law expressly excepts the Seven Nations of the Canaanites from the number of such as they ought to offer and give their Lives, if they would yield at Discretion. See Deut. xx. 15, 16. Farther, there is a great difference between a Law which orders the Destruction of a People, for fear that if they are spared they will ensnare their Conquerors into Idolatry, and a Law that orders the Destruction of all, at least every one of them that does not voluntarily become tributary, and embrace the Religion of their new Masters. If the last had been Moses's Meaning, he would have deliver'd himself clearly in some of the Places where he mentions the Canaanites. This Matter ought to have been taught the Hebrews carefully, yet we do not find any Footsteps of an Exception to that severe Order given by God in several Places to slay the Seven Nations of Canaan with the edge of the Sword, and make no Treaty with them. Again, the Vow, which the Hebrews call'd Cherem, was of that Nature, that he that had vow'd it could not redeem it, but it must be destroy'd. See Lev. xxvii. 29. Now it appears from several Places, that the Seven Canaanitish Nations ought to be look'd upon as such, as may be seen in the Law mention'd, Deut. vii. 2. The Examples alledg'd by Grotius do not prove the contrary. For, 1. The History of Rahab is a particular Instance, from whence no Consequence can be drawn. 'Tis no wonder if the Hebrews, to whom she had done so considerable a piece of Service, spared her; and so much the more, because she did it before urgeth many Reasons to confirm. Mr. Selden likewise has shewn at large^a, that the utter Slaughter and Extirpation of those People was rather a Permission to the Israelites, than a Command. And others think this the more probable, because the Reason assign'd for that Commission against the Canaanites was, partly lest the Israelites should imitate their Idolary, being then strangely prone to foreign Superstition; and partly lest the antient Inhabitants, if left in any considerable Numbers, should gain Strength to turn out their new Guests; especially in case they were allow'd to live with them upon equal Terms^b. This Danger therefore being once surmounted, they judge it would have been no Fault to admit some to Mercy and Favour; especially such as should abjure their Idolatrous Worship. However this were, 'tis plain that Joshua, upon discovery of their Fraud, interpreted his Oath in a more strict and severe Sense. They had profess'd themselves the Servants of the Israelites, a Phrase common with the Eastern Nations, and had desir'd a League. Joshua had promis'd them their Life, and had enter'd into League with them, according to their Petition: And by this Agreement (had they prov'd such as they pretended, that is, none of the Number of those Nations which God had design'd to Destruction) they had been left in Possession of their Goods and Liberties^c. But on account of the Deception they had us'd, he insists strictly upon his Words; and, as it appears, left them nothing but their Life and necessary Maintenance^d.

VIII. But what are we to think of Oaths extorted by unjust Fear? Surely the Person who by means of this Fear procur'd a Promise upon Oath, is no less obliged to release the Promise thus violently obtain'd, than if no Oath had been added to confirm it. Therefore there appears no reason, why a Compensation should not be admitted in this Case, in opposition to the claim of the Injurious Party; according to the Rules laid down by us, when we treated of the general Subject of Fear. Indeed 'tis the Opinion of Grotius^e, that if either the Words of the Oath do not respect the Man, by conferring any Right upon him; or if they do respect him, yet so as that somewhat may be opposed to his Claim, then the effect of the Oath shall be this: That the Man shall obtain no Right, but that the Swearer shall nevertheless stand to his Oath, by virtue of his Obligation to Almighty God. And he urgeth, as an Instance, the case of one, who by some unlawful Fright, or Terror, hath forced a Promise from another. But if we before they had declared War against her Country. 2. 'Tis certain that Solomon contented himself to make the Remnant of the Canaanites tributary to him, 1 Kings ix. 20, 21. But the Law, which order'd the Destruction of that People, did not extend to their Posterity; it is enough to suppose that it reached to them only, over whom God made them victorious in Joshua's time, or after, till they were well settled, and in possession of as great an extent of Ground as was necessary. So that if any of the Canaanites escaped into the neighbouring Countries, as the Text above quoted seems plainly to prove, and they after fell into the Hands of the Israelites or their Posterity, they ought not to slay them without Mercy. 3. As to what is said in the Book of Joshua, chap. xi. v. 19, 20. That there was no Town of the Seven Nations of the Canaanites that would make Peace with the Israelites, because God had hardened their Hearts, so that they fought against Israel, that he might destroy them utterly without shewing them any Mercy: 'Tis not meant, as Grotius tells us, that the Israelites were obliged to spare them which yielded to them at discretion, but that through the influence of Divine Providence all the Seven Canaanitish Nations, except the Gibeonites, agreed together to fight, and would not submit to the Hebrews, who would not have had the Courage to have put them all to the Sword without Mercy, as Divine Justice had resolv'd to punish them, had they laid down their Arms and open'd their City-Gates to the Conquerors. These are Mr. Le Clerc's Reasons, to which I freely assent. But if this be so, what shall we say to Joshua's Oath? As for me, I can see no Reason but we may say, that his Oath was rash and null in itself. The Sacred Historian seems to grant the first, when he says, v. 14. that they did not ask Counsel at the Mouth of the Lord, i. e. of Urim and Thummim. In truth, since he suspected something, as appears from Verse 7. he ought to have been cautious how he engaged himself by Oath in a Matter of such Consequence, and in a manner run the hazard of opposing God's Command, which being so formal and absolute, the Artifice of the Gibeonites had been soon discover'd, and then Joshua's and the Elders of Israel's Oath had been of no Force. For all the World agrees that an Oath engaging us upon a thing unlawful is of no Force, see §. ix. following. Nevertheless we see that Joshua thought himself obliged to keep his Oath. 'Tis possible that God by some posterior Act might ratify this Oath, though the Holy Scripture, which omits many Circumstances, speaks nothing of this Ratification. The severe Punishment which God laid on the Israelites and Posterity of Saul for slaying the Gibeonites, 2 Sam. xxi. 1, &c. may give ground to such a Conjecture, although the Action of Saul was otherwise inhuman and cruel; because, as I say with Mr. Le Clerc, the Law which order'd the Destruction of the Israelites was not in being. But be that as it will, it is certain, that a Superior may render an Act good contrary to his own Prohibition, especially in the Case of a positive Law so rigorous as this we are treating of. Moreover, we know that the Civil and Canon Law permit certain Acts confirmed by an Oath to be valid, though forbidden by those Laws, and so the Oath does not render them effectual of themselves. See Grotius, lib. ii. c. 5. §. 14. n. 4. and §. 16. and c. xiii. §. 20. n. 4. and what our Author says §. 19. following. Nor is it hard to discover why God would ratify Joshua's Oath. The Breach of so solemn a Promise made with an Oath, which is accounted by all people in the World a most sacred and inviolable Act, would have doubtless begat an ill Opinion both of the Israelites and of God himself with all the neighbouring Nations, with which they were to live in Peace, so that they would have had no Commerce with them, nor value their Word. Our Author pretends that the same inconvenience will follow upon our Neglect to execute an absolute Order of God; but in vain, because it is not in the least to be feared, that the Neighbours would make any such Reflection. They might think it strange, that the Israelites should treat the People they conquer'd with so much Rigour, but they could never be offended in the least to see that Rigour mitigated by the Sanctity of an Oath. See what I have said in the first Edition of this Work. But Mr. Le Clerc has changed his Opinion, as appears from his Comments upon the other Books of the Old Testament printed in 1708. where he says, That the Israelites did ill in not informing themselves fully of the place from whence the Gibeonites came, although these last might use any innocent Arts to save their Lives; but he believes that they did not insert that Clause in the Treaty, but it was made upon the supposition, that the Gibeonites were a People who dwelt at a great distance, upon which account it was null. But the Israelites not insisting upon that, and having directly sworn that they would do them no harm, they were obliged to keep their Word, which they had confirmed with an Oath, and so much the more, because it engaged them to do nothing contrary to their Law, as he proves by the same Reasons that Grotius had used. To this Action of the Israelites we may apply a Sentence of Publius Syrus, which shews that we do well to keep our Word, though we have committed a Fault in giving it. Etiā in peccato rectē præstatur fides, v. 192. We must look into Mr. Le Clerc's new Edition of the Pentateuch, to see how he confutes his own Reasons; for I hear, that while I am writing this Comment (in 1709.) he has reprinted that first Part of his useful Work on the Old Testament.

would truly settle this Point, we ought to distinguish between the different Kinds and Natures of Oaths. First, for those Words which are directed not to Men, but to God; as if I say either alone, or before Witnesses, I swear to God that I will give Seius thus or thus^a. Here the Oath hath the Nature of a Vow, by which I promise to God that I will perform somewhat in respect to his Honour; and consequently by which I intended to transfer a Right on God, and not on Man. The case is quite otherwise in Oaths which are directed to Men, or in which I promise a Man somewhat, calling God to witness. For here the Obligation seems altogether to expire, if it appear that the Person, to whom the Promise was made, lay under some Fault which render'd him incapable of receiving it. Thus in a Promise to a Thief, I neither directed the Engagement towards God, nor express'd my self thus, That I would, in regard to the Honour and Glory of the Divine Name, pay the Man what was mention'd. And tho' we should grant never so freely and absolutely, that even such an Oath hath likewise the Force of a Vow: Yet since a Vow binds not, unless it be accepted by God, how shall I be sure that 'tis consistent with the Divine Pleasure and Approbation, that I, an innocent Person, should rob my self of my Goods, to bestow them on an ungodly Villain, only to put him into a way of making some gain of his Wickedness? And then there is no Fear that my neglect of my Oath should lessen the Awe and Reverence of God in such a Wretch, who by his very Profession, and way of Living, shews how little he values God and Religion. Yet if there be any Man who in this case, to avoid giving Scandal to the Weak, and that he may not seem, now he hath escaped the Danger, to treat the Divine Name in a slighting or irreverent Manner, which before was the cause of his Deliverance; if any Man, we say, on these Considerations, is resolv'd to part with the Sum thus promis'd, it seems not only to be more safe and expedient, but likewise more acceptable to God, that he should rather convert it to pious Uses, than to the maintaining of the Wretch in his villainous Courses. And this method of proceeding is the more justifiable and secure in Governments, where all Oaths of this kind are by the municipal Laws declared void². The Examples alledg'd by Grotius to the contrary will, to those who rightly consider things, appear not at all to reach the Purpose. 'Tis strange that Matthæus the Civilian^b should, in his Discourse on this Point, commend the Act of Julius Cæsar, who being taken by Pirates, and made swear to pay his Ransom, sent the Money, but afterwards putting to Sea, took them and brought them to Execution. For Plutarch^c, Velleius^d, Sueton^e, and Polyæus^f, who all tell the Story, do none of them mention a Word about any such Oath: And Matthæus seems in this to follow the Notion of those who fancy that a Person, thus compell'd to swear, may satisfy his Oath by paying, just for the present, what he promis'd; yet so as that it shall be lawful for him immediately after to recover what he gave, either by his own Strength, or by calling in the assistance of the Magistrate. Which is indeed but a vain piece of Superstition; it being the same thing not to pay, and immediately to take back what we paid. Tully asserts^g, That it is no Fraud to withhold from a Robber a Ransom promis'd him for saving our Life³, for this Reason, Because a Robber is a common

MR. BARB. NOTES on §. VIII.

² This is thus decided by a Constitution of the Emperor Frederick II. inserted in the Code, lib. ii. tit. 28. Si adversus venditionem, Leg. 1. per vim autem, vel per justum metum, i. e. not by a just Fear, but by such a Fear as is sufficient to move a Person not very timorous. Extorta etiam à majoribus [sacramenta] (maximè ne querimonium malefactorum commissorum faciant) nullius monumenti esse jubemus. The Poet Gautier also makes mention of a like Constitution of the Emperor Barberissa in his Ligurinus, l. viii. v. 793, &c. Juramenta metu, mortisque dolore coacta, Præcipiunt ne quis multis nocitura loquendo Publicet, aut in se crudeliter acta queratur, Nullius meriti, et ponderis esse jubemus.

Oaths took on Force, or Fear of threat'ed Fate; And chiefly those forbidding to relate Designs of publick Harm, or to complain Of cruel Wrongs, we here revoke as vain.

³ Mr. La Placette, in his Treatise of an Oath, l. ii. c. 21. takes our Author's Words in a wrong Sense. These are his Words. "He makes Cicero say, That there is a Fraud in keeping these sort of Promises." Whereas these are Mr. Pufendorf's Words, Cicero quoque, prædoni pactum pro capite pretium, sine fraude non afferri afferit. Where the whole Connexion of the Discourse shews, that there is no appearance of any such Imputation to Cicero by our Author, but that he fairly relates the Opinion of that famous Orator. For he lays not, non sine fraude afferri, sed sine fraude non afferri; which is very different, and comes up exactly to the Sense of Cicero's Words, which are, Si prædonibus pactum pro capite pretium non attuleris, nulla fraus est, ne si juratus quidem id non feceris, &c. Mr. La Placette, after he has made this Mistake, infers from it what our Author never did, and of which none ought to suppose him guilty without very great Reason, supposing that through Carelessness it had been ill express'd, as it happens to him sometimes; he infers, I say, from thence, that Mr. Pufendorf seems to assert, that a Traveller can't in Conscience, to save his Life, either promise Thieves the Sum that they demand of him, or pay it them; and that 'tis an Offence against the Publick to do either of them. So that this Oath is sinful, and we ought not to make it; since no Man may lawfully oblige himself to that which he can't do without a Sin. And so upon such Occasions a good Man ought rather to suffer himself to be kill'd, than promise a Shilling to such Thieves as offer to spare his Life, provided he'll oblige himself to do a thing which is in his Power. I am of Opinion, that Thieves trouble not themselves, whether it be in their Power or no to perform the Promise which they have extorted, with or without an Oath. In fine, there is not the least thing in our Author, which can give ground to suspect any such Notion as he attributes to him, nor can it be inferred from his Principles, but by supposing the thing in question. He affirms, that a Man is not bound to keep a forced Oath, but he elsewhere leaves him at liberty to observe it or not, as he sees fit, and so makes it a matter of Prudence; and though he believes he can't keep it without offending against the Publick, yet it follows not, that he may never do it, because he supposes (to speak properly) that it is no true Oath; and as he makes no Engagement with the Thief, who had no Right to require or accept it, so he called not God to witness; and so 'tis past all Contradiction, that he only swore with his Mouth. Mr. La Placette, after these weak Reasonings, concludes nevertheless with this sharp Censure: "See how the Liberties which the Enemies of severe Morality propound, do usually end! They carry the Severity and Rigour much farther than those whom they accuse of casting good Souls into Despair." But I'll refer it to any judicious Man to examine whose Books have done more Harm and less Good, whether those who are of our Author's Judgment, or those Moral Divines who are full of Myseries, scholastick Notions, and metaphysical Impulses to the highest Degree, and impracticable Maxims. Mr. La Placette affirms also, "That to maintain that a forced Oath doth not oblige, is to do great Mischief to Society, by making Pyrates and Banditti desperate, and hindring them from coming to any Treaty." But he may assure himself, that they will neither read this Author's nor his own Works. They depend more upon the Fear which such Men have of falling into their Hand, again, than upon the Obligation which lies upon them indispensibly to keep their Word or Oath. See what is said upon the Corraire of Barbary, l. viii. c. 4. §. 5. following. As for the Treaties in which we engage our selves to an Enemy or Conqueror through Fear, we shall speak of that, l. viii. c. 8.

Enemy to all Mankind, to whom no Faith can be engag'd, with whom no Covenant can be transacted. For which he is censured by Grotius^a, who observes, That although a Robber hath no Title to those common Rights which the Law of Nations hath establish'd between Enemies, in a fair and open War, yet he ought to be admitted to Fellowship and Communion so far as the Law of Nature extends; one Precept of which is, That Covenants be faithfully observ'd. And yet there are not wanting Arguments which might be urg'd in Tully's Defence^b; as, That since a Robber is a common Foe to all Men, or such an one as without any precedent Injury or Provocation spoils and murders all that fall into his Hands, and consequently makes it his very Profession to break and disturb that Society which God hath ordain'd amongst Men; therefore he ought to receive no Benefit from any such common Bond (as Oaths are) invented by Men to knit themselves more firmly together, after the Divine Appointment hath made them sociable Creatures. And that a way of Life, which declares for Atheism, ought not be admitted to any Gain or Advantage from Religion. As, on the other side, the Oaths and Proteftations of such Villains are little regarded or relied on by Wise Men^b. And we find the Pander in Terence^c reckoning it amongst the necessary Accomplishments of his Art, to have the knack of Perjury. Nic. Machiavel. Hist. Florent. l. iii. When Religion and the Fear of God are once extinct, the Consequence is, that Men regard and observe their Oaths only so far as suits with their Advantage; using them not with an intention of performance, but as Means and Instruments of deceiving with greater Ease; and thinking themselves to have won the more Praise and Glory, the less Trouble and the greater Security they have met with in bringing about their knavish Designs.

IX. It is farther requisite, in order to the Validity of an Oath, that the Obligation be lawful, which it is added to confirm^d. Therefore a Promise, tho' sworn to, shall be of no Force or Effect, if the Subject of it were a matter either repugnant to the Natural or Divine Law, or to any Human Law (if the Party lives under Civil Government) inconsistent with the Natural and Divine^d. The Example of David is most illustrious in this Case^e; who having in his Passion sworn to destroy the House and Family of Nabal, for denying him a reasonable Kindness in abusive and slanderous Language, yet being pacified by the Intercession of Abigail, he thanks God, that he hath been thus hindered from a more sinful Performance of a sinful Engagement^f. And so Alboinus was no doubt in the right, for retracting a Vow which he had made to cut off all the Inhabitants of Parvii, upon their refusing to surrender at his Summons. For 'tis absurd to invoke the Divine Vengeance upon any Action; but such as God himself hath, under a severe Penalty, forbidden. To do otherwise would be to abuse the Awe and Reverence which we owe to the Divine Majesty, in making it, as it were, a means of affronting him. And the design of introducing Oaths amongst Men was, that they might add Strength to good Actions, not that they might afford Excuse and Protection to bad. Dionys. Halicarn. l. vi. p. 694. Edit. Lips. The Gods would have us make use of Covenants for just and honest Designs, not for those that are vicious and unreasonable^g. The very Alcoran forbids Men to swear unlawfully^h; as suppose, That they will never come near their Wives: And enjoins any Person who hath happen'd to make such an Oath, to set a Slave at liberty by way of Expiation, before he presumes to break it. And here 'tis made a Question, Whether a Man falling amongst Thieves, and being by them compell'd to swear that he will for ever keep Silence, and as far as in him lies, provide for their Security, be bound to stand to his Oath? To which we are inclined to answer in the Negative; in case his Silence be likely to prove the occasion of exposing many other Persons to Danger. For as to his own part he might lawfully enough suffer the Villains to escape with Impunity; but not if their Safety was to be follow'd by the Murther and Ruin of many innocent Men. And we might apply to a Person under these Circumstances the Saying of Ateius Capito to Tiberius in Tacitus, Sane lentus in suo dolore esset; reipublice injurias ne largiretur; So far as he was concern'd himself, or, in regard to his own particular Grievance, he might be as merciful as he pleas'd; but he ought not to forgive the Injury done to the Commonwealth. Ann. III. c. 70. In Gautier. Ligurin. l. viii. ubi supra, Frederick makes the following Ordinance:

*Juramenta metu mortiferae dolore coacta,
Præcipue, ne quis multis nocitura loquendo
Publicet, aut in se crudeliter acta queratur, Nullius meriti vel ponderis esse jubemus.*

MR. BARB. NOTES on §. VIII, IX.

⁴ With the Limitation which our Author makes above, lib. iii. c. 6. §. 9, and 11. about the End.
¹ 'Tis in this Sense that we may allow the common Maxim to be true, That an Oath that ought not to be made, ought not to be kept; for if the thing to which we oblige ourselves be good or indifferent in itself, the Oath is valid and obligatory, whether we sin or not in making it. Here are two Examples which will clear this Matter: A Man obliges himself by Oath never to swear all his Life; nevertheless some time after he swears, and by this second Oath obliges himself to restore something he has borrowed. Doubtless he sins by making the second Oath, which he ought not to have done, but yet is bound to keep it. Another borrows, and swears he will restore what he has borrowed, having yet no Design to do it. He commits an horrible Sin by it, but will any Man say he is not obliged to perform his Oath? The Maxim by which he acts is not true, but in respect to such Oaths by which he engages himself to do some wicked Action, or forbear some good one, which he ought to do. This is what Mr. La Placette says, l. ii. c. 5. of his Treatise of an Oath.
² See the Comment of Mr. Le Clerc upon this Story. Mr. Hertius observes here, that David was not yet a King, and the refusal of such a Service did not authorize him to use those Methods with the Refuser. He was not in extreme Necessity, and if he had, that was not Cause sufficient to revenge himself in that terrible Manner.
³ The Greek is, Θεοὶ γὰρ ἐπὶ καλαῖς, καὶ δικαίαις παραλαμβάνεσθαι φιλῶσι ἐπιχειρεῖν, ἐκ τῆς ἀρχῆς καὶ ἀλικίας. See what Mr. Buddeus says about the Oath that Hannibal made his Son Hannibal to swear when he was a Child, That he never should have Peace or Amity with the Romans, Spec. Jurisprud. Hist. §. 68, &c. among his Selesta Jar. Nat. & Gen.

Oaths took on Force, or fear of threat'ned Fate;
And chiefly those forbidding to relate Designs of publick Harm, or to complain
Of cruel Wrongs, we here revoke, as vain.

X. But to go farther, altho' the thing promis'd be not in itself unlawful, yet the Oath shall be invalid, in case it hinders any greater moral Good¹, or if we are by it withheld from discharging any Duty of Humanity or Piety². And under this Head we may rank those Oaths, by which Men tie themselves up from discovering and communicating to others any honest Art, tending to the Use and Benefit of Mankind³: "Unless I or others, who are already privy to the Secret², can sufficiently supply the Needs of Men in this Particular; and upon supposal that my Discovery cannot prejudice and endanger the Party who required the Oath from me. Such an Oath we find in Lucian [Tragopodag.] Tom. ii. p. 118. in fin. Edit. Amst. The Sacred Oath of Silence which I have taken, suffers me not to declare what you desire. To which is added the Command of my dying Father, enjoining me never to disclose the force of this Composition. Plin. Nat. Hist. l. xxv. c. 1. It adds some kind of Strength and Authority to our Knowledge, when we refuse to communicate it to others. The Reason of all which is, because we owe all our Proficiency in good and useful things to Almighty God, and are each of us bound to carry our Endeavours to the highest degree that we are capable of attaining. so that 'tis not in our power to abridge ourselves of this Liberty, or by our own Acts to absolve our Consciences from a Duty enjoin'd by the Law of God. Oaths of this kind were not uncommon amongst the Jews, which are insisted on at large by other Authors⁴. Thus too we judge that Oath to have been invalid, which Narfes in *Paulus Diaconus*⁵ requir'd of an Old Man who had dug up a quantity of Gold, engaging him never to acquaint any Person with his good Fortune. And the Old Man was in the right, when upon the Death of Narfes he discover'd the Treasure to Tiberius the Emperor. And in this respect the case of a Vow is the same with that of an Oath: For neither is a Vow to be look'd on as good and valid, not only if it be unlawful, but if it be silly and impertinent. The Spartan who had sworn to throw himself headlong down the Promontory Leucate, when he beheld the dreadful Height, turn'd back at the Prospect; and being reproach'd for his want of Resolution, wisely answer'd⁶, *I did not consider that my first Vow stood in need of a much greater Vow to bind and confirm it*⁷.

X. Lastly, That Oaths do not alter the nature and substance of these Promises and Pacts to which they are join'd¹, is sufficiently evident. Thus an Oath about a thing absolutely impossible, is not obligatory; though the Party is guilty of a very heinous Sin, in thus rashly abusing the Divine Name. So an Oath added to a Promise which was before conditional, doth by no means render it absolute. For the Oath, which supposeth such a Condition, doth no less stand and fall with that Condition, than the bare Promise would have done without this Confirmation. Thus too an Oath, as well as any other Promise, ceaseth and expires upon failure of the Quality which the Person held when he swore, and with regard to which alone the Oath was made. For instance, a Magistrate, when he leaves his Office, is no longer bound by the Oath which he took at his admission. And on the other side, the Subjects owe no farther Obedience to a Magistrate, who hath either quitted his Dignity, or been fairly depriv'd of it; though no such Release be expressly and in formal manner granted them. For thus much is implied in the very Nature of the Affair². So likewise it is no less requisite to Promises confirm'd by Oath, than to others which are not so confirm'd, that they be accepted by the other Party. And he who obtains a Right by any Covenant, may equally release the performance of it, whether it was sworn to, or not. In the same manner we are to judge from the Nature of Covenants, whether an Act undertaken contrary to Oath be only unlawful, or whether it be likewise void and ineffectual³. For unless the Swearer did by his Promise divest himself of his Right, and confer it on another, though he afterwards give the thing to a third Person, yet the Act shall be valid. If a Man, for Instance, hath sworn that he will leave such a thing in Legacy to any Party, and afterwards sells it to another Party, the Sale shall not be void, though the Seller is perjur'd⁴. Thus if a Person, who, in the Life-time of his Parents, hath promis'd them upon Oath that he will never marry such a particular Woman, shall nevertheless after their Decease take her for his Wife; the Man indeed will be guilty of Perjury, but the Marriage shall stand good and firm, unless the municipal Laws ordain the contrary. Farther, an Oath added to a Promise or Pact shall derive its Force and Efficacy either from natural or

from civil Law, according to the Nature of that Promise or Pact. For the Oath hath not in itself a Power of causing that which otherwise produced only a natural Obligation, to produce likewise a civil; unless the municipal Laws interpose particularly in the Matter. As neither can it change the Species of an Act: A bare Donation, for instance, cannot by the addition of an Oath be turned into a chargeable Contract, nor vice versa. And here we fall in with the common Question, Whether a Contract confirm'd by Oath, in which the swearing Party is remarkably prejudiced, may be revers'd, and the Party restor'd in full to what he lost? Grotius^a takes the negative Part, adding for a Reason, That although, in this Case, we may perhaps owe the Man nothing, or however less than is required, yet we are bound to perform our Oath to God: Which Argument we just now consider'd and reject'd. The Expounders of the Roman Law handle the same Question at large in their Observations upon Lib. ii. tit. 28. C. Si adversus vendit. and the Authentick subjoin'd: which many Civilians, and especially those of the French Nation, censure as unjust. To the Rescript of Alexander they answer³, That it doth by no means contain a general Decision, but was directed wholly to a particular Case. For the matter stood thus: The Emperor was petition'd here by a Soldier, who must consequently be a Man of ripe Judgment, being in his eighteenth Year; and yet he alledg'd no extraordinary Loss or Damage, but only his Defect of Age. Now the Contract, which this Person had made and confirm'd by an Oath, that religious Prince would on no account evacuate: and his pious Caution had no less a Precedent than Hercules himself; who, as the Historian^b reports, never swore but once in his Life. And then as for the Authentick, they say it was extorted by Force from the Emperor Frederick by Pope Honorius III. who refus'd to grant him his Imperial Crown on any other Terms: and that Frederick had resolv'd to alter it, but was prevented by Death. The Reason why⁴ the Pope should insist on obtaining that Decree, is easy to be discover'd by all those who are acquainted with the Policy of the Roman Court^c. We, for our Parts, must think it necessary to the clear Determination of the Point, first of all to observe, that those Pacts, in which there appears a very considerable Inequality, those which depend on any Deceit, Fraud, or unjust Fright, and those which are struck without Thought and Deliberation, have all of them a natural and intrinsic Defect, and are therefore such as the Law of Nature enjoins should be either revers'd, or corrected. But that the Party's being under the Age of Five and Twenty, is not sufficient of itself to render the Covenant defective. Tho' thus much indeed may fairly be presum'd, that the Minor had suffer'd some Damage in the Transaction, on account of his weak and unexperienc'd Judgment, which lays him open to the Circumvention and Treachery of others. But if there appears no such Damage, no Reason can be given why the Act should be disannul'd. This being premiss'd, we affirm, that if a Covenant or Promise made under Oath be in no other respect faulty, it cannot be revers'd on this bare Score, that it was made by a Minor, provided he was capable of understanding the Business in Hand. But if the other Party was guilty of any Deceit; or if, without any such Deceit, the Minor happens to suffer any signal Prejudice, only through Infirmity of Age, the Oath shall not hinder him from petitioning either to have the Bargain revers'd, or at least amended to his Advantage. For in this Case, the Youth, who swears to the Contract, supposes it to be free from all Defect, and the other Party pretends as much. This then is, as it were, the Condition on which his Oath is founded, and upon failure of which it comes to nothing. The Case is different, if a Youth, without any Deceit in the Person with whom he deals, hath knowingly and deliberately given more than the Purchase was worth. For then the Business was a mix'd Act, made up partly of a Contract, and partly of a Donation. It is unnecessary to add, as a general Remark, that a Person subject to the Power and Authority of another, cannot oblige himself farther than he is by that Authority allow'd^d. If he exceed these Bounds, the Governour may, if he thinks fit, declare the Business to be void, whether sworn to, or not.

XII. Yet in as much as Oaths are made by the Invocation of the Divine Majesty, whom no Man can fraudulently deceive, and whom no Man can securely mock and deride, they ought to be allow'd this Effect; that, on their account, all Tricks and Cavils shall be excluded from every Business which they are added to confirm^e. Hence the Roman Censors justly condemn'd the Subtilty of that Captive; who having obtain'd leave to depart from the Enemy's Camp, giving his Oath to return, when he was got a little way, slept back, on the Pretence of having left something behind him, and then fix'd himself at Rome, as if he had fulfill'd what he swore². The Fallacy of Dercyllides deserves a Censure no less severe; who besieging the Tyrant of Scepsis, solemnly swore to him, That if he would come out to a Parly, he should immediately return into the City. The Tyrant coming out on his Promise, Dercyllides commanded him, on Pain of Death, to set open the Gates, and then told him, Now I give you leave to return into the City, and I intend too with my Army to bear you Company^e. For Fraud, as

Mr. BARB. NOTES on §. XI, XII.

Tully observes^a, doth not loosen Perjury, but bind it stronger than before. Thus Harry Stephens, in his preliminary Treatise to his Apology for Herodotus^b, is very pleasant on the common Sophism of the Tradesmen, when they swear they cannot afford a Thing under such or such a Price, unless they design to lose by it; observing that in this Conduct they have always an Eye to the Proverb, A Tradesman loses when he doth not get. I know not whether we are to rank under this Head the Act of the Count de la Fontain, who in the Battle at Rocroy was carried in a Chair; having bound himself by Oath, Never to fight against the French on Foot, or on Horseback^c. Or that of Pope Alexander VII. who having, at his Admission to the Papal Dignity, sworn that he would never receive his Kinsmen in Rome (di non ricevere i suoi parenti in Roma) by the Advice of the Jesuits made use of this Evasion; he receiv'd his Relations first at the Castle of Gandolf, and then brought them with him into the City^d. Or what Tavernier reports^e of the Dutch Agents of their East-Indian Company; who, before they leave Holland, engage themselves by Oath never to drive any Trade on their own private Account, but to rest satisfy'd with the Salary allow'd them by the Publick. Yet when they once arrive at the Indies, many of them marry, and suffer their Wives to carry on that forbidden and clandestine Traffick. 'Tis a barbarous Story, which Ælian^f tells of Cleomenes the Spartan, that making Archonides privy to his Design on the Kingdom, he swore to him, If his Enterprize succeeded, πάντα σὺν τῇ αὐτοῦ κεφαλῇ πράττειν, that he would do nothing without his Head. But having secured the Government, he cut off his Friend's Head, and kept it in a Vessel of Honey, and before he undertook any Business turn'd towards the Vessel, and declar'd his Resolutions. Aryandes, in Polyænus^g, treating with the Buceans, brought their Commissioners to a Trench, which he had contriv'd for that Purpose, lightly cover'd with Earth and Wood, and there swore to them, That he would observe the Articles of Agreement, as long as the Earth continued. And presently after throwing down the Trap, rush'd upon the City, when under no Suspicion of Violence^h. To the same Case belongs the common Instance of two Rogues; one of which steals a thing, and the other hides it; the former swearing that he hath it not, the latter, that he did not take it; who are both to be judg'd guilty of Perjury. It was a most gross Evasion of the Turkish Emperor Solymán, when having sworn toⁱ Ibrahim Bassa, that he would never hurt him while he liv'd, he order'd him to be kill'd in his Sleep, as if he were not then to be reckon'd amongst the Living. On the other hand, the Antients extol the Constancy of Q. Metellus Numidicus^j, for refusing to swear to the Law proposed by Saturninus; though Marius the Consul, and others, endeavour'd to persuade him to a Compliance, by telling him, That the present Necessities of the Commonwealth would justify him in taking the Oath, and that he might decline the Force of it by this secret Reserve, That he swore to the Law, provided it were a Law; that is, if it were duly propos'd and enacted. Whereas it would be easy for him afterwards to shew, that it was indeed no Law, being made in the time of Thunder, when, by the Rites of their Religion, they were forbidden to transact any Business in the Assemblies of the People. Yet that good Man chose rather to go into Banishment, than to make use of this shift; knowing that when Persons swore to a Law, they must, at least in Pretence and Appearance, acknowledge the manner of its Enactment to be right and true. But we think Lycurgus to have been over solicitous, when he order'd his Ashes to be thrown into the Sea, for fear, if they shuld be brought to Sparta, the People should fancy their Oath to expite, by which they had bound themselves not to repeal his Laws, 'till he should return home. For the bringing back of a dead Body can with no Propriety be look'd on as the Return of the Person to whom it belongs^k.

XIII. Yet on the other side, the interpretation of Oaths is not always to be extended, but sometimes to be made in the closest and narrowest Sense, if the Subject Matter seem to require it^l; as suppose we swore to the Prejudice of another, and confirm'd in this solemn manner not Promises, but Threats, which are not in themselves capable of conferring any Right on another^m; the common Instance of which Case is the Example of the Israelites in Judges xxi. who having sworn not to give their Daughters to the Benjamites, afterwards persuaded them to steal themselves Wives, and interceded for them with the Virgins Fathers. For 'tis one thing to give, and another thing not to resume what hath

^l It is certain, that we ought to restrain the Sense of the Words of an Oath, as the Nature of the thing requires, but that is not peculiar to an Oath, single Promises and Agreements necessarily require it. As for the Examples which our Author alledges, they have most of them a shew of Subtily, either wicked, or unprofitable and superstitious. It is not sufficient to give the Words of an Oath a Sense that may rigorously be put upon them; we must also see, if in the Circumstances in which they were pronounced that Sense is suitable, and agrees with the Intention of him that swears, and him to whom the Oath is made. If it be not so, and the Sense in which the Terms are taken contains nothing that can render it null, I don't know how any can secure themselves from Perjury by putting another Sense upon them, which was not thought on in taking the Oath; but if in following the Sense which was in view when the Oath was taken, the Oath is null in itself, we ought not to put another Sense upon the Words, tho' they are capable of it, and we may without scruple dispense with keeping a like Oath in any manner. See Mr. Titius's Observ. 273. who sends us to Mr. Thomasius's Instit. Jurispr. Divin. l. ii. c. 8. §. 50, &c. where he maintains the same thing against our Author, as I have seen my self since the first Edition of that Work, but 'tis the eleventh and not the eighth Chapter. I shall speak something of each of these Examples in particular in the following Notes.

been forcibly taken². And there was the more Reason for insisting thus closely on the Words of the Oath, because it had been Cruelty to extinguish a whole Tribe³, though for the most heinous Offence: and perhaps they had in their Oaths excepted this very Case⁴. In Ammianus Marcellinus^b, Athanasius the Gothick Judge and Commissioner for the Treaty of Peace, alledging, that he was bound by a dreadful Curse, and by the Commands of his Father, “ Never to tread upon the Roman Ground, and no Arguments proving sufficient to move him to the contrary; it being likewise dishonourable for the Emperor to pass over to him; the wise Heads found out this Expedient, to have the Emperor and the Judge meet in their Boats about the midst of the River (the Danube) and thence to settle the Articles of Agreement between their People on both sides⁵. So when the Romans, in Livy^c, requir’d the Achæans to repeal some Decrees which they had made, the latter urg’d in their own Excuse, That they were engaged by Oath not to do it. But Appius, the Roman Commissioner in the Affair, telling them, he would by all means advise them to undertake that willingly, which otherwise they would be brought to by Compulsion: They were so terrified, as only to request, That the Romans would give themselves the trouble of making what Alterations they thought fit, and not bring the Achæans under the Curse of Perjury. Here, we see, they look’d on the Case of not opposing a formidable Superior in cancelling the Laws, to be different from that⁵ of repealing them by their own free Act. Thus Agamemnon, in Euripides, refuseth to punish Polymnestor of Thrace^d, in regard that he was the Friend and Allie of the Grecians^e, yet he promiseth Hecuba not to hinder her from taking any Revenge on him by her own Force, and on her own Account^e. Thus the knavish Servant in Terence^f, begging the Maid to take the Child which he had in his Arms, and to lay it at his Master’s Door, being demanded, why he could not do’t without Assistance? answers, Because if my Master makes me swear that I did not lay it here by my self, I may do it with a safe Conscience. But Darius was in our Opinion but a very poor Casuisit; it being in this respect the same, to perform a thing by one’s self, or by another. The Emperor Aurelian, when he found the Gates of Thyan shut, swore in a Rage, That he would not leave in it one Dog alive^g. Alexander the Great having resolv’d to destroy the City Lampsacus, when Anaximenes came to petition him on the Behalf of the City, immediately swore, He would do nothing which Anaximenes should desire. Anaximenes took the advantage of the Oath, and desir’d him to destroy Lampsacus^h. Antigonus, on account of a strange Dream which he hadⁱ, fully designing to kill Mitridates; and discovering the Matter to his Son Demetrius, after he had forced him to swear that he would never speak of it; Demetrius being concern’d for the Life of the young Prince, took him once aside from

² But as Mr. Vander Muelen has also observed in his Comment upon Gratius, Tom. ii. p. 472. if at the time that the Israelites swore, they had been demanded what they meant by not giving their Daughters in Marriage, could they sincerely say, that they intended thereby to hinder them from taking them; and the rather, because without any prejudice to their Oath they were free to advise the Benjamites to have recourse to such an Expedient, and afterwards to intercede for them to the Fathers of the Virgins they had taken away? We may add, that these sort of Oaths, which give no Right to any Person, are properly speaking, Vows. Now what assurance can we have that God accepts them? And on the contrary ought we not to suppose that he rejects them, since they only proceed from a principle of Hatred and Animosity? In a word, all minatory Oaths have two essential Marks which render them null; the first is, That so long as there is any Knowledge of them in the Person against whom any thing is threatened to be done, or not, he always hopes that they’ll not be performed; the other is, That these sort of Oaths are always made rashly and without Consideration; for they either proceed from Hatred next to Madness, or arise from such a Motion of Choler, as causes a menacing with an Oath of such as we are not angry with, because we love them, and would make them sensible that they have committed things that have provoked our Indignation. In all these Cases we ought to beg God’s Mercy for those unwarrantable Passions with which we have suffered our selves to be transported, and for the Rashness we have been guilty of in using his Holy Name, as if he ought to authorize our Passions and Weaknesses; but we are not obliged to keep such Oaths, and we often sin much more in executing our Threatnings with Rigour.

³ Mr. La Placette, in his Treatise of an Oath, l. ii. c. 9. maintains, That it is impossible to prove with the least Solidity, that these Oaths are evil. “ There was indeed, says he, a great deal of Severity in this Treatment; but we must also own, that it was deserved. This Decision certainly is not moderate, if we consider the Nature of the Thing determined, for it authorizes an Action very harsh, or rather extremely cruel; but as to the Decision it self, it seems to me, that to qualify it singly with Moderation is a Term very sweet and pleasing. It is not necessary that I should prove this, but send the Reader to the History it self, and to Mr. Le Clerc’s Commentary upon it.

⁶ In this Example there is no Oath, and the Explication of Agamemnon’s Words helps not the Matter.

⁸ As the Proposition of Etearbus was wicked, it is clear that Themison’s Oath was null, and that he ought not to keep it in the Sense that the Tyrant took the Words, as also that he did wrong in putting the Virgin into the Sea, although he resolv’d to pull her out again; for he could not be sure that the Cords would not break, or that he should not do her some Mischief in throwing her into the Sea.

the Company, and saying nothing to him⁹, only wrote with his Javelin in the Dust, so as to be observ'd by him, Fly, Mithridates^a. To the same Head belongs that Instance which Sueton^b gives of Cesar's great Clemency of Nature; That having sworn to crucify the Pirates by whom he had been taken, he orders them first to be strangled, and then fastned to the Cross. Of the like kind was David's Oath of Safety to Shimei, 2 Sam. xix. 23. notwithstanding which, on his Death-bed he commands Solomon to take due Care that such a wicked Rebel should not die a peaceable Death, 1 Kings ii. 9. For David's Promise of Pardon was made only in his own Name. Nor did he here properly enjoin Solomon, that he should drag the Man to Punishment for his old Crime, but only that he should diligently watch so notorious a Villain, and by no means spare him, if taken in a second Fault. And Solomon acted with great Wisdom^c, in obliging so turbulent and so implacable an Offender to live in the Royal City under his Eye, for fear he should engage in new Treasons, threatening him with Death upon his Disobedience in this Particular; which Condition Shimei himself gladly approved of, and accepted. Nor did it fall out without the special Direction of Providence, that being caught transgressing this Command, he suffer'd the just Reward of his former, as well as of his present Guilt. Add Montaign's Ess. l. i. c. 7. Perhaps we ought to allow a Place under this favourable Head to the Action of Mary Queen of Hungary, Wife to the Emperor Sigismund, who having promised Indemnity to Hervatus, Governor of Croatia, by whom she had been taken, and very hardly used; upon the Recovery of her Liberty is said to have put her Husband upon revenging the Injury; alledging, That she had no Power to engage for him, though she might for her self. Bonfin. Rer. Hungar. l. iii. c. 2. I know not whether we may put in the same rank the Act of Timoleon recorded by Polyanus; he was engaged in Pursuit of Milarchus^d the Tyrant, an impious Wretch, who had cheated many Persons out of their Lives, by swearing to preserve them, and afterwards despising his Oath. The Tyrant made an Overture of coming in Person to Syracuse to take his Tryal, provided Timoleon would not be his Accuser: Timoleon swore he would not; and on these Terms Milarchus came to Syracuse: Timoleon bringing him into the open Assembly, address'd him in the following manner, I will not accuse you, for so I covenanted beforehand; but I'll command you instantly to be executed: for he who hath deceiv'd so many to their Ruin, may justly be thus deceiv'd himself.

XIV. In like manner an Oath doth not exclude any tacit Conditions or Limitations properly arising from the Nature of the Subject. As suppose I have given a Person his Option to desire of me whatever he pleas'd; if his Request shall be either unjust, or absurd, I am not tied by my Engagement. For he that makes an indefinite Grant to another, before he knows what he will ask, presupposeth that the other Party will petition for what is honest, what is morally possible, what is not ridiculous, and what is not mischievous either to himself, or to any besides^e. 'Twas a good Caution of Phœbus to his rash Son,

*Ne dubita, dabitur (Stygias juravimus undas)
Quodcumque optâris; sed tu sapientius opta*^e.

I've sworn by Styx, doubt not, I'll not refuse Whate'er you ask; but with more Wisdom chuse.

Such a Case as this gave occasion to that noted Saying of Hippolytus in Euripides^f, which Tully so much commends, ἡ γλῶσσο' ὀμῶμοζ', ἡ δὲ φρήν ἀνώμοτος, My Tongue hath sworn, my Mind unsworn remains. For it seems he had sworn to the Nurse, that he would keep secret whatever she discover'd to him. But when she made a Proposal of Adultery and Incest with his Mother in Law Phœdra, he denies that his Oath oblig'd him to conceal so foul a Villany. Though the Poet makes him so scrupulous as to recede from this Judgment, and to keep close the Matter in regard to his Oath. Nicomachus in Quintus Curtius^g makes the same Exception, *resolutely denying that he had given his Oath in confirmation of the Parricide, or that any tie of Religion should be able to hinder him from declaring so barbarous a Treason*². For it is indeed one Part of the Duty and Obligation of a Subject, not to hide any Designs that he shall observe to be carrying on against the Person or the Government of his Prince. So Tully (Offic. 1.) It may so happen, that the performance of a Promise or an Engagement should be prejudicial to the Party to whom it was made. For if Neptune, as we have it in the Story, had not made good what he promised to Theseus upon Oath, Theseus had not lost his Son Hippolytus. The Death of his Son being one of the three Wishes, which, in his Passion, he put up to Neptune. (Comp. Euripid. Hippolyt. Coron. ver. 315.) These Promises therefore are not to be kept, which would be hurtful to the Persons, whom in promising you design'd to serve. Add Diod. Sic. l. iv. c. 65. And thus too Herod ought not to have sold the Head of John the Baptist to his Daughter in Law for a Dance; because, since there can lie no Obligation to what is unlawful; in such a general Promise this Condition ought to have been understood, If the desir'd any thing which he might lawfully perform^a. We find King Solomon not adhering to his indefinite Grant, when his Mother ask'd a Favour which was likely to turn to the prejudice of his Government^b, 1 Kings ii. 20, &c. There is a very remarkable Story in Diodorus Siculus^c, which bears some relation to the Point now under Debate: "Xerxes being warmly engag'd in prosecuting a new Expedition against Greece, desired Themistocles, who was then in his Court, to be his Guide and Director in the War. Themistocles consented, upon condition the King would swear, never to attack the Grecians without him. A Bull being sacrific'd, and the Oath taken with the usual Solemnity, Themistocles took a Cup of the Blood, and drinking it off, immediately expired." And by this means diverted Xerxes from his Resolution. But here, if Xerxes had no other Reason to alter his Purpose, he need not have been deter'd by his Oath, in which Themistocles's Life was a Condition suppos'd; it being no more than if he had promis'd that Grecian Captain never to undertake any thing against his Countrymen, whilst he liv'd, without his Counsel and Assistance. So that upon his Death the force and virtue of the Oath died with him^d.

⁹ This Expedient was superfluous, and could not have preserved Demetrius from Perjury, if the Oath had been valid. But every one is indispensibly oblig'd, as much as in him lies, to avert the Evil from others with which they are threat'ned unjustly. So that Demetrius might without any Evasion have delivered Mithridates from the Danger he was in. All that Mr. de Saey has spoken in his Treatise of Friendship, p. 110, &c. upon the Question, Whether a Man may break his Oath to discover to his Friend a Secret of that Nature, that he hazards his Life if he hides it from him? All, I say, that this ingenious Author has said upon this Subject, taking the Negative part, is void and of no Force. The Reasons which he himself alledges for the Affirmative are sufficient to show that his Determination is extremely wrong.

XV. Although the Invocation of the Divine Name in Oaths is to be adjusted according to the Persuasion of the Person who swears, yet the whole Proposition shall bear that Sense which he who requires the Oath protesteth to understand it in^e. For 'tis on his account chiefly that the Oath is taken, and not on the Swearer's: And therefore it belongs to him too, to settle the Form of Words; and he ought to do this so plainly and clearly, as both to signify how he understands them himself, and to bring the Swearer to acknowledge that he apprehends his Meaning. And to conclude the Business, the Swearer is to pronounce the same Words openly and distinctly, so as to leave no possible room for Cavil or Evasion. Therefore, those Wretches whom Tacitus speaks of^d, in vain declined to attempt the Guilt of Perjury, when being conscious to themselves of the Wickedness with which they were charg'd, they trembled and faulter'd in their Oath, changing the Words with much Artifice and Slight. So Ulysses and Dio-medes in Diſtis Cretensis^e, like true Masters of Sophistry and Guile, swore to the Trojans, That they would stand by the Agreement they had settled with Antenor: By which Agreement they meant the Articles for betraying the City, which Antenor and they had adjusted. As for that Form us'd in administering Oaths amongst the Romans, ex animi sui sententia, according to their Judgment and Opinion, it is not so to be expounded, as if Oaths receiv'd all their Force and Validity from the Notion which Men form'd of them in their Mind; but to shew, that those who swore ought to perform so solemn an Act in the most serious Manner, and with the most real Intentions^f, not in the way of Dissimulation, of Fiction, or of Sport. This too was an usual Form of the Questions put by the Censors; as for Instance, Ex animi tui sententia habes uxorem? Have you a Wife according to your real Mind? Which a Roman Knight once answering with this cavilling Jest, I have a Wife, according to my Mind, not according to your Mind, incur'd the Penalty of a Fine for his indiscreet Wit. Cicero, in his Academical^g Questions, endeavouring to prove that human Knowledge can reach no higher than Probabilities, in a very elegant manner alledgeth this and other the like Customs as Proofs of what he asserts. This is evident, says he, in the diligent Caution of our Ancestors, who first required Men to swear only according to the best of their Judgment; and then told to the Party who took the Oath, that he should be rendred guilty by it, only, if he knowingly deceiv'd. As likewise, when they order'd a Witness to say no more than that he thought such or such a Matter, though perhaps he had seen it with his Eyes; and pronounc'd a Fact which the sworn Judges had examin'd and determin'd, not to be, but only to seem, or to appear thus or thus. 'Tis Remark of the same Author^h, That what is sworn agreeable to the Mind and Intention of him who requires the Oath, ought strictly to be perform'd; but what is not, may without Perjury be omitted; that

Mr. BARB. NOTES on §. XIV, XV.

¹ Our Author quotes this from his Memory, and does not tell us where he had it. He has it from Aulus Gellius, where he of whom he speaks was not a Roman Knight, but a captious Fellow. Moreover, the last Edition of Mr. Gronovius reviewed by the MSS. relates the Jest after a different manner, so that it had nothing offensive for the Censor to punish; for he that made this unseasonable Jest, said only, that he had a good Wife, but not to his Humour; for his Answer was, Habeo equidem, inquit, uxorem, sed non herede ex animi mei sententia. Vid. Cicero de Orat. l. ii. c. 64. & Just. Lipsius Var. Lect. l. i. c. 1. In fine, a famous Lawyer very unfitly concludes from this Passage of A. Gellius, That Women were subject to the Reproof of the Censors. See Mr. Thomasius's Discourse, De Judicio seu Censura morum, c. 2. §. 12, &c.

² Cicero's Latin is, Quod enim ita juratum est, ut mens conciperet fieri oportere, id servandum est; quod aliter, id si non feceris, nullum est perjurium. — Non enim falsum jurare, perjurare est: sed quod ex animi tui sententia juraris, sicut verbis concipitur more nostro, id non facere perjurium est. Grotius, and our Author have followed the ordinary Editions in the first Words, which import, ut mens deferentis conciperet fieri oportere. But seeing the Manuscripts acknowledge the Word deferentis, which is not there, as Aldus Manutius testifies, the sequel of the Discourse shews plain enough, as I think, that it is a Gloss which has been thrust into the Text by some body that did not attend to Cicero's Reasoning. The Example which is found in the following Words, will not permit us to doubt but that he treats of him that swears, and not of him that imposeth the Oath. A Corsaire without doubt intends to pay what he has promised with an Oath, or why doth he swear? 'Tis then mens jurantis, and not mens deferentis, in this place.

is, if a Man happens to misunderstand the Party who puts him to his Oath, so as to swear in a different Sense from what the other conceives, he is not perjurd by Non-performance. For since the other Person had a contrary Meaning, he must be suppos'd not to have accepted of this Proposal made upon Oath by the Juror; and without Acceptance there ariseth no Obligation from a Promise. For it is not, as Tully goes on, always Perjury to swear what is false; that is, to assert by Oath thro' some Mistake what is really otherwise; but you are then perjurd, when you fail in making good what you swore, ex animi tui sententia (as the Form is in our common Practice) according to your real Sentiments and Persuasion.

XVI. It hath been a Dispute amongst some of our modern Casuists, whether an Oath could be taken by Proxy¹; that is, whether one Man could in the Place and in the Name of another take an Oath which should bind the absent Party? On which Point our Judgment is this: As a Person may in his Absence contract an Obligation, since Consent may as well be signify'd in Writing, as viva voce; so there seems no Reason why an Oath likewise may not be express'd in the same manner. Which, after it hath been once solemnly recited, shall as fully oblige, as if the Party were there present, and had taken it by word of Mouth. Yet before it hath been rehears'd in this solemn Manner, it seems allowable to revoke it; so that a Person who retracts an Attestation which he made upon Oath at a Distance, before it be convey'd to the Place for which it was design'd, ought not to be look'd on as perjurd. But in the common Proceedings of Courts in this Affair, there seems to be somewhat not very proper or convenient, as that the Proctors who read the Instrument, use such a Posture and Ceremony, as if they were to swear in their own Name, and that, for fear they should seem to be themselves obliged, they change the concluding Clause of the Oath after this manner, So help him God. Whereas it might be sufficient barely to recite the Oath of the absent Party, as it lies in the Writing. However, since it hath been with good Reason, the receiv'd Custom of most Nations to render Oaths more sacred and august by the Ceremonies of Religion, and by some Sign of Devotion, to set the Awe and Reverence of the Divine Majesty more sensibly before the Eyes of the Juror, as by Sacrifice, by approaching to the Altar, and the like Acts of Worship; therefore we are of Opinion, that if the Matter be of very important Concern, the absent Party ought to be put to his Oath with the usual Solemnity, in the place where he lives; especially since the Case requires a *corporal Oath*²; which Name we cannot give to an Oath express'd and convey'd in the manner we before describ'd. For it is much more to invoke God as a Witness, in the midst of those sacred Rites; which, not without some kind of pious Horror, signify the Divine Presence; than to write so many Words on Paper, which never blusheth. And 'tis a material Consideration, that Evidences thus given in Writing at a distance, are by the Lawyers themselves term'd *Testimonia caca*³, Blind Testimonies.

XVII. Lastly, It is a Question usually discuss'd on this Head, Whether or no, and how far an Heir is bound by the Oaths of the Person to whom he succeeds? In which Case this is certain, that if by such an Oath some other Party obtain'd a perfect Right, which ought to be satisfy'd either in whole or in part out of the Goods of the deceas'd; then the Heir is oblig'd to see it fulfill'd: Since this Burthen or Debt inhering in the Possession, passeth to him with it. But when the Oath hath given no one a perfect Right, and the Obligation itself was founded barely in the Piety, Fidelity, or Constancy of the Juror, then it's plain that the Heir doth not stand bound, inasmuch as he doth not represent another, as to those Obligations which terminate ultimately and solely in the Person deceas'd. Thus, for Instance, if a Man hath sworn or vow'd with an Oath, That he will fast once every Week; that he will continue in Celibacy five Years; or, that he will undertake a Pilgrimage to the Holy Land; if he die before he hath fulfill'd his Engagement, his Heir shall by no means be tied to perform it. But the Case is different, if a Person hath been Heir expressly under such a Condition. So likewise, if a Man hath sworn to give an Hundred Pounds yearly to the Poor for Ten Years to come; and dies before the time is expir'd, his Heir shall be free from the Obligation; unless the former Grant confer'd on certain Persons a Right of demanding the said Sum. For he who makes a Promise, and doth not withal give the Party a Right of challenging it as his Due, intends to engage his own Word only, and not his Estate; and therefore upon his Decease the Obligation shall not in the least affect his Possessions, or his Heir, unless an especial Injunction to that Purpose were added in the Will. Gravius^b observes farther, That if such a Promise confirm'd by Oath was in some respect faulty, so as to produce a Right, not in regard of Man, but of God only, then the Heir shall not be charg'd with the Performance. Which we allow, if it be suppos'd that the Party who swore, resolv'd either out of a Point of Honour, or a Scruple of Conscience, to fulfil such a defective Oath, which he might, if he pleas'd, have utterly evacuated, by alledging some Deceit, or some Fear unlawfully caus'd. For otherwise the Question is insignificant; we having above shewn that the Ju-

MR. BARB. NOTES on §. XVI.

¹ Our Modern Law calls it, Jurare in animam alterius. Mr. Hertius recites here a Passage out of a Letter of William the Good King of Sicily to Henry II. King of England, written A. D. 1176, where that Prince says, That all his Time it has been a Custom in his Realm and among his Ancestors, not to swear himself, but it is all one to lift up our Hand, or cause another to lift up his Hand for us in our presence. Quum unum & idem putemus Sacramentum, quod vel manu propria fit, vel in anima jubentis & presentis juratur. That the Antient Romans sometimes swore after this manner, appears by an Example which Mr. Hertius alledges of an Oath which Anthony made to Pompey by the Ambassadors he sent to him. Dion. Hist. Lib. xlix. Tit. Livius also tells us, That C. Valerius Flaccus not being able to swear himself, his Brother L. Valerius Flaccus swore for him by the allowance of the Senate and People, who esteem'd such an Oath good, and for the advantage of him for whom it was made. Plebeiq; scivit, ut perinde esset, ac si ipse Aedilis jurasset, Lib. xxxi. c. 50. & ult. See what the Expositors of the Civil and Canon Laws say about Oaths taken by a Proxy.

² Juramentum Corporale, or, as it is called in the Code, Juramentum corporaliter praestitutum. See the Law cited about this Matter, § 11. n. 3. and l. ii. tit. 43. Si minor se majorem, &c. leg. 3. in fin. 'Tis an Oath that a Man takes himself with the ordinary Formalities.

ror himself is not in this Case effectually oblig'd. But what if the Heir neglects to perform a Promise or Covenant under Oath made by the deceased, doth he hereby contract the Guilt of Perjury? It seems reasonable to answer in the Negative. For that which in strict Speech we call an Oath, or the Invocation of the Divine Vengeance super-added to a common Engagement, passeth no farther than the Person of him who swears¹. Since we cannot say that the Heir put a Slight on the Reverence due to the Divine Majesty, because it was not he who call'd God to Witness: And therefore he shall be chargeable only with breach of Trust. It alters the Matter, if the Oath were taken by a whole People: It being the Judgment of many, that a People, whilst they remain such, are by their publick Oaths put under perpetual Obligation. Which Opinion nevertheless seems to us not altogether clear and decisive: For an Oath and the breach of it affects only the natural Will, or the Will of particular Men, and reacheth the compound Body, or moral Person, only by Communication from each Individual. The People therefore, as a moral Person, cannot invoke the Wrath of God upon themselves; but this is done by those single natural Persons, of whom the Community was made up. And consequently upon the violation of a Promise or Pact made by Oath in the Name of the State, those Persons only shall be guilty of Perjury, who corporally swore to the Business, if they are now consenting to the Omision of it; but the rest shall be only branded with the Mark of ordinary Perfidiousness². And for this Reason we should be unwilling to accuse the Spartans of Perjury, in receding, after so many Ages, from Lycurgus's Institutions: Or, the Romans, in case they had invested the Cesars with the Title of Kings, notwithstanding the Oath which Brutus of old impos'd on the People to the contrary. Which will appear yet more evidently, if we consider, that this Oath contrer'd a Right on no Person; but the Design of the Romans in it was only to lay a Restraint on the Liberty of their Will, that they might not think of restoring that Form of Government, which had prov'd so unfortunate to them. By which means they might indeed bind themselves, never to let up a Monarchy in Rome; at least, so long as the publick Safety could be preserv'd without it. For in this case the very Persons, who took the Oath, must be supposed to be releas'd from it; because then the Necessities of the State, which is conceiv'd incapable of subsisting without a single Governour, render the Matter or Subject of the Oath unlawful. But their Posterity, unless they repeated the Oath, could not be tied by it; as well because their Ancestors had no Authority thus to impose arbitrarily upon them, as because the Consent of Posterity was wanting, as at present we suppose. Nor is it any Argument to the contrary to urge, that a Nation is reckon'd the same, tho' the particular Members who compos'd it are all chang'd: And that therefore the Acts of past Generations seem justly enough to be attributed to the present. For the Acts of former Ages can then only be imputed to the latter, when some other Parry obtain'd any Right as the necessary Consequence of those Acts. But in such things as result to the whole Body from the Actions of particular Members, the Descendents in a People do not always represent the Progenitors. As, tho' a People have been heretofore eminent for martial Glory, yet their lazy and degenerate Race can claim no Share in their Triumph, or in their Fame. Yet still the

Mr. BARB. NOTES on §. XVII.

² Mr. Hortius declares here against the Notion of our Author, and much depends upon the Authority of Grotius, which yet seems to make nothing for him. For this great Man, treating upon the Agreements made with rebellious Subjects, says, Lib. iii. c. 19. §. 8. n. 1. "That they may be confirmed by Oath, not only by the King and Senate, but also by the Body of the State, as Lycurgus and Solon made, the one the Lacedemonians, the other the Athenians, to swear to observe their Laws; and, THAT THEIR OATH MIGHT NOT LOSE ITS FORCE BY ANY CHANGE OF PERSONS, they order'd it to be renew'd every Year. In this Case, says Grotius, we can't break our Word, when the Publick Good requires it; for the Estate may recede from its Right, and the Terms of the Treaty may be so clear as to admit of no Exception." Either I am much mistaken, or these Words suppose the clear contrary to what Mr. Hortius infers from them, as appears from those Words which I have written in Capital Letters, especially if we compare them with the following Places of the same Author, viz. Gr. l. ii. c. 13. §. 17. & l. iii. c. 19. §. 5. In short, Grotius does not speak at all of the Posterity of them with whom the Treaty was concluded, at least, he will have us know, that the Obligation of an Oath has as much force upon Posterity, as the Promise to it annexed. The Reason of Mr. Hortius is no whit stronger. He says, "A People may be sworn, as a People." Be it so, yet the People which is to day, is not the same it was an hundred Years ago; it is only thought so, by reason of the perpetual Succession of New Citizens, who fill up the Place of those who are dead, or have left their Country, and the Continuation of the Government. So that he comes under the real Engagements of his Ancestors, by which he hath acquired a true Right, and which are by Nature perpetual, and not into that which must be looked upon as purely Personal. Now such is the Oath here. In a word, the People that are to day have no other relation to the People that liv'd an hundred Years ago, than an Heir has to a dead Person, whose Promises, confirmed by an Oath (as Mr. Hortius holds) are to be performed, not upon account of the Oath, but upon the account of the Promise. For an Oath is only a thing accidental, a simple Confirmation of an Engagement, which were not less valid without a kind of a religious Formality, which hath no other effect, than to assure him more of our Fidelity, with whom we resolve to keep our Word. The Example which Mr. Hortius brings of the Israelites, who about 150 Years after the Death of Josiah made good what that Patriarch had made their Ancestors to swear, viz. to carry his Bones out of Egypt into the Land of Promise: This Example, I say, proves only, that the Israelites did think themselves obliged to perform the Promise of their Ancestors; But there is nothing that insinuates, that if they had not done it, they had been guilty of Perjury. We may say the same of the Murder of the Gibonites, supposing that Saul did it under a pretence that the Oath of Jehoiada was null. But Mr. Le Clerc has well observ'd, that that Prince had another Pretence. See Jos. xxi, 1. 2. As to Oaths which give no Right to a Person, as when a People having made a Law, swear ever after to observe it, it is clear that these are Vows which have no Force any farther than as we may presume that God accepts them, so that as no Person can oblige himself, but as he judges it for his Advantage, nothing hinders, but that not only Posterity, but the People themselves, who have engaged themselves by Oath to observe a Law, may afterward abrogate it, if they find it prejudicial to the End for which it was established; for that exception is included in all Engagements which concern them only that enter into them, and we may believe that God no farther requires the constant performance of Vows. See Lib. i. c. 6. §. 6. and Lib. iii. c. 6. §. 15. foregoing.

Case would be quite otherwise, if such an Oath as we are speaking of, hath been solemnly renewed by Posterity, each particular Man engaging for himself. But in regard to these publick Obligations, Sophocles's Advice³ might pass for a general Rule;

*Let nothing thus be sworn beyond recall ;
For Men are frail, and human Thoughts will change.*
Antigon. ver. 394.

And 'tis no trivial Remark which Joan. Labardée makes in his History of France^a, That the Leagues of Monarchs are more firm and sacred, than those made by Republicks, or popular Governments: Because when one Person only engageth his Faith, he is struck with a more religious Concern for the Observation of it, than can affect each Man in a Multitude, where every one considers, that but a little of the publick Faith, if any at all, comes to his share; by which Means all are easily induc'd to recede from the common Engagement.

XVIII. The two principal Ends to which Oaths may be, and commonly are applied, are, either to strengthen and confirm a Promise by such a solemn Act of Religion; or to open a way to the clearing some Fact, which is at present doubtful, and cannot be conveniently made out any other way. And 'tis in this Sense we ought to interpret Aristotle's Definition of an Oath, when he styles it¹, an undemonstrable Assertion made with an Appeal to the Divinity; that is, an Asseveration, not demonstrated by any Arguments, but credited purely on account of the Piety and Religion of the Swearer. For when the matter may be prov'd by evident and convincing Reasons, 'tis not fair or regular to have recourse to Oaths. On the other hand, when Oaths are to decide a Cause, no search is made after other Proofs². Why Oaths are admitted only in determining matters of Fact, not matters of Law or Right, is very obvious. For we cannot swear whether a Thing be done well, or ill, but barely whether it were done, or not done. Which being once known, the Court may proceed upon the Points of Right and Law, by infallible Evidences and Rules. As for the Oath which the Judges themselves take, it is not assertory, but promissory; for they engage by it, That they will give Sentence in the Case before them, as Justice and Equity shall direct. And this Division of Oaths into promissory and assertory, may comprehend them all, with regard to the two Ends or Uses but now mention'd.

¹ These sorts of Oaths are either unjust or rash for the most part. To make them innocent, we ought most certainly to know, that the Deed or Omission to which we are obliged, is allowable or innocent; whether it be a thing that depends on us, and is in our Power; and we ought to examine whether it will not bring us into some Danger, though inconsiderable, of offending God, and breaking his Law, and if there be a necessity of Swearing. See the Treatise of Mr. Placette, l. ii. c. 4. & 25.

² The Words of the Law are, Secundum itaque prædictam regulam, qua ubicunque non servari factum lege prohibente censuimus, certum est nec stipulationem hujusmodi tenere, nec mandatum ullius esse momenti, NEC SACRAMENTUM ADMITTI, Cod. l. i. tit. 14. De Legibus, &c. leg. 5. §. 1. See also the Digests, l. ii. c. 14. De Pañis, leg. 7. §. 16. & l. 30. tit. 1. De Legat. leg. 112. §. 4.

³ 'Tis a Maxim of the Canon Law, That every Oath ought to be performed, which can be kept without any Prejudice to our Eternal Salvation. On this account the Engagements of a Woman, the Promises of a Minor, and other Acts which are null by the Civil Law, are valid by the Pope's Sentence, upon the account of the Oath which is join'd with them. See the Decretals, l. ii. tit. 24. De Jurejurando, c. 9. 28. & §. 11. n. 3, 4. above. But Mr. Thomasius observes with reason in his Fundam. Jur. Nat. & Gent. l. ii. c. 9. §. 9, &c. That it is contrary to the Nature of an Oath, which, as our Author sufficiently proves, is only an Accessory to our Engagements, and that the Roman Clergy would by it usurp a Power to correct the Civil Law, and the Sentences of the Judges; as also hinder, that the Promises and Donations made to the Church, should not be weaken'd by such just Exceptions.

XIX. It hath been generally the Custom to make use of promissory Oaths in publick, as well as in private Causes, and perhaps more frequently than was necessary¹. Concerning which Authors have observ'd, That some of them are taken to introduce an Obligation, and are call'd Promissory in Specie: Others are added to confirm some Act already in Being. Which Distinction is not to be understood, as if every Oath were not accessory to another Obligation; but because some Promises include an Oath in the Compass of the same Proposition; as when one says, I swear to do so or so on your Account: Whereas many times the principal Business is express'd in a different Sentence from the Oath which confirms it. Now 'tis rightly observ'd by the Expositors of the Roman Law, and 'tis no more than we have already prov'd, That all Oaths are void which Men apply to strengthen any Business in itself unlawful or vicious², and which tends either to the impairing of the publick Good, or to the Prejudice of a third Person, tho' at the same time there are some sort of Transactions which are of themselves, in civil Cognifance, invalid, and yet are rendred good and effectual by the Addition of an Oath³. The reason of which is, because they are not defective in their own Nature, but only capable of being easily turn'd to the harm of the Party, who thus by swearing to them shews his full Consent and Approbation. For since any Man may wave a Privilege or Favour not design'd for his Benefit, he who thus refuseth to lay hold on the Invalidity of the Affair, and peremptorily proceeds to the confirming it by an Oath, is presum'd to have consider'd very seriously whether it makes for his Interest, or not.

XX. Assertory Oaths, or such as are applied to the Decision of Controversies not to be terminated by other Proofs, are taken either by the Party concern'd in the Business, or by a third Man: Those, who swear to the Facts of others, are term'd Witnesses¹; whose Honesty and Fidelity, unless by some probable Token rendered suspicious, are with Justice allowed a very great Weight and Sway; it being well suppos'd, that no Man of any Religion or Goodness will expose himself to the Divine Vengeance, for the Affair of another Person: Yet is it a wise Constitution in most civil Governments, not lightly to admit Persons to give Evidence in the Cause of others, engag'd to them by nearness of Birth; which is so strong a Motive to Affection and Love : It being consider'd that such Persons might easily suffer their Passion to gain the Ascendant of their Religion². Nor was it altogether without Reason, that the Romans of old requir'd Witnesses of Wealth and Substance, especially in difficult and important Causes³.

XXI. But a Man may likewise in his own Business, when 'tis his Interest to do so, solve the Dispute by Oath, and this either by Agreement of the Parties¹, or by order of the Judge. For when a Controversy ariseth concerning some Due demanded by one Man, and denied by another, the Claimant may challenge the other Party to his Oath, promising to let fall the Suit, if he swears the thing not to be owing which is requir'd: And if the Person thus challeng'd be doubtful whether he can swear clearly and peremptorily to the Matter, as suppose the Debt was transferred to him from another, then he may return the Oath to the Claimant, engaging to pay, if he shall swear it is his Due². And this giving and returning of the Oath between the Parties may be made either in Court, or out of Court; yet with this difference, that out of Court I am not necessarily oblig'd to take the Oath when offer'd me, because it implies a Contract³; by means of which I shall, upon my refusing, become a Debtor. But now no Person, who is not invested with an Authority over me, can compel me to a Contract or Agreement which shall be burthenfome to me⁴. Whereas, in Court, when the Oath is offer'd by one Party, the other shall not decline it, unless upon very weighty Reasons; but shall either take it himself, or return it to his Adversary; that is, when the Judge conceives the Claim not to be groundless, and yet there is no full Evidence of the Matter ready at hand; then if one of the Parties thinks fit to refer the Business to the Conscience of the other, the Judge may fairly lock on him as Convict, who neither dares in this religious manner to deny the Debt, nor yet, in Return, challenge the other to affirm it with the like Solemnity. For this starting and boggling can be attributed to nothing but to his inward Conscience of the Debt; because, if he pretend to fear that Men should think he swears only on the account of Gain, 'tis easy for him to avoid this Suspicion, by returning the Oath to the Claimant⁵. If he is afraid that the other will be perjurd⁶, why doth not he swear himself? Yet Plato in his Laws^a admits of an Oath, only in such Cases, where, according to the Judgment of Men, no Advantage can be got by forswearing; but where any profit may be reap'd from the Perjury, there he orders that the Process shall be manag'd without Oaths.

XXII. And lastly, In some Cases, when other Proofs are not sufficient¹, the Judge may put the Party to his Oath, though he do not desire it; and

³ 'Tis a kind of Transaction say the Roman Lawyers, very well. Jusjurandum speciem transactionis continet, Digest. ubi supra, leg. 2.

⁴ But when we have once accepted an Oath, we can't refer it. Jusjurandum, quod ex conventionione extra judicium desertur, referri non potest, Ibid. leg. 17. And in the very Moment that the Oath is taken, the Controversy is at an end, so that either of the Parties cannot retort; whereas, when an Oath is taken by the order of the Judge, we may require a Review of the former Proceedings, averring, that he hath new Matter to produce, and that he will only insist upon that. Admonendi sumus, interdum etiam post jusjurandum exactum permitti constitutionibus principum, ex integro causam agere, si quis nova instrumenta se invenisse dicat, quibus nunc solis usus sit — Quod si alias inter ipsos jurejurando transactum sit negotium, non conceditur eandem causam retractare, Ibid. leg. 31. See Mr. Titius's Observation on Lauterb. 338.

⁶ This is a nice question, Whether an Oath may be required of a Person, when we have reason to believe that he will swear falsely? We speak not here of a Judge; for as Mr. La Placette speaks very well in his Treatise of an Oath, l. i. c. 13. "The Laws in certain Cases order an Oath to be administer'd, and he must conform himself to them without troubling himself about the manner how they who take the Oath, can do it. They also suppose, without doubt, that some considerable Interest is concerned" This being allow'd, I am of Mr. Thomasius's Opinion, who says, "That this Question is more curious than profitable, Instit. Jurispr. Divin. l. ii. c. 9. For we cannot be certain that any one resolves to forswear himself; for though he have often sworn falsely, he may have repented, and may resolve never again to commit such a foul Crime deliberately; but if he threatens to do it, we may believe, that he does it that we may not put him upon swearing". I may add, That there are Men who are inclinable enough to do great Wickednesses, and yet dare not swear, either through some scruple of Conscience, or through I know not what monstrous pretence of Piety, which they make after their way, tho' they are free, as they think, to accommodate themselves to another's Interest as far as they can without falling into such enormous Crimes as incense the Deity. Further, supposing we may presume, That he, for example, who denies a Debt, or thing trusted, can't be convicted judicially; and he is willing to clear himself by Oath, is it not almost the same thing, as if he had sworn falsely; since he is willing to do it? Mr. La Placette owns, that what such a Person adds to his horrible disposition by actually swearing falsely, is so small a thing as is not to be regarded, yet he determines, that an Oath ought not to be administer'd in such a Case, for fear of provoking God's Anger, and offending our weak Brethren. But the fear of Scandal does not indispensibly require that a Man should lose his Goods without trying all ways possible to recover them, if it be a thing of Consequence, as we suppose here it is. Besides, the Scandal is less, if we declare the Reason why we will have the Party sworn. As to God's Anger, that is not so much excited by the outward Act, as by the inward Disposition, which in this Case is supposed full and entire, and is looked upon as the Act.

¹ In bonæ fidei contractibus, necnon [etiam] in cæteris causis, inopia probationum, per Judicem jurejurando causa cognita res decidi oportet. C. Lib. iv. l. 1. De rebus creditis & jurejurando, Leg. 3. This Law is ordinarily quoted, as if it meant that a Judge may administer an Oath when there is an half proof on the side of one of the Parties, as for Example, but one Witness, who may not be credited, though he be a Senator. But Mr. Noodt has well shewed in his Probabilia Juris, l. iii. c. 6. that inopia probationum, (i. e.) want of Proofs, is when there are such Proofs on both sides, that the Judges know not how to determine. For when a little matter would weigh down the Balance, we ought not rashly to administer an Oath. See Digest. l. xii. tit. 2. leg. 31. where is, in dubiis causis.

this either that he may possess himself of some Right, or clear himself from the Suspicion of some Fact. But here it must be observ'd, that 'tis never the Custom to offer these Oaths, when either capital Punishment, or any grievous Inconvenience, must be the consequence of confessing the Truth. For, besides, that it looks very hard to bring a Man into so dangerous a Necessity on the account of an uncertain Fact, as that he must either deeply wound his Conscience, or incur some very considerable Damage; little Trust is to be given to an Oath thus exacted, the Minds of Men being always ready to entertain this Hope, That God Almighty may again be pleas'd, whose Mercy even the Perjur'd Sinner is not forbidden to implore. 'Tis a good Remark of Libanius ², He who despairs of all other Means, and hath but one Remedy left, which is not to be obtain'd otherwise than by Lying, will certainly dare to change one Danger for another, knowing the present Mischief which is before his Eyes to be unavoidable; but, as for the future Evil, often flattering himself that he shall be able, by Worship, Sacrifices, Gifts and Oblations, to bribe Heaven into a Pardon. But for an account of these several kinds of Oaths, the Writers on the Civil Laws are to be consulted at large ³.

XXIII. In relation to the Breach of Oaths, this Question still remains to be resolv'd, since it is usual in civil Governments to bind Men by Oaths to the faithful discharge of their respective Trusts and Employments, whether he is always to be deem'd guilty of Perjury, who hath neglected any one part of this Duty? Where the Controversy is not about those Oaths which regard some peculiar Act; as, when a Man gives his Evidence, denies a Trust, forsakes a particular Promise, and the like (for he who violates these ought, no doubt, to be branded as forsworn) but about such in which the Party binds himself to many Things together: As when Persons are admitted to any Office, to be discharg'd by different Performances. And here there seems to be no reason why we should scruple to take the Affirmative side, in case the Breach was made against Knowledge, and with deliberate Wickedness. Only, that there are different degrees of Perjury, as well as of other Crimes. For as he is reckon'd less guilty, who hath transgress'd a Law or two, than he who hath at once renounc'd all civil Government, or hath committed Treason against his Prince; so he who hath violated the whole sum of his Duty, contracts a more heinous and aggravating Perjury, than he who hath broken only a part ^a. Nor ought we to give any heed to those Authors, who are of opinion, that Persons in these Circumstances may be absolv'd from the Sin of Perjury, by submitting to the Penalty of the Law. For unless, when the Obligation was first entred upon, it was expressly left to the choice of the Person, either to perform what he promis'd, or at a certain Price to purchase the liberty of doing the contrary ^b, the Punishment shall by no means render him clear from the Crime ^c; as we shall make out more at large hereafter. Thus he who hath suffer'd a Whipping for Thievery, is no less a Rogue ², than if he had never felt the Lash.

XXIV. What is usually canvass'd amongst Authors about the Dispensations, and relaxations of Oaths and of Vows, may be wholly determin'd by the fixing two Principles, or Rules. The first, That a Person, who in regard both to his Actions and his Possessions is under the Government of another, can dispose of nothing to his Governour's Prejudice; and if any such disposal be made, it shall be lawful for the Governour to revoke it. The other is, That he who is invested with such Authority over any Person, may, as he shall think convenient, retrench and confine any Rights, which the Party under his Direction hath already obtain'd; and much more those which he shall obtain hereafter. Whence it appears, that the Acts of Superiors are not of sufficient force to hinder the Performance of an Oath, so far as it was truly obligatory; that is, an Oath not defective in it self, and made about a thing which the Juror may dispose of at his Pleasure, cannot be disannull'd by a Superior. Thus the Roman ^c Senate could not revoke the Oath which Regulus made to the Carthaginians, engaging him to return: Though indeed in this particular Case there was another Reason; inasmuch as Regulus was now in a Condition of Slavery under his Conquerors, and therefore the Romans had lost all their Power and Authority over him. But when the Subject of the Oath is any Thing or Action falling under the Direction of the Superior, it shall then borrow all its force from the Superior's Consent, either tacit or express; and he may, if it displease him, declare it null and void. Nor is there the least danger of Perjury to be fear'd, when an Oath is thus revers'd. Since the Person under Government ought to have presuppos'd his Governour's Approbation as a necessary Condition. Nor doth the Superior sin in thus cancelling what the other hath sworn: because he only exerciseth his Right in hindring the Inferior from acting in Prejudice of his

³ Such is the Oath called Juramentum calumniæ, or de Calumnia; which consists in this, according to the Roman Law, that both Parties swear when they enter their Action, that they act honestly, i. e. the one, that he believes his Demand well grounded, and the other, that his Defence is just, and that neither of them design to find out Tricks and Evasions to hinder or delay an equitable Determination. See Cod. l. ii. tit. 59. De Jurjurando propter calumniam dando, and the Novel xlix. c. 3. §. 1. But since this Oath is often an occasion of Perjury either to the Plaintiff or Defendant, and sometimes to both, it is with much reason banish'd most Courts. Another sort of Oath famous in the Roman Law is Juramentum in litem, when the value of a Debt is referred to the Oath of the Creditor, and the Debtor is not allowed the same privilege, because he is a person not to be credited, or is guilty of some gross fault. See Digest. l. xii. tit. 3. De in litem jurando, & Cod. l. v. tit. 53. Mr. Thomasius in his Dissertation, De pretio affectionis in res fungibiles non cadente, reprinted at Hall in 1707, speaks many curious things on this Subject, and which may rectify the Notions of our Modern Lawyers.

just Prerogative. And 'tis the same thing as to the Nullity of the Oath, whether the Superior prohibits all Oaths on such certain Subjects beforehand, or whether, when they have been already made, he forbids their Performance. Though, in the former Case, the Inferior incurs a very heinous Guilt, in thus rashly presuming to swear against the Prohibition. The Father, by the Jewish Law, Numb. xxx. 4, &c. was allow'd to revoke the sworn Vows of his Daughter, whilst under his Direction; the Husband of his Wife, the Master of his Servant, if they thought convenient: For otherwise, the Parties here, who were to live in Obedience, might by swearing and vowing have render'd the Power of their Governours wholly useless. Nay, Leo Mutinensis reports, That if any Person had entred on an Oath or Vow of what kind soever, and afterwards upon good Reasons repented of it; and if it did not lead to the Prejudice of a third Party, the Reason of his retracting having been produc'd and approv'd, he might by one Rabbin, or three other Men, be absolv'd. Another way there is, by which the effect of an Inferior's Oath may be made to depend on the Pleasure of his Superior; namely, if the Superior so constitute and ordain, that what the Inferior shall swear in such a particular Case, shall not be valid 'till it hath receiv'd his Approbation. And thus in the Civil Law, under the Head of Oaths, it^b is inserted as a necessary Caution, That the Right of Superiors is always excepted in the Case of Swearing: Or, that all Oaths are to be construed with a Salvo to that right. Now it is evident in all these Instances, that the relaxation of an Oath can only be made by him who is invest'd with Authority over the Swearer, and with such Authority, as implies in it this degree of Power. And therefore it was of old very properly claim'd and executed by the Roman Emperors: As appears from *l. ult. D. ad municipalem*², where Antoninus and Verus dispense with a certain Person's Oath, who having sworn never to come into the Assemblies of his Order, was afterwards created Duumvir: Because a Subject cannot by any Oath of his withhold his Service, when requir'd by the Commonwealth. And so Tiberius, in *Sueton*³, granted a Roman Knight the Power of being divorced from his Lady, whom he had taken in Adultery with his Son in law, though he had before sworn never to put her away: The Emperor declaring, That the Oath could not be so far extended, as to reach the present Case, where the Wife by so infamous a Crime had render'd her self unworthy of cohabiting any longer with her Husband. Afterwards the Christian Emperors very frequently delegated the Bishops to preside and to determine in the Affair of Dispensations; that if any Scruple should happen to arise, the Opinion of their Sanctity and Goodness might satisfy the Minds of less intelligent Judges. Yet it is too notorious how extravagantly some Ecclesiasticks, and especially he who pretends to be the chief of that Order, the Bishop of *Rome*³, have stretch'd this Privilege, and what a Flood of Mischiefs hath over-spread the Christian World from its Abuse. And indeed, since we are to proceed by the Principles of Law in determining what kinds of Oaths may be releas'd, and for what Reasons, I know not why the Clergy should assume more Authority in this Point, than the Men of the other Profession.

And farther, sometimes when an Oath cannot be made void on the side of the Swearer, the force and efficacy of it may yet be stopp'd by the Superiority of the Party towards whom the Oath is directed, and who obtains a Right upon it; either by taking this Right from him, or by forbidding him to make use of it, in receiving what the other hath sworn to pay. And this may be done either in the way of Punishment, or on account of the publick Advantage, by virtue of the Superior's Prerogative. In which case the Swearer is free from all danger of Perjury, because he is not the occasion of the Non-performance; and he is releas'd from all necessity of fulfilling his Oath by the Party, who either in a direct, or in a more eminent and extraordinary Manner, acquir'd a Right by virtue of it^d. To conclude, a Prince, who upon just Reasons dispenseth with an Oath, doth not commit the least Sin, in thus hindring an Act which was solemnly undertaken with the Invocation of the Divine Majesty, from producing its regular Effect: Though the Subject may sometimes incur a Guilt, by rashly using the Name of God to confirm an Act, which he ought to have known was prejudicial to the Right of his Superior.

³ See Mr. La Placette's Treatise of an Oath, l. ii. c. 24. It is evident, that an Oath is one of those things by which the Clergy have most effectually advanced their temporal Interests, and encroached upon the Rights of the Magistrate. Before the Emperors were Christian, an Oath was never required of Witnesses. 'Twas Constantine that made the Formality necessary. See Mr. Thomasius's Discourse, De Fide Juridica, c. 2. §. 61, &c. and in his Fundam. Jur. Nat. & Gent. l. ii. c. 9. §. 3. After the Use of Oaths was introduced into the greatest part of the Affairs of Life; and as the Clergy took upon them the right of judging of the Validity of Oaths, they by that means took upon them the Cognizance of almost all Civil Causes. We know that the Pope has assumed the Authority of disannulling Treaties most solemnly sworn to, as Eugenius IV. did in favour of Ladislaus King of Hungary, to Sultan Amurat II. and to absolve all Subjects from the Oath of Allegiance made to their lawful Sovereigns. In a word, the Clergy have omitted nothing in this respect, no more than in other things, to strengthen and increase their Power under the Name of Spiritual, which they have extended to the utmost, and accordingly have lessen'd the Temporal, which they have left with regret to Magistrates and Princes.

SUCH is the Constitution of Man, that it cannot be preserved by its own internal Substance, but needs continually to take in the assistance of certain Things from without, as well for its Nourishment and Support, as for its defence against those many Enemies which seek to ruin and dissolve its Frame. Again, a great part of what the World affords, turns another way to the Service of Mankind, in rendering Life more commodious and more easy. *Hesiod. Op. & Dier. ver. 684. For Riches are the Soul of feeble Men*¹. Now with regard to these Matters, a multitude of Business and Transactions pass betwixt Men, and large Occasion is administered to Controversies and Strifes: And lest the common Peace of Mankind should be disturb'd by such Disputes, as the Law of Nature hath with due Caution provided, so the civil Ordinances of most Nations are in this respect found most careful and solicitous. For the full illustration of which Subject, we ought first of all to enquire, by what Right it is that human Race claims the disposal of other Creatures, whether animate, or inanimate; for their Use, their Conveniency, or their Pleasure; as likewise on what Principle this Power is founded, in respect both of the Creator, and of the Creatures themselves, which Man not only useth, but very often perverts, embezzles, and destroys.

II. It is therefore beyond Dispute, that Almighty God, inasmuch as he is the Maker and the Preserver of all Things, doth likewise hold, as it were, an originary and super-eminent Property over all, and they belong so strictly to him, as that no one can pretend to the least Right in them, without his Permission or Consent. Concerning which Dominion or Property of Almighty God, Philo the Jew (lib. de Cherubim) p. 97. Ed. Genev. treats at large, and with regard to that superior Right, called the Right which Men hold over things¹ Usufructuary only. Yet because he himself stands in need of no foreign Succour, and because it is not possible for any thing besides to make an Addition to his Happiness; therefore his Goodness inclin'd him to be bountiful and gracious to his Creatures, and to give them the Privilege of using each other for their mutual Benefit. But Man especially hath in so extraordinary a manner tasted of the Divine Favour, that all other Creatures are by a common strain of Speech said to have been at first made for his Use and Service. Though this Right of God over all things is very different from the Right of Men to the same Possessions. So that the Reasoning of *Diogenes the Cynick*² was false and vain, when he thus argued, All Things belong to the Gods; wise Men are the Friends of the Gods; all Things are common amongst Friends; therefore all Things belong to wise Men. Yet it is too bold and arrogant a Pretension in some Authors, whilst they tell us, That should any thing fail of turning to the Advantage of Mankind, it must follow, that such a thing was created in vain; and that 'tis hence apparent, that the whole World is the common Possession of human Race, and what they may (if thus taken as a general Body) not unjustly term their own. This was Aristotle's Mistake; If then, says he, Nature^b makes nothing imperfectly, and nothing in vain, she must of necessity have made all these things for the sake of Men. Lucian^c delivers himself to the same Purpose; *Had not Men been created, the Consequence of the Omission had been no less than this, That all the Grace and Beauty of the rest of the World had shone without a Witness, or Beholder; and that the Gods themselves had despis'd their own Wealth, as not worth the enjoying*². But certainly the great Frame of the Universe might, in all appearance, have been more compendiously erected and adorn'd, had it been the Intention of its Author to make nothing but what should in some respect or other serve the Occasions of Men^d³. And it was not ill said of Seneca, Nimis nos^e suspiciamus, si digni nobis videmur, propter quos tanta moveantur: We are too much taken

As for that Passage of Euripides which Mr. Hortius joins to it, besides that the Notion is much the same, our Author quotes it in the next Chapter, §. 1.

And also a Treatise, De Origine Mali, written by Dr. King, Bishop of Londonerry, and since Archbishop of Dublin.

with the admiration of our own Nature, if we fancy our selves worthy to have all these glorious Works move only on our Account. Yet let this be as it will, thus much is evident; that Man makes his advantage of other Creatures, by the Grant and Licence of Heaven: As we may apprehend from this easy Argument, That without the use of those things human Life could not be preserv'd, for which Service some of them do, as it were, freely deliver themselves up into our Hands. Since then God Almighty hath conferr'd on Man the Privilege of Life, he is at the same time suppos'd to have allow'd him the Use of every thing necessary for the keeping and maintaining of that his Gift^a. The same Truth is confirmed by the Authority of the Holy Scriptures, which expressly mention God's investing Man with Power and Dominion, not only over Vegetables, but over every living Thing, produced either in the Air, in the Earth, or in the Sea^b. Yet this Concession hath not the Force of a Command, but only the Allowance and Indulgence of a Privilege; which any Person may use so far as he thinks fit, but is not bound to exercise it at all times, and upon all Occasions. For otherwise Man would offend against the Divine Law, should he let any Animal go free, or should he neglect any Opportunity of bringing the same Creature again under his Subjection; which no Man in his Wits will affirm^c. But still this Power of Man over Brute Creatures is of a different Nature from that Dominion or Sovereignty which is exercis'd over Men: Because Brutes are not capable of any correspondent Obedience arising from the Obligation; and because this is a much more absolute Sway, than that with which Men govern each other. The Divine Prohibition to the Jews from feeding on some certain Animals, doth by no means retrench or impair the Right of Men over Beasts; the Reason of that Injunction seeming to have been taken from Physick^d. Mr. Selden^e reports it, as the Opinion of the antient Rabbins, That Adam was forbidden to eat any manner of Flesh (God having commanded him to feed on the Herbs of the Field^f) but that Noah afterwards was dispens'd with in this Particular, by the Grant in Gen. ix. 3. Yet so as to be still under an Obligation to abstain from Blood, and from any Joint or Limb of any Creature taken from it whilst alive^g. The same Author adds, That the Blood of Fishes was excepted from the Prohibition: Nay, That they might eat these Creatures alive, as Oysters, &c. or such of them as died by Chance; neither of which it was lawful for them to do, with regard to terrestrial Animals.

III. If, in the next place, we consider this Power of Mankind, with respect to the things themselves, whether animate or inanimate, which Men use, and waste, and destroy; that no Injury is hereby offer'd to those Creatures, may clearly be evinc'd, as well from the Nature of Man, as from the Grant and Allowance of God. For it can on no account seem probable, that a Maker of infinite Goodness, and of infinite Wisdom, would impose such a Necessity on Man, the principal of earthly Creatures, as that he should not be able to preserve himself without injuring others, and consequently without the perpetual Commission of Sin^h. To which, if we add the express Licence of God, that must remove all Doubt and Scruple, which might otherwise have risen, especially about the Slaughter of Animals. And if there appear any Cruelty or Barbarity in such a Practice, it is sufficiently taken off by this one Consideration, That their Divine Author hath appointed these his Creatures to such a Condition, and to such a Service in the World, and hath granted to Men such an Authority over them, which if they exercise (whether by the Deputation, or only by the Permission of God) they certainly do no Injury. Now, as for Vegetables, and other things destitute of Sense, there seems, with regard to them, to be no more of Difficulty in this Point; it being impossible to discover that they suffer any hard Treatment, or unjust Hurt, when they are consum'd by Men; especially, since they must necessarily perish, and be destroy'd, either by Beastsⁱ, or by the speedy turn of the Year, and the Change of the Seasons; and farther, since many of them had never been produc'd without human Pains and Endeavours. The Superstition of the Egyptians in abstaining from certain Pot-herbs, is not of weight enough to give us any stop in the present Determination^k.

IV. But then, as to living Creatures, which are endued with a Sense of their own Being, and cannot leave it without Pain and Trouble, the point appears in some measure dubious to many, who have consider'd the Liberty of Men against Brutes, only on the Principles of Reason. For, from God's allowing the first Man to have Dominion over other Animals, it doth not presently flow as an evident Consequence, that he was at the same time invested with so wide a Commission, so infinite a Licence, that he might slay them even for unnecessary Uses^l: For Man hath Dominion too over Man, and yet cannot in the least pretend to any such Licence as this against his Fellows. Nor could Men have complain'd, that the Divine Goodness was sparing towards them, or had made an ill Pro-

MR. BARE. NOTES in §. II, III.

⁴ This Remark of our Author's ought to be placed at the end of this Paragraph, where it will much better agree with the Sense.

² Our Author speaks very pleasantly here in all his Editions, By other Beasts, as if the Beast Man did not spend and destroy the Vegetables, the other Beasts would. And Mr. Hertius has overlook'd this great Mistake in his Edition of 1706.

vision for their Necessities, tho' they should have been denied a Power over the Life of Animals; at least of such as did not threaten any Hurt or Danger to the Life of Men: Inasmuch as the Work of those Creatures in cultivating the Earth, together with what comes from them otherwise, as Milk, Eggs (such as are not necessary for the Propagation of the Species) Wooll, and the like, might have been sufficient to sustain Men in a tolerable way of Living. Nor did God by commanding Men to sacrifice them, as a Token of Divine Worship, confer any Power or Privilege of turning them at pleasure into Food. For such things as are lawful to Mankind, only by some peculiar Command of God, may still remain unlawful, except in that particular Case. Hence it was, that many of the ancient Philosophers utterly disapprov'd of this Practice. For why should Man, on the bare account of superfluous Pleasure, rob an harmless Animal of that Life which it enjoys by the Gift of the same common Creator? Especially, since even the Examples of the fiercest Wild-beasts, of Lions, Wolves, and other Devourers of Flesh, will do them no Service, if urg'd in their Excuse. For these are so fram'd by Nature, as not to be able to support Life, without feasting on Blood, and to loath and reject that common Provision afforded by the Earth. Whereas Men are not under the like case of Necessity; receiving very commodious Nourishment from other Food, and being obliged to prepare Flesh by dressing or seasoning it, before they can make it agreeable to their Digestion. We hear indeed of some barbarous Nations, which make use of no Flesh or Fish but what is raw, and support themselves with that; as Rochefort^a reports of the Coasts on Davis's Streights. But the same Author tells us^b of the Inhabitants of the Province of Pasto in Peru, That they eat no manner of Flesh; and that if desired but only to taste any, their Answer is, They are not Dogs.

Others have observ'd, in relation to the present Enquiry, that whereas those Animals, which naturally feed on Flesh, have their Fore-teeth oblong, sharp, and divided from each other, that so by closing them with a deeper stroke they may grind and separate the Prey; Man's Teeth are short, join'd one to the other, and spreading round, after the manner of those Animals, which live on Herbs and Fruits: And that on this account we are necessitated to make use of Knives for dividing the Flesh we eat; whilst the Creatures, which eat this as their natural Food, stand in no need of such Assurances or Inventions: That thus we see Children by the bare impulse of Nature loving Fruit beyond all other Provisions, and preferring Apples, Cherries, and Nuts, to the most exquisite Dainties of Flesh; because in them Nature is not yet corrupted, nor their Appetites debauch'd by ill Customs of Eating^c. It is farther evident, that the fierceness and cruelty of Men, having been first excited, encourag'd, and harden'd by the Slaughters of Beasts, afterwards broke out against their own Kind; and those, who had taken a delight in destroying the harmless Race of dumb Creatures, made it their next step to murder weak and defenceless Men. Diogenes Laertius, in his Life of Pythagoras^d, reports that Philosopher to have forbid the killing of Animals¹, κοινὸν δίκαιον ἡμῶν ἔχόντων ψυχῆς, As enjoying the same common Right of Life and Soul with our selves. This indeed (as the Historian goes on) was his Pretence: But the true reason of his commanding his Followers to abstain from all living Creatures was, That he might exercise and train Men up in a more easy method of Food, by means of which they might always have ready at hand a large Provision of Meat, requiring no Fire to dress it; and as much Drink as they had plain Water. For this way of Sustenance he thought most proper to produce Health of Body, and Quickness of Mind². Though Lucian (in sonnio seu Gallo, Vol. II. p. 174.) bringing him in under the Shape of a Cock, makes him give this Reason of his Opinion: "I consider, says he, that if the Precepts I set on foot were common, and such as many had deliver'd before, I should not be able to prevail with the World to look upon me as any extraordinary Person; but the more strange and unusual the Doctrine should be which I offer'd, the more new and surprizing I should appear, and gain the more Admiration. Add. Jo. Scheffer. de Philosoph. Ital. c. 14.

Plutarch. in Grill. "Man, with a craving Appetite, drawing all things to himself, trying all things, tasting all things, as being still ignorant of his own Nature, or what is agreeable to it, is the only Creature in the World that lives in general upon every thing which comes to his hands. First, He useth Flesh, without the excuse of Want or Necessity, when he might at any time gather other Food from the Seeds and Plants, with an inexhaustible and never failing Store. But thro' Luxury, and Disdain of his proper and necessary Provision, he follows strange and polluted Diet in the slaughter of Beasts, exceeding the most savage Creatures in Fierceness and Cruelty: For Blood, and Slaughter, and Flesh are the proper sustenance of the Kite, the Wolf, and the Dragon, as Fish and Spoon-meat are of Men. The same Author, in his second Oration about the eating of Flesh, among many other things, offers what follows: "At first they fed perhaps on some wild or hurtful Animal; then on Birds and Fish; 'till their Appetite, thus taught and accustom'd, proceeded to the Ox that labours in our Service; to the Sheep that cloaths and adorns us; to the watchful Cock that guards our House. Hence, by degrees, adding Strength and Force to their insatiable Desires, they broke out into the Murder of their Brethren, and the Misderies of Blood and War.

 “ Nicol. Damascenus reports of the Phrygians, That it was a capital Crime amongst them to kill a labouring Ox, or to steal any Instrument of Agriculture. So Aloys Cadamust in his Voyages, c. 57, 60. tells us, That the People of the Kingdom of Calecut shew the like sacred Veneration to Oxen. And the Nomades, as Diodor. Sic. relates, l. iii. c. 32. p. 165. Ed. Rhodom. gave the Bull and the Cow, as likewise the Ram and the Ewe, the Name of Parents, as affording the daily Support of Life. Strabo, l. xv. p. 490. observes of the Brachmans, that they eat the Flesh of those Creatures only, which do not assist Mankind in their Works. Varenius, Descript. Japon. c. 23. reports much the same of the Japoneze; who are said likewise to profess an Aversion to Blood, and no less to Milk, which they take to be nothing else but white Blood.
 “ We may here likewise, by the way, remark what is in Plutarch’s Sympotic. lib. iv. c. 4. to prove that Fish are the most proper Diet. For, says he, as to the Creatures which live with us upon the Earth, supposing them to have no other common Rights with Mankind, yet at least they receive the same Nourishment, they breathe, and wash, and drink as we do; and when we kill them, their piteous Cries make us blush for our Cruelty: Besides, that the greatest part of them are made familiar to us, by dwelling and feeding so near. Whereas on the contrary, the Race of Sea Animals is utterly strange to us, is born and bred, and lives as ’twere in another World; nor are we restrain’d from killing those Creatures by their Cry, by their Aspect, or by any Service that they can do us. For they can indeed be no way useful in our Business, not being able so much as to live in our Element. Our Earth is a kind of Hell to them; they die almost as soon as they touch it. On the other side, the Pythagoreans were more averse to eating Fish than any other Animals; the grounds of which Opinion are examin’d at large by the same Author, Symp. l. viii. c. 8. So likewise Xiphilin. reports, That the Caledonians never tasted Fish; nay, though they had them in great Plenty, Epit. Di. n. in Sever. One of the Reasons there given is this, That other Animals deserve their Death at our Hands, by some way or other doing us Mischief; whereas the Fish neither hurt us, nor are able to hurt us. That amongst other Animals some ought necessarily to be kill’d, lest by multiplying too fast they should rob Men of their Sustenance, as Cunnies and Hens. Whereas (again) the Fish, being born as it were in another World, give us no Occasion to hurt them: But we are set against

Porphyry is very prolix in attempting to shew, that abstinence from Flesh is in the highest manner the Duty of Philosophers, who place all their Happiness in God, and in the Imitation of the Divine Nature. Amongst a great number of Arguments, the Substance of which hath been for the most part already deliver’d, he endeavours to demonstrate, That all Souls, endued with Sense and Memory, are likewise Partakers of Reason; and that since we may discover thus much in other Animals, we ought to extend our Justice to them, which consists principally in offering no hurt without due Cause: And that we have a convincing Evidence of the Reason of Brutes, in their being capable of Madness and Distraction. To this time the Benjans in Cambay, believing the Souls of Men to remove at Death into the Bodies of Beasts, never harm any living Creature, nor dare to turn them into Food: Nay, they have Hospitals erected on purpose, for the reception of diseas’d and maimed Birds^b. Phil. Baldaus in his description of the Island Ceylon^c reports, That the Bramines, even when converted to Christianity, keep their old Method of Living; and that if they be encounter’d with that Text of Scripture, To the Clean all things are clean; they reply in another, that; The Kingdom of God is not in Meat and Drink: That they have been ever accusom’d to their light and easy Diet, and find themselves very well upon it. Thus the whole Nation of the Apichitas, of old, never tasted Flesh or Fish, ’till they learnt this Custom from the Europeans^d.

V. But, though in these Arguments and Authorities so much ought justly to be commended, as makes for the Encouragement of Temperance and Frugality, and for the hindering the finer Spirits from being obstructed, and as it were mix’d up with too gross Feeding; yet, that the killing and the eating of animate Creatures is really not sinful, may be sufficiently made out on the bare strength of Reason: And the main Evidence seems to be this, That no mutual Right or Obligation passeth¹ between Men and Brutes, nor ought to pass by the direction of Nature^e. For we neither find that the Law of Nature, by virtue of its absolute Authority, commands us to maintain Friendship and Society with Brutes; nor are they capable of sustaining any Obligation towards Men arising from Covenants. From which Defect of all common Right there follows, as it were, a State of War betwixt those who both are able to hurt each other, and are upon very probable grounds suppos’d to be willing. And in this State each Party hath liberty to do to the other, with whom he is thus engag’d in Hostility, whatsoever he thinks conducive to his own Interest and Convenience. Yet such a state of War, in which Men stand towards Brutes, is very different from that which sometimes ariseth from Men’s Clashing amongst themselves:

THAT this Power of Mankind over Things ever began to take effect in relation to other Men (for no human Property ought to be oppoſ'd to the tranſcendent Right of GOD) ^a or, that this indefinite Right was converted into Dominion ², by virtue of which ſuch or ſuch a Thing belongs to one Perſon, and to none elſe, is all owing to another Principle: Of, which, before we proceed to treat, it ſeems neceſſary to premiſe, that Property and Community are moral Qualities, which do not affect the Things themſelves, as to their inſtrick Nature, but only produce a moral Effect with regard to other Perſons: And that theſe Qualities, as all others of the ſame Kind, derive their

² Men by the Conceſſion of the Creator and Supreme Sovereign of the Univerſe have naturally a full power to make uſe of the Creatures, as they ſee fit, according to the ſtrength of their Reaſon. If there had never been but one Man in the World, as Adam was alone for a little time, the effect of his Power had been reduc'd to this, That nothing had been done contrary to the Will of the Creator, by diſpoſing of what had been preſented to him according to his Humour. But Mankind began to frame and perpetuate themſelves from Generation to Generation, from the moment that they became more than one Man, ſince by Nature one had not more power than another over the Beaſts and inanimate Creatures. Every one acquir'd a Right, by virtue of which another ought to permit him to enjoy, as well as himſelf, all thoſe things which their Creator had granted them the uſe of in common. When any one finds a thing to pleaſe him, from the time he had got the Poſſeſſion of it, no other Man ought to take it from him, but ſuppoſing it to be of that Nature, as not to be conſumed by the uſage, he may appropriate it to himſelf ſo long as he has occaſion for it; and others do him an Injury, if they would make uſe of it in their turn. So long as there were but few Men, and they contented themſelves with ſuch Fruits of the Earth as grew up without Tillage, they needed to poſſeſs themſelves of nothing but what was for preſent uſe, and here we may believe that all their Cares and Claims were bounded, and ſo all things were common. But when Mankind was conſiderably multiply'd, and they contriv'd to till the Ground, and ſeek out ways to render their Lives more commodious and agreeable, there was no way left to live in that Community; but Men muſt fix upon ſomething, and 'twas juſt, that what was gotten by Labour and Induſtry ſhould be made ſuch a Property, that their Birth from Indisposition. And therefore 'tis an idle Question, Whether the Property of things arise from Nature, or from Institution? Since we have plain evidence, that it proceeds from the Imposition of Men; and that the natural Substance of things suffers no Alteration, whether Property be added to them, or taken from them.

II. In the next place, we ought with due accuracy to weigh and examine what Communio is, and what Property, or Dominion. The Term Communio is taken either negatively, or positively. In the former manner things are said to be common, as consider'd before any human Act or Agreement had declared them to belong to one rather than to another. In the same sense, things thus consider'd are said to be No Body's, rather negatively, than privatively, i. e. that they are not yet assign'd to any particular Person, nor that they are incapable of being so assign'd. They are likewise term'd res in medio quibusvis exposita, Things that lie free for any Taker. But in the positive Signification of the Word, common Things differ from appropriate only in this Respect, That the latter belong to one person only, the former to many Persons together, though in the very same manner. To proceed, Property or Dominion, is a Right, by which the very Substance¹, as it were, of a Thing, so belongs to one Person, that it doth not in whole belong, after the same manner, to any other. For we take Dominion and Property to be the very same. Though some affirm the Right, as separated from the Use and Profit, to be Property, and as join'd with the Use and Profit, to be Dominion; which nevertheless is a difference that doth not perpetually hold. Some again are over-nice, whilst by Property they understand the Thing it self under that Quality, by which it belongs to me, and to none besides; and by Dominion a Right to dispose of the said Thing, as I please, which flows from Property in the manner of an Effect; so that the Dominion shall be lodg'd in the Person, but the Property shall seem rather to inhere in the Thing². In which Distinction it is falsely suppos'd, that Dominion is as it were the Effect of Property; whereas if a Man thinks it at all necessary thus to divide them, the reverse of this is rather true. For the Right, strictly speaking, inheres in the Person, from which the things themselves derive some kind of extrinsecal Denomination. And this appears sufficiently evident from hence, That the Right dying with the Person, the things cease to be appropriated, without any change in their Substance, or in other natural Qualities and Affections.

Now the force of Property is such, that we may at our pleasure dispose² of the things which we hold by this Right, and may keep any other Person from the use of them; unless he hath obtain'd from us, by Covenant, a particular Right to this purpose: And that therefore whilst they continue ours, they cannot after the same manner, and in whole³, be another's. I say, after the same manner; for neither as there is no reason to the contrary, so Custom informs us, that the same thing may belong to several Persons at once, according to their different ways of holding or owning it. Thus the Commonwealth, the Landlord, and the Tenant, by Copy or Lease, may be said each of them to have the Property of the same piece of Ground; the first an *eminent Property*⁴; the second a *direct*⁵, and the last an *useful*⁶. It was added likewise, in whole^b; for many Persons may, even in the same way, hold the same thing, yet not in whole, but each according to his determinate Share. As is the case in those Goods which are, without Division⁷, possess'd by many together, who all happen to have the same kind of Property with regard to the same thing.

Sometimes we conceive Property to be divided into several Parts; or (if any one likes this Expression better) to admit of several Degrees. For 'tis frequently distinguish'd into plenary, and diminutive. The former is either join'd with what they call eminent Property, in which manner civil States, or the Heads and Governours of them, possess their Goods; or else disjoin'd from it, and term'd vulgar; by which a private Man enjoys a full power of disposing of his Goods, except so far that the Use of them be not under the Direction of the municipal Laws. Diminution of Property may be made several ways, as that the bare Exercise or Administration of it shall be restrain'd; or that the Profit and Advantage of it shall be lessen'd; or lastly, that somewhat shall be cut off from the very Property it self. The first happens⁸, when by Covenant, no other might have to do with it without his Permission. Wherefore every one possessed himself of certain things with a design to keep them always, and not to part with them unless it be by disposing of them to whom they think fit, either alive or dying, at least declaring openly not to abandon them, and leave them to the first Occupant. Thus the property of Goods was first established, of which the Mark of Distinction is, That others are always excluded, whereas when all things were common, others were not excluded from the things of which every one was possessed but for a little time, i. e. as long as they were actually in use. Then were civil Societies formed, the Rights of Property were settled, and order'd divers ways according to the Laws agreed on. Thus have I given, as I think, in a few Words, a clear and exact notion of this Matter, about which our Author enlarges much, and yet reasons obscurely; and which has long been perplex'd with vain Subtilties. If we joyn this with Note 4. of Paragraph 4. we shall have Principles sufficient to judge well of it, and to rectify the Notions of other Authors, who have written about it. See also chap. vi. §. 1. Note 1.

² So says the Civil Law, Nam suæ quidem quisque rei moderator, atque arbiter, &c. Cod. l. iv. tit. 35. Mandati, &c. leg. 21.

⁴ See Lib. viii. c. 5. f. 7.

Farther, since the same thing may be possess'd either in whole by one, or else by many¹⁴, without falling under a Division; so that each Person, according to his determinate Share, shall have an equal Right in it; hence it comes to pass that things are, in this respect, distinguish'd into proper, and common, as the word common is taken in its latter Signification; implying that the same thing is by the same kind of Dominion held by several Men, without being divided, or parcell'd out amongst them. And this Communio differs from Property, strictly so called, only with regard to the Subject in which it is terminated and lodg'd; a proper or appropriated thing belonging to one Person alone, a common thing to several, but not with regard to the manner or the virtue of the Dominion; for many Persons have the same Right over a common thing, as a single Person hath over a proper thing: And as the Propriety of a thing appertaining to one only excludes all others from an equal Right in the same thing; so a common thing excludes all others but those to whom it is said to be common. Now since neither of these Commoners hath a Right extending it self to the whole thing, but only to a part of it, though suppos'd to remain undivided; it is manifest that no one Person can, by his own Right, dispose of the thing entirely, but only according to his fix'd Proportion¹⁵: And that if any Resolution is to be taken, any Bargain to be made about the whole, the Consent and Act of each Commoner is necessarily required. Ziegler^c, Felden^d, and Boecler^e, in their Observations on Grotius, have all confounded negative Communio with positive: On account of which Mistake many Arguments have been thrown away to no purpose, in discussing this Point; as will appear hereafter. What Seneca hath deliver'd about the several kinds of Communio, may not be impertinent to our present Subject: I hold all things, says he, *in common with a Friend*¹⁶, not as I do with a Slave, so that one part should be mine, and another part his; but as Children are common to their Father and Mother, who, supposing the Children to be two, are not said to have each one, but each both. The Knights Seats belong to all of that Order, yet in them, by taking Possession of a place, I appropriate it to my self. And if I assign this place to another Person, though he had an equal Right to it, yet it seems to be my Gift. Some things belong to some Men under a certain Condition. Thus, again, I have a place in the Knights Seats, not to sell, not to let out, not to make my Home, but barely to sit in whilst I am a Spe-

Etat v. It will be no Falsity then, if I should say, I have a place in the Knights Seats; yet if they happen to be full when I come into the Theatre, I both have a place there by Right, because I am allow'd to use them; and I have not a place, because it is already possess'd by those who had a common Right to it with my self.

III. From what hath been offer'd, 'tis evident that as well positive Communion, as Propriety, doth imply the Exclusion of others from the thing thus said to be either common, or proper, and consequently doth presuppose more Persons in the World than one. As then, if there were but a single Man upon Earth, it could by no means be said, that things were appropriated to him; so those things, from the use of which no Person is excluded, or which belong no more to any one, than to another, are to be stiled common in the former, not in the latter sense of the Word. And thus it appears in what respect we may attribute the Dominion of things to Adam, whilst he yet stood alone in the World. Namely, although by reason of the vast Extent of the Earth, and his small Occasions, he needed to apply to his Service but a very inconsiderable Portion of things; yet supposing him to have had Inclination, and likewise Ability and Convenience to turn all that God had given him to his own use, there was no Right of others to oppose or hinder him. Therefore the Right of Adam over things was of a different kind from that Dominion, which is now settled amongst Men: We may call it an indefinite Dominion¹, not formally possess'd, but absolutely allow'd; not actual, but potential. It had indeed the same Effect which Dominion now obtains; that is, the using things at Pleasure; yet was it not Dominion, strictly speaking, by reason that there was no other Person against whom this Effect might prevail; but 'twas capable of passing into Dominion, when the number of Mankind should afterwards increase. And thus on the whole, whilst Adam was the only Man, things in respect of him were neither proper, nor common. For Community supposeth a Partner in the Possession; and Propriety denotes an Exclusion of the Right of others to the thing enjoy'd: So that neither of them can be understood, 'till the World was furnish'd with more than one Inhabitant.

IV. But farther, it ought no less carefully to be observ'd, that the Grant of Almighty God, by which he gave Mankind the use of earthly Provisions, was not the immediate Cause of Dominion, as this is directed towards other Men, and with relation to them takes Effect (which is evident likewise from hence, that even Brutes², by the Divine Permission, use and consume the Fruits of the Earth, and yet they are certainly incapable of Dominion) but that Dominion necessarily presupposeth some human Act³, and some Covenant either tacit or express. GOD indeed authoriz'd Mankind to apply to their Service and Convenience the Earth, with the Product of it, and the living Creatures upon it; or, he gave Man an indefinite Right to all these Possessions; but still it was left to their own Choice and Disposal, what Manner, what Degree, what Extent they would fix to this Power; that is, whether they would circumscribe it with certain Bounds, or leave it unconfined; as likewise whether they would allow each Person a Right to all things, or only to one and the same determinate part of things; or whether they would assign to every particular Man his own Portion, with which he should rest contented, and pretend no Right or Claim to any thing besides. Ambros. Off. L. i. c. 28. Nature pour'd out all things in common to all Men: For so God commanded the whole Stock of things to be produc'd, that Men should have a general Supply of Sustenance, and should hold the Earth as a general Seat. Common Right therefore was the Work of Nature; private and peculiar Right the Work of long Use and Possession. Add. Selden. de J. N. & G. sec. H. br. l. vi. c. 1. 'Tis in vain therefore to dispute whether God conferr'd the Dominion over things on our first Parents, as the Representatives of all human Race; or whether he gave it them as their own Peculiar³, and so as to terminate in their single Persons; that they, by their own proper Right, should hold the Lordship of the whole World, and that all other Mortals should owe their private Dominion to their Bounty and Favour. For that Divine Grant only confirm'd Men in a fuller Assurance of the Goodness of their Maker towards them, and satisfy'd them that 'twas his pleasure they should dispose of other Creatures for their own Use and Service. But it was left to the Reason of Men

Mr. BARB. NOTES on §. III, IV.

² I wonder our Author should in this place make use of so weak a Reason. For he himself observes in more than one place, that Beasts are not capable of any Right or Obligation, neither among themselves nor with others, nor is there any Law for them, properly so call'd; so that tho' in one sense God permits the Beasts to use what is for their Convenience, yet 'tis not such a real Grant, as has the Nature of Right; and in that respect we can no more say, that God wills (for example) that the Birds should eat the Fruits and Corn where-ever they find it, than that God would have a Bear or a Lion to pull that Man in pieces, who has the Misfortune to fall into their Paws.

³ An English Knight, named Robert Filmer, maintains it with a great deal of Heat, and makes use of it to prove the absolute Power which he attributes to Sovereigns, and which, as he pretends, has come down by Succession from the Authority of Adam, whom he makes the first Sovereign. He chiefly insists on this Text, Gen. i. 28. where God says to our first Parents, Increase and multiply, and replenish the Earth, and subdue it: and have Dominion over the Fish of the Sea, over the Fowls of the Air, and over every Beast that moveth upon the Earth. But Mr. Lock, who has confuted that Book in an English Work, of which we may find an Extract in the Universal Library, Tom. 19. answers judiciously, 1. That in these Words God gives Adam no Power but over the Beasts. 2. That he gave him no property over these living Creatures to possess them as his own, but as in a common Right with all Mankind. This the Author proves at large from diverse parallel Passages of the Holy Scripture, and particularly by the very Grant that God repeated to Noah and his Sons. The Text in Psalms cxv. 16. is not answer'd. God, saith the Psalmist, hath given the Earth to the Children of Men; which, according to the Hebrew Stile, is to Men in general, or to Mankind. Treatise of Government, l. i. c. 4.

to determine what measures should be taken to prevent any Discord that might arise amongst them from the Exercise of this Right. But we can by no means say, That there was any universal Rule and Manner of Possessing prescrib'd by God himself, which all Men should be obliged to observe. Therefore things were rendred neither proper, nor common (that is, in a positive Communion) by the express Command of God: But this matter was afterwards adjusted by the Disposal of Men, according as the Peace of human Society seem'd to require. Whence, those Authors must needs be under a Mistake, who deliver themselves in so gross Terms as these: The Division of Things belongs to the Law of Nature; that is, it doth not only receive its Rise and Foundation from Nature, so as afterwards to be turn'd into Law by the Consent of Mankind; but Nature herself frames and compleats this Law by her own Act and Authority. And again, The Division of Things is one Command of the Decalogue; that is, one Head of the Law of Nature. For he that said, Thou shalt not steal, in effect said, Let there be a Property and Distinction of Things; let every one hold what is his own, and not covet what is another's^a. For there is no Precept of natural Law to be discover'd, by which

Men are enjoin'd to make such an Appropriation of things, as that each Man should be allotted his particular Portion, divided from the shares of others. Though the Law of Nature doth indeed sufficiently advise the introducing of separate Assignments, as Men should appoint, according to the Use and Exigencies of human Society; yet so as to refer it to their Judgment, whether they would appropriate only some particular things, or whether they would possess some things without bringing them to a Division, and leave the rest as they found them, only forbidding any particular Man to challenge them to himself alone. Hence too, the Law of Nature is suppos'd to approve and confirm all Agreements made by Men about the Possession of things, provided they neither imply a Contradiction, nor tend to the Disturbance of Society. Therefore the Property of things flow'd immediately from the compact of Men, whether tacit, or express. For although after the Donation of God nothing was wanting but for Men to take possession; yet that one Man's seizing on a thing should be understood to exclude the Right of all others to the same thing⁺, could not proceed but from mutual Agreement. And though right Reason mov'd and persuaded Men to intro-

MR. BARB. NOTES on §. IV.

⁺ No, in no wise. It is certain on the contrary, that the immediate Foundation of all particular Right, which any Man has to a thing which was before common, is the first Possession. This was the most antient way of Acquirement. And indeed, when several things are given in general to a number of Men which exist not at the same time, and who neither can nor will possess all things in common, and such are Men of all Times and Places, the Intention of the Donor doubtless is, That those who come first shall gain a personal Right to those things that they have gotten, exclusive of the Pretensions of all others, without any Consent from the Occupant appropriate to himself lawfully any thing before held in common, provided he takes no more than he needs, and leaves enough for others. This is what Mr. Titius says judiciously, Obsere. 278. n. 2. in which he was prevented by Mr. Lock, who, in his excellent Treatise of Civil Government, has among other things searched to the Bottom with much Curiosity and Solidity into the manner how the Property of Goods is acquired. Take, in short, his Judgment, how Men may possess in divers parts what God gave them in common, and enjoy it without any Agreement made between them, who have the same Natural Right. God, who gave Man the Earth, and all things in it for his Subsistence and Convenience, intended, without doubt, that they should put them to such an Use, as would be most advantageous to their Life, and most conformable to the Reason of him that holds them of him. Now no Man can receive any Benefit from the Fruits which are produced of themselves, and the Beasts which are brought up by the Care of Nature only, unless he appropriate to himself, some way or other, some of these fruits and Animals. If it were a Crime to take the least thing which is given in common, before we had the Consent of all others who had any Right, we might perish a thousand times with Hunger in the midst of Plenty. When a Master of a Family provides a Dish of Meat for his Children or Servants, he does not divide to each of them a Part; but what each of them fairly takes, belongs to him, although before none of them had more Right than others, and although none of them had an allowance given them to take this or that Portion. Farther, seeing every one is the only Master of his Person and Actions, the Labour of his Body and Work of his Hands entirely and solely belong to him, as his own proper Goods. So that all that he has derived from the state of Nature by his Labour and Industry, what he has gotten by his Pains, belongs to him only, and others can't pretend to them, unless there does not remain enough of the same things, or as good, among those that are common. A Man who feeds on the Acorns he has gather'd under an Oak, or wild Apples which he has gather'd in a Wood, certainly makes them his own. But when is it that these Acorns and Apples come to be his Property? when he eats them, or when he dresses them, or when he carries them home, or when he lays them up? 'Tis plain, that nothing but his Labour in gathering them can make them his own. Quod omnibus nascitur, industriæ præmium est, Quintil. Declam. 13. 'Tis our Labour that distinguishes these Fruits of the Earth from other common Goods, and which adds something more than the common Mother of all Men, I mean Nature, hath bestow'd. See Plautus in his Rudens, or Fortunate Shipwreck, Act iv. Scen. 3. v. 33. &c. By the same Reason, the Grass that a Man's Horse hath eaten, the Turf which his Servant hath cut, the Ditch he hath digged, and the Water which he hath drawn, become his own Goods and Inheritance, without the Consent of any other. 'Tis the same at this day with the Stag which we have kill'd, the Fish we have taken, the Ambergrease or Pearls which we have fish'd up, and the Hare which we have hunted down, in the Places where Hunting and Fishing are allow'd to every body, or in them that belong to no body, as the vast Ocean. So that so many Acres of Ground as a Man can till and sow, and whose Fruits he can spend for his Maintenance, belong properly to him, and he hath a Right to inclose that Space with Hedges, Ditches, Walls, or after any other manner, without any Man's Permission. And this is the rather true, because the Creator himself, in giving the Earth to Men in common, hath commanded them to labour, and has put them into such a natural State, that they are necessitated not to be idle. But it doth not hence follow, that we may gather as many Fruits, take as many Beasts, or possess our selves of as many Acres of Land; or, in a word, appropriate to our selves as many Goods as we please. For the same Law of Nature which hath given every one a particular Right to the things she hath bestow'd, by his Labour and Industry, separate from the State of Community wherein they were; the same Law, I say, has set certain Bounds to our Right. God hath given all things abundantly, 1 Tim. vi. 17. Why? to enjoy them. This is the Voice of Reason confirm'd by Revelation. Wherefore the Property of Goods acquir'd by Labour must be regulated by the good Usage which may be made of them for the Necessity and Convenience of Life. See what our Author says, c. vi. §. 3. following. If we pass the Bounds of Moderation, and take what others have occasion for, without doubt we seize on that which belongs to others; especially, if having got any thing superfluous, we leave not sufficient to relieve their Necessities, and supply them with things convenient and useful. We must not suffer any thing which God hath created for the Service of Man, to perish or become useless. If we consider with attention the abundance of natural Provisions which have been a long time in the World, the small Number of those who can use them, and for whom they are appointed, and how little a Man can appropriate to himself with the exclusion of others, especially if he keep himself in the just Bounds prescribed by Reason, we must be obliged to acknowledge, that the Propriety of Goods so establish'd would not produce the least Disputes and Quarrels. We may see this discoursed at large in the Work of Mr. Lock, Lib. ii. c. 4. Moreover, Mr. Vander Muelen hath also confuted our Author in his Comment upon Grotius, l. ii. §. 1. p. 56

duce distinct Properties, yet this doth not hinder but that they might derive their Rise and Original from human Covenant.

V. Thus much being premis'd, it is manifest, that, antecedently to any Act or Agreement of Men, there was a Communion of all things in the World; not such as we have before term'd a positive, but a negative Communion; that is, all things lay free to any that would use them, and did not belong to one more than to another. But since things could afford no Service to Men, were we not allow'd to lay hands at least on Fruits and Products of them, and since this would be to no purpose, if others might lawfully take from us what we had before actually mark'd out for our own Use: Hence we apprehend the first Agreement, that Men made about this Point, to have been, that what any Person had seiz'd out of the common store of things, or out of the Fruits of them, with design to apply to his private Occasions¹, none else should rob him of. This² may be illustrated by the Case of Beasts, amongst which none can claim a peculiar Right to any thing above others³; but each satisfies his Appetite with what he first meets with in his way: And if any of them hath been so provident as to lay up a Stock for future Use, the rest are under no Obligation to forbear invading and plundering it: Inasmuch as no Agreement can have pass'd amongst them, which might lodge the chief Right to any thing in the first Taker.

The Author of the Treatise *De Principiis justitiae & decori*⁴ hath advanc'd somewhat on this Subject, which may serve to set it in a fuller Light. He supposeth beforehand, that Man may lawfully possess and use Creatures void of Reason; and thence infers, that since Men are by Nature equal, all must have an equal Right to the Creatures⁵; there being in respect of the Creatures themselves no Rule assigning one Part to me, and another to my Neighbour: What remains then, but that the Distinction and Division of Goods must be deduc'd from Compact? But so far as all human Institutions and Ordinances are made with the exception of extreme Necessity, therefore when so desperate a Case happens, the primitive Right to all things revives: Because, in the common Agreement for the Division of Things, every one is suppos'd to have renounc'd his Right to those Things which were allotted to others with this Reserve and Restriction, Unless I am unable otherwise to compass my own Preservation. My Calamity doth not give me a Right to those things, to which I had none before; but the extremity of my Danger makes that Condition cease, under which I gave up my first Right. For the same Reason it is lawful in War to seize the Goods of the Enemy: Because all Compacts being dissolv'd⁶, the original Right returns. He adds, p. 110. That, before the settling of Covenants, first Occupancy did not by its own force confer any Right. Because first, in whatever necessitous Condition I was plac'd, I could then have no Right to recall these Goods to my own Use; this Privilege taking place only in Goods which I voluntarily resign'd to my Neighbour: But there are not many Persons to be met with, who would allow such a Prerogative to Things thus acquired.

If first Occupancy of itself confer'd a Right exclusive of all others, it would follow, that, even in a case of Necessity, Goods thus attain'd could not be made use of by any other Person than the Possessor: Because the Right of Necessity follows from an Exception added to the first Compact about the Division of Goods; but we before suppos'd, that no such Compact had pass'd about Things which came into Mens Possession by these Means. It being then absurd and unreasonable, that a Person reduc'd to Extremity should not be allowed to use what another hath by Occupancy made his own; it follows, that the Right, by virtue of which Occupancy fixeth a Property, is likewise owing to Covenant. Though this Argument is at the best but very feeble⁷.

He proceeds Secondly to affirm, That there is in Nature no more Reason why Men should desire a Right from the first Occupancy of things⁸, than from the first discovery of them with the Eve. Therefore the Difference must arise from the Institution of Men, ordaining, that the Right to a Piece of Land, for Instance, should be in him who first took possession of it, not in him who saw it before others. Thirdly, he says, Let us suppose two Men, one swift, and one slow of Foot, 'tis evident what an ill match'd Couple we have here, as to the Business of acquiring Property; and by consequence, that the Right by which he who first seizeth the thing, in this Case, should be the true Owner of it, is not borrow'd from Nature, but from implicit

¹ This Agreement is in no wise necessary, as may appear from what has been said in the preceding Note. The Roman Lawyers do not suppose any, even in that Law to which our Author refers them; and whereas to shew, that Property of Goods did begin by taking Possession, they say, there remains to this day some footsteps of it in things which yet remain common, which belong to the first Occupant. Dominiumque rerum ex naturali possessione cepisse Nervus filius ait, ejusque rei vestigium remanere, de his, quae terrae, mari, caelo capiuntur; nam haec protinus eorum fiunt, qui primi possessionem eorum apprehenderint, Digest. l. xli. tit. 2. De acquirentia aut amittenda possessione, leg. 1. There is also a Place in the Institutes, which I shall quote, c. ix. §. 9. n. 9. from whence it will appear, that, according to the Notion of the Roman Lawyers, Possession is all that transfers Property by virtue of the Intention of him who gives any thing to many in common.

² See §. iv. Note 1. foregoing.

⁴ This is not so; but the true Reason is the state of War, where two are Enemies the one to the other. And indeed supposing that they, who have had each their Goods in Property, should come of a sudden to suffer them to be common by an unanimous Consent, and without ceasing to be Friends, every one may after this take what is convenient, and none have right to deprive others of what they are possessed of for their Use. Thus Veltbuisen argues upon the false Principles of Hobbes.

Covenant or Agreement: He might have said more briefly, upon Supposition that all Men had originally an equal power over things, we cannot apprehend how a bare corporal Act⁷, such as Seizure is, should be able to prejudice the Right and Power of others, unless their Consent be added to confirm it; that is, unless a Covenant intervene. What the same Author disputes farther; That^a in the primitive State one Man might have brought the whole World under his Subjection, is vain and idle, and is confuted by Mr. Hobbes himself^b.

VI. To proceed, Men left this original negative Communion, and by Covenant settled distinct Properties, not at the same time, and by one single Act, but by successive Degrees; according as either the Condition of Things, or the Number and the Genius of Men seem'd to require. Thus the Scythians of old appropriated only their Cattle, and the Furniture of their Houses; leaving their Land in its primitive Communion^c. Indeed the Peace and Tranquillity of Mankind, for which the Law of Nature appears especially concern'd, gave no obscure Intimation, what would be most convenient for Men to appoint in this Affair. For that each Man should retain an equal Power over all Things, or that the universal Provision should be laid in Common, ready for the promiscuous use of every Person, was not consistent with the safety and quiet of human Race; especially after they were multiplied into considerable Numbers, and had cultivated and improv'd the Method of living. Because^d there could not but arise almost infinite Clashings, from^e the desire of many Persons to the same Thing, which was not able to satisfy them all at once; it being the Nature of the greatest part of what the World affords, to be incapable of serving more than one Man at the same time. As for the precise Order, and the particular Causes of Things passing into Properties, I conceive we may thus come to an apprehension of them: Most things of immediate use to Men, and which are applied to the ends of Nourishment and Cloathing, are not by bare unassisted Nature produc'd every where in so great abundance, as to yield a plentiful supply to all. As often therefore as two or more should want the same thing, which could not content them all together, and should endeavour to seize and secure it for themselves; so often there must arise a most probable occasion of Quarrels and Hostilities. Again, many things stand in need of human Labour and Culture, either for their Production, or to fit and prepare them for Use. But here it was very inconvenient that a Person, who had taken no pains about a thing, should have an equal Right to it with another, by whose Industry it was either first rais'd, or exactly wrought and fram'd, to render it of farther Service. It was highly conducive then to the common Peace, that immediately upon the Multiplication of Mankind, Properties should be appointed in moveable Things, especially such as require the Labour and Improvement of Men; and in those Immoveables which are of immediate and necessary Use, as Houses, for Instance; so that the Substance of them should belong either separately to particular Persons, or to such a number of Men as had by peculiar Covenant agreed to hold them in the way of positive Communion. Farther, although there appears some reason in these Things, why they should rather belong to some than to others; yet the Dominion or Property of them, such as implies the exclusion of all Persons besides, was to be confirm'd at least by tacit Compact¹: And this tacit Compact involv'd a tacit Cession of the rest of Mankind; intimating, that whatever had been assign'd for any one's private Share, they would never challenge any Right or Title to, upon pretence of its receiving its Matter, or its Nourishment, from the Earth, the common Habitation of Men. As for those Immoveables which Nature produc'd, without the concurrence of human Industry, that is, Lands, since they were so widely extended, as abundantly to satisfy the small number of the first Men; so much of them was from the beginning taken into Possession, as Men thought convenient for their present Occasions; the rest being left in its natural and negative Communion, to be possess'd by any Person that should afterwards think fit to use it. Here therefore² we must conceive a Covenant to have pass'd to this Effect: That those Lands which had been assign'd to particular Men by the express Agreement of the rest, or such as the rest were suppos'd to have resign'd all their Title to, by permitting a single Person quietly to enjoy, and by taking to themselves other Lands in the same manner, should belong to the Manurers and Improvers of them: And that what remain'd should pass into the Property of those who would afterwards fix upon it.

VII. That the settling distinct Properties turn'd to the real Benefit and Advantage of Men, when grown more Numerous, may be illustrated from the same Arguments which *Aristotle*¹ brings to overthrow the Platonick Communion of Goods. Though indeed his Design was to refute a positive Communion; whereas our Enquiry proceeds about the Reasons inclining Men to quit that Communion which ⁷ It is available by virtue of the Intention of the Creator, who has given Men this common Right, that they may make use of it. And every one ought to think, that it belongs to him to do no prejudice to the Rights of any other, who in their turn may one way or another plead the privilege of the first Occupant.

¹ By what I have said in the foregoing Notes, we may see that there is no need of any Renunciation, either express or tacit. This may suffice to rectify the attentive Reader in understanding all that our Author in the following part of this Work builds upon that false Principle, without which I should be obliged to enlarge my Notes to no purpose every moment to correct it.

² Our Author doth here by the by criticize upon an Expression of the Jewish Historian Josephus, l. i. c. 3. where he says, That Cain was the first that set bounds to Lands, Ἔπος τὸ πρῶτον ἔθετο, p. 7. in which he deserves, says our Author, not to be believed more, than in what he says in the same place, That Cain barbarously used and insolently treated all those that dwelt with him; that he gather'd great Wealth by Rapine and Violence, and that he cherish'd Companies of Thieves. For how can such things be attributed to the eldest Son of the first Man and first Woman, from whence all Mankind are descended? See Baader's Dissertation, entitled, An Exercitation upon Fl. Josephus's Antiq. Jud. Lib. i. c. 2. printed in 1701. and what is said, §. 10. &c. about the Primitive Community of Goods.

we have already shewn to be negative ^a 1. If, says he, Men labour'd in common, and laid up all they got in one Heap, out of which they were freely to take for their Support; 'tis impossible but that Heats and Quarrels should arise from the Inequality which must be observ'd between some Mens Getting and Spending ². In general (as he well remarks) the living together, and upon the same Stock and Maintenance, is grievous and uneasy. Which is the Reason that we are never so highly displeas'd with other Persons, as with our Servants and Family-Dependents, who are continually under our Eye. But now upon the introducing of Property, all these Complaints are silenc'd ³, every one grows more Industrious in improving his peculiar Portion; and Matter and Occasion is supplied for the Exercise of Liberality and Beneficence towards others. It were better therefore that Goods should be made proper as to the Possession ⁴, and should be common only in the Use. Again, To consider a thing as our own, raiseth the Pleasure we take in enjoying it ^b. To gratify and assist a Friend, a Guest, or a Companion, fills us with sensible Satisfaction and Delight; and this we cannot do, unless we have a separate Share of Good things to our selves. Besides, since there are few things which can be made use of by all Men at once, when many Persons should happen to set their Mind on the same Object, which could not suffice them together; they must of Necessity fall out, were not the desired Object already assign'd to a particular Owner. It must be confess'd these Reasons did not weigh so much with Sir Thomas More and Campanella, as to hinder them from setting up a Common of Goods, the former in his Utopia; the latter in his Realm of the Sun: It being much more easy to fancy perfect Men, than to find them ^c. But farther, we may hence too discover the Falsity of that vulgar Saying ⁶, Meum and Tuum are the cause of all the Wars and Quarrels in the World. For on the contrary the Distinction of Meum and Tuum was rather introduc'd to prevent all Contention. Hence Plato, LL. l. viii. p. 214. Ed. Wech. calls the Meer-stone ⁷, the Boundary of Friendship and Enmity, confirm'd by Oath, and approv'd of by the Gods. Of the Sacredness of the Landmark, see likewise Deut. xix. 14. Job xxiv. 2. L. xxvii. c. 21. D. de Terminorum. Collat. leg. Mosaicarum cum Rom. tit. 13. Paul. Sentent. i. 16. v. 22. Frontinus de re agrar. Let every one keep his own Bounds and not disturb those of other Men: for therefore was the Mark-stone set up, litem ut discerneret agris,—to end the Quarrels of the Field. But that infinite Field of Hostilities and Strifes arises only from hence ⁸, That the Avarice of Men is ever aiming to break through those Bounds of Meum and Tuum, which have been by Law or Covenant establish'd ^c.

VIII. Though what hath been here deliver'd seems plain and evident, yet we think it not impertinent to examine more largely the Opinions of some ancient and some modern Writers on this Subject. Amongst the former, Diodorus Siculus ^d reports, That the first Earth born Men led a wild and irregular Life, went out in Herds to seek their Food, which consisted of the most juicy Herbs, together with such Fruits as the Trees spontaneously produc'd: But not knowing how to bring their Provision together, and to lay up a Store for future use, many perish'd during the Winter, partly through the Inclemency of the Air, and partly through want of Sustenance; 'till by degrees gaining Instruction from Experience, they began to retire into Caves in the cold Season, and to reserve

Diōion.*) would not imitate Pythagoras, who taught, that among Friends Goods ought to be common. (Diog. Laert. l. x. §. 11.) He found it out, that such an Establishment betray'd Dissidence; he lik'd better that things should remain on the same foot, that every one might voluntarily contribute to the Wants of others when there was a necessity. He assures himself, that this Notion comes nearer Perfection, than to maintain a Community of Goods, and we can't sufficiently admire the Union of Epicurus's Followers, and the Goodness by which they assisted one another, while every one remain'd Master of his own Estate. See Cicero de finib. bonorum et malorum, l. i. c. 20.

a sufficient Stock of such Fruits as were fit for keeping : Some new Advantage or Improvement being every day added to Life ^a. This Hypothesis concerning the Origin of Mankind, though false, being taken for granted, it follows, that Men in the beginning liv'd upon the Supplies of Nature in common ; afterwards settling by Covenant the Property of Houses, and of Fruits treasur'd up for future Service, 'till by slow Advances the Appropriation of Land was introduc'd. To the same purpose is frequently alledg'd what Justin ^b relates of Saturn ¹, King of the Aborigines, who, he tells us, was so remarkable for exact Justice, As that no Person under his Reign liv'd in a Condition of Slavery, or held any private Possessions ; but all things, like one universal Patrimony, lay undivided, and in common to all. The Authorities of the Poets are likewise produc'd in great Numbers, where they describe the happy State of their golden Age, Virgil, Georg. I. 125, &c.

" *Nec signare quidem aut partiri limite campum
Fas erat : in medium quærebant.*

That is, God Almighty gave the World in common to Men, that they should live freely together, not that furious Avarice should claim the whole Store to itself, or that any one should want what was produc'd for the sake of all. This Saying of the Poet we ought not to take so strictly, as to imagine that in those Times there was no private Possession ; but in a figurative Sense, so usual in those Compositions ; giving us to understand, that Men were so generous and liberal, as not to shut up to themselves the Fruits of the Earth, or to lie hovering over a conceal'd and separate Store ; but that they admitted their poorer Neighbours to the common Enjoyment of what they had gotten by their own Pains. But indeed as no sensible Person will let the Poet persuade him, that these primitive Mortals had omnia in medium quæsitâ, or a positive Communion of Goods ; so the Reason which Lactantius assigns to those Expressions, doth not in our Judgment appear satisfactory : For as on the one side Men were not then perhaps greatly inclin'd to Covetousness, being yet ignorant of Wealth, and finding an easy Supply of Food from Nature's Store, whilst they remain'd Strangers to Delicacies and Excess; so, on the other side, we do not see what matter they could have for Bounty, when there was no occasion to scrape up Treasure. 'Tis a good Consideration that some recommend to us, in order to a right understanding of the whole Fable of the golden Age; that the dispositions of rustic and barbarous People make them almost natural Friends to Ease and Laziness, and Enemies to Labour; that the more rude and simple way of Life any Persons are engag'd in, the less inclinable they would be to Plenty and Luxury, to Magnificence and Splendor, which commonly require much Industry and Pains^a. And that, lastly, 'tis the general Vice of old Persons to commend the Times of their young and flourishing Days, to despise for the most part present things, and what they see before them; extolling whatever comes mark'd with the Advantages of Age; and that therefore it seems very probable, those rude and ignorant Men, when the Legislators compell'd them to a Life of Manners and of Industry^b, might be very uneasy under the Change, and frequently send out a Wish for their Acorns and their Idleness. From which Complaints of their old Sires Posterity might frame their Dreams about the golden Age. This Conjecture is strengthen'd by the Character which Salust^b gives of the Aborigines, the People of those primitive Times; They were, says he, a chawish Race of Men, without Laws or Government, tied up to no Order or Rule. And Ovid^c himself placeth the Happiness of the golden Days chiefly in this; that Men obeyed Faith and Honesty without Law, and fear'd no Punishment, because no civil Societies were yet establish'd.

There's a famous Place produc'd on this Head from Tully's first Book of Offices, c. 7.⁶ 'Tis the part of Justice to distinguish between Things common and peculiar, and to use them accordingly. Now nothing is private by Nature, but as it becomes so, either by antient Possession, as appropriated by the first Occupant, or by Conquest, upon the Right of Arms; or else by Law, Agreement, Condition, or Lot. Hence come the Names of the Arpinate and the Tusculan Lands. And in like manner are private Possessions settled and describ'd. Since therefore the Things which Nature made common, have by this means been turn'd into Property, let every Man quietly enjoy his Lot: Whoever covets more than this, shall be deem'd to have violated the Law of human Society.

Horace is sometimes brought in, giving his Judgment amongst the rest.

³ Mr. Le Clerc has thoroughly proved, that the Men, that lived in the Times when the golden and silver Ages were said to have been, were not a whit better than those of the following Ages. See his Notes upon Hesiod's Theogonia, ver. 211, and what he has extract'd out of it himself in an Article added to his Memoirs, De Treveux in March and April 1701, Tom. i.

⁵ This Poet makes the Felicity of the golden Age partly to consist in this, That they had neither Laws nor Punishments, but every one was free, in these Lines;

*Aurea prima fata est ætas, quæ, vindicæ nullo, Sponte sua sine lege fidem rectumque colebat.
Pæna metusque aberant.* —————

because they had no Cities.

⁶ Tully's Words are, Deinde justitiæ manus est, ut communibus utatur quis pro communibus, privatis ut suis. Sunt autem privata nulla natura, sed aut veteri occupatione, ut qui quondam in vacua venerunt, aut victoria, ut qui bello positi sunt, aut lege, passione, conditione, sorte. Ex quo fit, ut ager Arpinas Arpinatum dicatur, Tusculanus Tusculanorum, similisque est privatarum possessionum descriptio. Ex quo, quia suum cuiusque fit, eorum quæ fuerant natura communia, quod cuique obtigit, id quisque tenet, ex quo si quis sibi appetet, violabit jus humanæ societatis. But Mr. de Bynkershoek, in his Treatise De Dominio Maris, printed in 1703, Chap. i. believes, that about the middle of this Passage there is a Corruption, which he thus amends, aut lege, PACTIONE, CONDITIONE, ex quo fit, ut ager FORTE Arpinas Arpinatum dicatur. Upon this Supposition the Translation must be, Or Law and Compact, whence it is that the Country of Arpinas, for Example, belongs to that City, &c. The Reason why this Author changes sorte into forte, and puts it in another Place, is, because the parting of Goods made by Lot always supposes an Agreement publick or private. He might likewise have said, that Cicero, who often uses Words synonymous, and is not very exact in his Divisions, would, after he had spoken of Covenants in general, add some particular kind, as he knew is very common in the best Latin Authors. But then still there will a Doubt remain, whether in Cicero's Days the Word FORTE was used in the Sense, for Example, as the Roman Lawyers use it now. Nor is the Law which Mr. Bynkershoek quotes here very suitable in my Opinion to establish that Sense, for there 'tis nisi forte, an Expression very common, in which the last Word is not likely to signify, verbi gratia, Digest. l. vii. tit. 1. De usufructu. &c. leg. 9. § 7.

Each vain Possessor cheats himself a while,
But Fortune is the Mistress of the Soil.

The same Author hath told us as much in Prose.
Nature ¹⁰, saith he, hath made us Lords and Proprietors of nothing; but obtaining by Law and Succession the use of things, for an uncertain Period, we pass for the ελιγοχρονοί δεσπόται, the temporary Masters or Possessors of them; and when the appointed Term is over, then another receives them from our Hands, and enjoys the same Name and Title. But indeed these kind of Speeches refer rather to the Instability of Fortune and of human Possessions, than to the Original of Property ^a.

IX. We proceed to examine Grotius's Opinion;

^b in which we shall pass over what he delivers contrary to the receiv'd Doctrine of the Church, as sufficiently refuted by other Hands. He tells us then, That God conferr'd on Mankind a Right in General to things of this inferior Nature, both immediately upon the Creation of the World, and again upon the repairing of it after the Flood. This we allow in the following Sense, that God empower'd Mankind to use these earthly Things, in a General Manner; that is, without determining whether they ought to possess, either under Division, or in Common, all, or only some things; but leaving this whole Matter to the Judgment and the Choice of Men, to settle it according as they should think most convenient for the publick Peace and Welfare. But we ought by no means to suppose, that any positive Communion was at the beginning instituted by divine Appointment; from which Men afterwards departed by their own Decree; for, on the contrary, with regard to Almighty God, things were rather laid, as a Free-Stock, to be us'd in any Service that Men should apply them to. Amongst whom, so long as the very Substances of things were not assign'd to particular Persons, we must conceive this tacit Compact to have prevail'd, That every Man should take for his Occasions whatever he pleas'd, especially of the Fruits, and should consume what was in its Nature consumeable. And such a universal use of things supplied, in some sort, the room of Property; and what any Person had thus taken for himself, none could deprive him of, without Injustice. Now as the Simile borrow'd from the Theatre, which Grotius produceth, fitly enough illustrates this Matter ^c, so his other Instance of the Aborigines is not applicable, as Justin describes them ^d. For the Historian's Words represent some positive Communion, quite different from the primitive; as if the whole Country was indeed the Possession of the People, but not yet divided into private Estates; whilst Men rested satisfied with the Fruits produced without their Assistance, such as the vast extent of the Lands and Woods afforded them in great abundance, their Number being as yet inconsiderable: But that they gathered these Fruits into a common Store doth not seem probable. Thus far Grotius ^e is in the right, that were the first negative Communion to continue, without disturbing the general Peace, Men must live with great plainness and simplicity, contented to feed on what they found, to dwell in Caves, and either to go naked, or to cover their Bodies with the Barks of Trees, and the Skins of Beasts: Whereas, if they grew more inclined to a Life of Elegance and Refinement, the Conveniences of which must be acquir'd by Diligence; there was a necessity of introducing distinct Properties. But when he adds, That this Communion might have lasted, had Men liv'd under the Influence of an eminent Charity and Friendship towards each other; he confounds negative Communion with positive; such as was observed by the Essenes of old,^a by the primitive Christians inhabiting Jerusalem, and by those who now follow an Ascetick Life^b: For this can never be constituted nor kept up, except amongst a few Persons, and those endued with singular Modesty and Goodness. When Men are scattered into different places, and fixed at a distance from each other, 'twould be a foolish Labour to gather all the Provision into one Heap, and to distribute it out of the common Mass. And where ever there is a great Multitude of People, many must of necessity be found, who through Injustice and Avarice, will refuse to maintain a due Equality, either in the Labour required for the getting of the Fruit, or afterwards in the Consumption of them. Plato insinuates as much as this^c, when he makes only Deities, and the Sons of Deities, Members of the Republick where he would have this Communion absolutely obtain. But 'tis idle to believe, that when Men were divided into numerous Families, they neither actually establish'd, or had any design to establish such a Communion^d. Lastly, it's a true Remark of Grotius,^e That things were at first turn'd into Property, not by the bare Act of the Mind, or by Thought and inward inclination. For neither could others know what any Person intended to keep for his own, to direct them in abstaining from it; and besides, 'twas very possible that many should be Competitors for the same thing. There was need therefore of some external Act^f, or of formal Seisin, which, that it might be capable of producing a Moral Effect, or an Obligation in others to forbear what each Man had thus taken for his peculiar, must necessarily have depended on the force of some precedent Covenant: When things which lay together in Common were to be parted amongst many, then the Business was transacted by express Covenant. But a tacit Covenant was sufficient, when Men fix'd a Property in things which the first Dividers had left for waste^g. For we must suppose them to have agreed, that whatever in the primary Partition had not been assign'd to any particular Owner, should belong to him who first took possession of it.

X. Amongst the other Moderns, many, as to the Origin of Property, establish a quite contrary Notion. Let us take the pains to see what strength their Arguments afford. They acknowledge then a double Sense of the Term Communion, so as to import either that which being undivided, and having its Property fix'd in many together, affords a common Service to each Person; or that which being in no manner appropriated, lies free for the promiscuous Use of all. But then they exclude from the primitive State of things, not only the former Communion (which is no more than we have done) but likewise the latter; and so deny that things were in the beginning exposed as a general Store, void of Property in every kind; and therefore (which is the consequence of this) that Properties sprung originally from Division, and from first Possession. The Reason they lay down is to this purpose; Whatever Right that was, which either in Kind or Degree the first Man enjoy'd over other Creatures, he receiv'd it all in that very manner from his Creator. If therefore he receiv'd a bare Power of using, without any settled Property, his Descendants could not afterwards usurp a Property, without incurring the Guilt of unlawful and covetous Desire, and of arrogating that to themselves, which their Maker had forbidden them to assume. The Answer to this is easy, from what hath been formerly advanced: Man receiv'd indeed, by the Divine Donation, a Right to things: but such a Right as was indefinite, general, and indifferent, neither restrain'd to Property, nor to Communion; and such as Men might reduce, as it were, into any particular Form, according as Reason or Necessity should advise. Whence it is also clear, that the primitive Communion did not denote a bare Usus fructus, but Men were at their liberty to quit it by Agreement, and to establish either Property or positive Communion in its stead. Nor is this any Consequence; the first Man did not receive or assume a Right to things in the formal Nature of Property, therefore his Posterity could not exercise it under that Formality. Neither doth that Divine Grant express'd in holy Scripture, describe any determinate manner of Property, but only and indefinite Right of applying things to such Uses as should be agreeable to the Wisdom, and to the Occasions of Men; which Right may be exercis'd full as well in a negative Communion, as in a positive. Besides, 'tis not fair thus to conclude; Men receiv'd a Right to things from the Donation of God, therefore Property did not first arise from Occupancy and Division. For this Donation of God only gave Men full Security and Satisfaction, that 'twas consistent with the Divine Will they should consume on their Necessities, the Works of their common Maker. But Property, strictly so called, ought to have produc'd this Effect, in relation to other Men, that none else should invade what had been adjudg'd to one particular Possessor. And here certainly there was need of some human Act and Agreement, that others might know what belong'd to every distinct Person, so as to quit all Pretensions to it, when thus appropriated before. A Theatre is erected by the State for the common Use of the Subjects: But that in the time of the Show, this or that Person should obtain a particular Seat, of which others ought not to deprive him, is owing to some corporal Act, that is, to his first seizing upon it. Nay, each Person may, with the consent of the Publick, acquire a Seat which he shall hold by a perpetual Right. Thus, before any human Act had pass'd capable of introducing Property, every thing must be conceiv'd to have lain free and common (in a negative Sense) to all; that is, not to have appertained to one rather than to another. But when Divisions were establish'd by express, or Possessions confirm'd by tacit Covenant, then things pass'd out of this negative Communion, into settled Properties.

If any will come so low as to assert, That by the Dominion which God conferr'd on Men antecedently to any Acts of theirs, is meant only a potential Dominion, or a Power of taking and possessing; and consequently no more than a Dominion in actu primo; from which they pass'd on to Possession, and from Possession to Dominion in actu secundo: These Men differ from our Opinion in Words only, not in Sense. Yet in this respect they are not sufficiently accurate, that call the Power of entering upon things, Dominion in actu primo; and the Right which follows Possession, Dominion in actu secundo. For the Power of acquiring any Right, and the Right it self now habitually inhering, yet without Operation or Exercise, are different things. As 'tis quite another case to be a Musician potentially, and not to use the Art, when the Habit of it hath been fully attain'd. Nor is their potential Dominion very aptly illustrated by the Example, they bring of Inheritances; the Dominion of which, upon the Testator's Death, passeth out of the Habit, or Power, directly and immediately upon the Heir, without the Formality of taking possession. For, besides that to pass out of a Habit, or, out of Power, is by no means the same thing; there is always a Fiction of Civil Law conceiv'd to interpose in the Case which they alledge. 'Tis the Rule of Nature, that in the transferring of Dominion from one to another, it shall be requisite for the former Person to tender what is thus convey'd, and for the latter to accept and receive it. But inasmuch as the Laws have consented, that the Will of the Testator shall remain uncertain and changeable 'till his last Breath, and shall be accounted secret 'till after his Decease; they therefore hold, as 'twere, in suspense, the Will of the deceas'd Person importing the conveyance of Goods on his Heir, 'till such time as the Heir shall have signified his Acceptance; or (as some may choose to express it) they bring back the Heir's Acceptance to the Moment in which the Testator expired, his Will being then properly fix'd and settled; so that from that time the Goods are conceiv'd to pass immediately to the Heir, as deliver'd to him. This Fiction produceth so far the Effect of Dominion in the Heir, as that he may challenge the Inheritance, even before he is actually possessed of it. And without such a Fiction^a, the Dominion would no more belong to a Man in an Inheritance before actual Entrance, than it doth in a Donation before Acceptance. And hence too, amongst Persons who live only under the direction of the Law of Nature, which is for the most part unacquainted with these Fictions introduced by civil Constitutions, there will be no admittance given to any potestative Possession as opposed to actual; nor will the bare Right and Power of acquiring Possession obtain the Name of Possession it self^a.

XI. Many have thought fit to appeal to the Authority of Scripture in this Point; whence they have suppos'd that it may be made evident, that there never was any such Communion as we have asserted, in the World: They tell us, That the universal Miss of things pass'd immediately to Adam, by virtue of the Divine Donation; so that he held it as his own proper and entire Possession. The force of which Propriety was such, that it not only excluded all others from the universal Possession which he enjoy'd, but likewise from the Right of taking to themselves any one particular thing: Insomuch that even his Children could claim no Property, so long as they continued in the Family of their Father, unless he convey'd somewhat to them in the manner of a peculium, or separate Stock: That they became Proprietors, first, by possessing that share which he assigned them, when dismiss'd from under his Tuition; and afterwards, upon his Death, by dividing his Store amongst themselves^b. They explain their Notion in this manner: The Form of God's Grant conferr'd a Right only on the primitive Pair, before they had Children. Therefore either the Property of things was given to Adam and Eve originally, so that their Descendants were to derive from them all their Title to any Possession; or else the whole World was, in the Person of Adam, bestow'd in common on all Mankind. The latter of these as it implies several Difficulties, so it is particularly repugnant to the Right of Occupancy, which obtains only in things void of a Possessor. For if the entire Miss was given to all Mankind, it doth not appear, how a particular person could by seizing any thing to himself, convert it into his distinct Property, exclusive of human Race in general, or, so as to hinder Men from making any Pretensions to it by virtue of their common Right. For such is the Nature of things which lie in common, and which admit only of undivided Shares, that every single Atom of their Substance is no less common, and no less undivided, than the whole; so that if any private Man apply it to himself alone, he is an injurious Robber of the Community. But now, they who defend a primitive Communion, confess that the first Occupants of things did by that Act acquire such a distinct Right over those things, as excluded the Right of all others to the same. What Reply may be made to all this, is evident from the Assertions already confirm'd^c. The divine Donation confer'd on Man a Right of applying other Creatures to his use; which Right was indifferent to positive

^b Mr. Hertius observes here, that this permission which was given to Adam, and renewed to Noah, does make no mention of any thing but living Creatures, as I have already observed above, §. 4. Note 3. out of Mr. Lock, of whom it appears from other places, that Mr. Hertius had seen the Treatise of Civil Government in the French Translation which was printed in 1691.

Communion, or to Property; being of necessity to be turn'd into one of these, before it could take any Effect with relation to other Men. And therefore when others add further, That the common or publick Dominion of Mankind over things was given by God, under Condition, that they should parcel it out, and constitute it private; for which reason, it neither can, nor ought to be conceived without a respect and tendency towards private Dominion, so to be established as was agreeable to a rational and a social Nature: This we may without any inconvenience interpret on our side. That is, God by his first Grant plac'd things in a negative Communion: But since that was unable to procure the safety and peace of Society, when human Race was multiplied, and Life began, by the Arts of Industry, to be polish'd and improv'd, Men easily apprehended that 'twas the divine Pleasure they should introduce distinct Properties. In order to the actual Settlement of which, it was requisite that some Transactions and Agreements of Men should precede. For that a thing should be appointed by the Will of God, and yet should not be introduced but by some antecedent Compact of Men, ought not to be look'd on as an inconsistency: As it is certainly none, that God would have Mankind propagated by Marriage, not by uncertain Lust; and yet Marriage is not actually contracted between particular Persons without some Covenant passing before. Farther, since positive Communion and Property both imply a relation to other Men, it can with no manner of accuracy be said, That all created things were proper to Adam; but only thus, That he held the Dominion of all things, not formally, but permissively; inasmuch as there was then no Right of any Person else to interfere with his, and to hinder him from converting every thing to his own Use, had there been occasion. When God was pleas'd to give him a dear Partner and Companion, they agreed to hold this indefinite Right over things without dividing it: as being united to each other in the strictest Band of Society: For which Reason many Nations at this Day observe a Communion of Goods between the Husband and the Wife. Nor was there any need of separate Properties, so long as Adam's Children, being yet in their Minority, were to be maintain'd by their Father, and made but one House. For though in the use of things, they were at that time obliged to conform to their Father's Pleasure, yet this proceeded not from his Dominion (strictly speaking) over the Things, but from his paternal Power and Authority over the Persons. Therefore the Property of things came then to be distinct, when by Consent of the Father the Sons fell into separate Families; which Separation was undoubtedly owing to the Emulation between Brothers; and to another good Reason, that every one's own Industry might be his own Advantage; as the Idleness of others might be a Punishment only to themselves. Nor must we believe that the whole World was presently shar'd out amongst that small Number of Persons; or that all things were turn'd into Property by one Act, and at one time. But it was sufficient at first to fix a Property in those things, which either afford an immediate use, not capable of being divided amongst many; as Cloaths, Cottages, and Stores of Provision already gather'd by particular Men; or which require Industry and Improvement to make them fit for Service; as Household Goods, and Instruments, Cattle and Fields². By degrees, what remain'd was brought under the same Condition; according as either the Inclination, or the Number of Men directed and advis'd. Thus the Pasturage continued a great while in its first and common State; till upon the abundant Increase of Cattle, Quarrels arising, the Division of this likewise was made necessary to Peace and Concord. As for that part of the Argument, That the Right of Occupancy cannot be admitted, where Possession belongs to a general Body; this will hold good against those who pretend any positive Communion to have been the primitive State of Things; in which indeed no private Person can take any thing to himself, exclusive of the whole Society. But the primitive Condition in which we have plac'd things, is equally distant from positive Communion, and from Propriety in the strict sense of the Word: And we assert, that before Occupancy can produce Dominion, it is necessary that some Compact (a tacit one at least) should have been first settled to that Effect.

XII. Others form their Scripture Account of the Origin of Dominion in this manner: That God gave our first Parents that common Dominion which he design'd for all Men in general, to be held undivided; inasmuch as the primitive Pair represented the Person of all human Race: In which sense it may still rightly enough be said, That the Dominion of the World, or of the things in the World, as they are capable of passing into Property, belongs to Mankind. But this common Dominion doth not exclude private; since we neither can, nor ought to conceive it without a respect and tendency to private Dominion, so to be constituted as should be agreeable to a rational and a social Nature. But in Adam the latter of these Dominions met in Conjunction with the former, excluding his Children without any previous Cession or Surrendry². Now, as to this Account, we will make no Quarrel about words; that is, we allow the Name of common Dominion to what we ourselves have rather chose to call a Right of using the Creatures, inherent in Men by virtue of the Divine Concession; provided this common Dominion, consider'd by itself, be suppos'd to obtain no Effect between Man and Man. On which Point we have before affirm'd, that Men might have rested satisfy'd with that Right of using things as they lay in common; and that 'twas not necessary separate Dominions should immediately be introduc'd, so long as Men were yet few in number, and follow'd a simple unimprov'd way of living; but when their Race was considerably multiplied, and when Industry had advanc'd the Conveniences of Life, then the necessary Regard to the Preservation of Society recommended the Distinction of Properties; yet so as that things did not pass all at once into this Condition, but successively, according as the occasional Methods of Peace and Agreement seem'd to demand. But that Adam held a private Dominion over all things, before his Sons had left him, to set up Families of their own, is a very negligent Assertion.

MR. BARRÉ'S NOTES on §. XI.

² It appears from the Sacred History, that in Abraham's Time Men went from one Place to another with their Families, Servants, and Flocks, which were their Riches. We also see that Patriarch followed that Custom in the Land, wherein he was a Stranger. So that at that time great part of that Country was common, and when there was not room enough in one place to feed the Flocks of divers persons, they parted by common Agreement, as Abraham and Lot did. 'Tis also observ'd, that the most antient Inhabitants of Greece lead such a wandering Life, about which consult the Historical Explication of the Fable of Ceres by Mr. Le Clerc in the Bibliothec. Universel. Tom. 6. p. 104, 105.

For first, private Dominion always takes its Rise from some human Act; therefore Adam could not have such a Dominion over those things, which he was so far from having taken Possession of, that they did not so much as fall under his Knowledge.

That Place of the *Civil Law*¹, L. iii. §. 1. *D. De adquir. possess.*² is very unfitly applied to the present Business; as if Adam, by setting his Feet on one part of the Earth, should be suppos'd to have taken Possession of the whole World. If any one persists in giving the Name of Property to that Right of using things which Men receiv'd by the Grant of their Creator, then we might admit what these Authors lay down, That Property was the Cause of Occupancy and Division; or that it was therefore lawful for Men to challenge things to themselves by laying hands upon them, and by parting them into separate Shares, because God had given them a general Commission to apply other Creatures to their own Use. But if we take the Word Property in its strict and general Sense, as it denotes the Exclusion of all others from a particular thing already assign'd to one; then 'tis altogether true, that Division and Occupancy are the Causes of Property. Farther, Adam's Children, whilst they yet continued part of their Father's Family, were bound indeed to obey his Pleasure in regard to their use of things; yet this, as was before observ'd, proceeded not from the Force of any private Dominion in Adam, but from the Force of his paternal Power. For whilst they were young and helpless, he was oblig'd to maintain them. And when they were capable of doing some Service, still the same paternal Authority required both that in using the common Store they should be guided by their Father's Directions, lest they should incur any Mischief by Intemperance; and likewise that such things as they had either gather'd from a spontaneous Growth, or had produc'd by their own Industry, they should deliver into the Hands of their Father, to be given out as he should think fit: And he, so long as he enjoy'd this Right, was bound to provide Necessaries for his Children, even after they were arriv'd at Maturity, as Time and Occasion should require. And hence, if any one of his Sons should, for instance, contrary to his Prohibition have privately feasted with too much Greediness on some particular Fruit, the Youth had been by no means guilty of Theft, but of Disobedience to his Father's Command. Or, if Adam had order'd one that was grown up to gather Provision for the Sustenance of a young Brother, and the Party thus employ'd had either devour'd it himself, or laid it up secretly for his future Use, he deserv'd Correction, not for Theft, but for violating the Charge which his Father laid upon him. During this Period therefore, neither Adam nor his Children had any private Dominion:

The Right of primitive Communion was sufficient for his Turn; and as for them, they in the Exercise of the same Right depended on his Care and Guidance. So that Adam's private Dominion then began, when he dismissed his Sons from under his Tuition, and gave them leave to erect separate Families for themselves.

XIII. Let us consider too the Arguments of those who maintain that this primitive Communion was impossible^b. They say, That such a Communion neither could have been, nor ought to have been, in the State of Innocence; because as every Order and Method is conformable to right Reason; so the most comely Order of possessing those things, the Dominion of which God had granted to Mankind, agreed in an especial manner to that State, in which the Virtue of abstaining from what was another's deserv'd to bear an honourable Name. Whence the Decalogue, as it establisheth the Duty of forbearing the Goods of others, so it secures every one in the Enjoyment of a certain and separate Possession. To this we answer,

First, That we can have no such clear Evidence what kind of Life (with respect to these external things) Men would have led, had they continued in their first sinless Condition; and consequently whether the Community, or the Propriety, of things would have been most suitable to that State.

But farther; we may venture to make it a Question, whether it be not a higher Degree, a greater Perfection of Virtue to enjoy quietly a common Provision, and to desire no particular Advantage above the rest who have the same Title to it, than to abstain from the distinct Portion of others?

Lastly, Whatever we are to say as to the Eternity of the Law of Nature, thus much is certain; That there's no Necessity every Object of that Law should have always existed^c, many of them proceeding, in the course of Time, from the Agreements and Institution of Men: Thus the Law against Murder had no Object, whilst Adam was the only Person in the World; nor the Law against Adultery, whilst none of his Sons were arriv'd to Man's Estate; nor the Law against Theft, before the Division of Things; nor the Law against bearing False-witness, before the judicial Processes were introduc'd; nor the Law against covering the House, the Man-servant, or Maid-servant, of others, whilst they lodg'd in Caves, and e're Servitude was establish'd; nor lastly, the Law of honouring Parents, before Eve was a Mother^c. They proceed to tell us, That neither was such a Community possible in the State of Men after the Fall: First, Because we can't so much as form any Nation of it in our Mind: For Grotius so describes its Laws and Rules, as that every Person might immediately seize for his Use what he pleas'd, and might consume any thing that was consumable. But such an Exercise of the general Right serv'd then instead of Property: for what any one had thus seized, none else could take from him without Injury. Therefore this Notion establisheth a Property in Community, and consequently implies a Contradiction; the only End and Effect of Property being this, That one Person should not rob and plunder another. But here they vainly pretend a Difficulty where there is none: For antecedently to any human Act, and to the use of any thing in the World, when the bare Case is thus, That each thing belongs no more to one Man than to another, and consequently belongs alike to neither; the primitive Communion bears a different Aspect from what it hath, after Men begin to lay hands upon the general Store, and to imploy it in their Service; Since in the latter Case, by virtue of a previous Covenant, whatever any Man hath seized for his private Use, becomes his Property. Otherwise Men must altogether abstain from the Use of things. Hence in this qualified Communion, as we may call it, the Substances of things belong to none, but their Fruits become matter of Property, when gather'd. This Notion of Community, temper'd with such a degree of Property, may, we think, be easily apprehended by Persons of no very nice or philosophical Heads. To give a plain Instance: The Acorns were his that took the pains of getting them, but the Oak had no particular Owner. Thus much being laid down, the way is the better clear'd towards answering what they farther object. They pretend, that such a Communion could not possibly last one Moment of Time, that it was contrary to the human or rational Nature, savage, and unsciable; and consequently is capable of affording no other Use, than that from it, as a feign'd Hypothesis, may be shewn the Necessity of a distinct or private Dominion in a civil State.

It's true, this Communion consider'd precisely in itself, and before any Application and Exercise of it, could not subsist, unless Men could have always walk'd naked, and liv'd without eating. Yet why it should not subsist, when thus qualified with a mixture of Property, there was nothing to hinder whilst the number of Men was yet few, and their Life plain and unrefined. It is certain however, that the more Mankind was multiplied, and the more Life was improv'd, the greater Necessity there was of appropriating more things than before. Hence those People lead but a rude and barbarous Life, who make the nearest Approach to the primitive Communion; those, suppose, who live on Herbs, Roots, Fruits of chance growth, and what they take in hunting and in fishing, and who claim no other Estate and Wealth than a Cave with its wretched Furniture. Farther, when we assert that all things were by Nature negatively common, we don't mean that the Law of Nature commands Men perpetually to preserve such a State; but that things, if consider'd antecedently to any act of Men, were so dispos'd, as that no one Person should claim them rather than another. On the other side, in affirming that Men left this Communion upon the advice and direction of Reason, we pretend not that it was necessary all things should be appropriated in the same Moment; but according as the Temper or Condition of Men, the Nature of the things themselves, and the difference of Place required; and as was judg'd most convenient for the cutting off all manner of Quarrel or Dissension. And therefore, neither are we, who are utterly banish'd the primitive Communion, nor those barbarous Nations which still retain many Foot-steps of it, guilty in this respect of a Breach of the Law of Nature. Thus too, what they add hath little Difficulty: After the Fall, say they, Men could not live without Law, and yet maintain a social Life; therefore, neither without the distinction of Properties; since the Communion of things is inconsistent with Law, which is wont to assign and distribute particular Possessions. But since all Laws do not presuppose separate Dominion, why might not those others be observ'd so as to keep up a Life of Society under that qualified Communion? Tho' it must be confess'd, that before the Division of Properties a very few Heads of Law might have been sufficient for the Government of Mankind. Therefore when Servius, in his Observations on Virgil^a, reports it as the Reason why Ceres was by the Antients called *Legifera*², and her Rites Thestophoria, because she is said to have been the Fountress of Laws; inasmuch as before the Invention of Corn Men wander'd about without Law or Government; which wild Condition was taken off, after Corn came into use; and after Laws had been instituted upon the Division of Land. This Account ought not to be admitted without some Limitation. Indeed a more pompous Train of Laws became needful after Proprieties were fixed, Men being ruled before by a small number of Ordinances; yet Communion consider'd by itself, doth not render Life altogether lawless and unsciable, but only more simple and unpolish'd; and, as it were, not well settled and compacted. As for Platonical Community, it hath nothing to do with the Case before us; it being professedly positive, and extended not only to Goods, but to Wives and Children.

XIV. We may hence discover in what Sense we are to take that Assertion laid down by some Authors, That Property and Dominion belong to the Law of Nature, strictly so called, and which is written in the Minds of Men. Where 'tis to be observ'd, that this Expression, such or such a thing belongs to, or is of the Law of Nature, hath a different Meaning, according as 'tis spoke either of any express or immediate Command, or else of some Custom or Institution establish'd in human Life. In the first Sense it imports, that the Law of Nature enjoins the doing, or the not doing of such a Matter: In the second, that sound Reason adviseth the Reception and Settlement of such a thing amongst Men, from the general Consideration of a social Life. For as for those Customs or Regulations which are introduc'd for the particular Advantage of separate Commonwealths, such are said to proceed from civil or positive Law. When therefore 'tis demanded whether or no Property owes its Original to the Law of Nature, the latter Sense of the Word is to be regarded, and not the former: That is, inasmuch as a social Life is the very Foundation of a natural Law, and since it is at the same time sufficiently evident from the Temper and Genius of Mankind, that in a great Multitude, where all join their Endeavours towards improving Life with various Inventions, the Peace and Beauty of Society could not be kept up without distinct Dominions of things; such Dominions were therefore settled; and this very rightly and agreeable to the Aim of nature's Laws, human Affairs plainly requiring it to be done. And after this Establishment, the same Law commands the observance of every thing that may conduce to the End for which these private Dominions were erected: Yet was there no express and determinate Command of the Law of Nature, by virtue of which all things ought to be brought under Property, immediately upon the Origin of Mankind, or in all Places alike; but Property was gradually introduced, according as it appear'd requisite to the common Peace. But the Precept of Nature about abstaining from what is another's then first began to exert its Force, when at length Men, by mutual Agreement, had mark'd out and appointed what should belong to others, and what each Person should claim as his own. Before this time it lay conceal'd (as it were virtually or potentially) in that general Precept which enjoins us to stand to our Covenants, and not to injure the Right of our Neighbour. Not is it any Absurdity to affirm, that the Obligation we lie under, not to invade the Goods of others, is coeval with human Race. And yet that Distinction of meum and tuum was afterwards ordained. Thus we are often bound to yield Obedience, before we know what will be enjoin'd: As when we have an Obligation in general to follow the Directions of some certain Person in all things that he shall hereafter require us to perform; or when we may suppose several particular Commands to be implied in some general Rule ¹.

XV. 'Tis needful in this place to add a word or two concerning the Subject of Property; on which Head the principal Question is, Whether those are capable of being Proprietors, who have not the use of Reason, as Infants and delirious Persons? Now here it is certain, that neither of these can originally acquire the Property of any thing, or make it their own by taking immediate Possession of it. The Reason is, because in this Method of acquiring Property the Intention of the Acquisitor is necessary, signifying that he will for the future hold such a thing as his own; and he should at the same time be able to understand, that such an Act is effectual towards the creating a Right in him. But this cannot be supposed in the Persons of whom we speak. Yet, as to the obtaining the Property of such things as are deriv'd upon them from others, the Case is different. For tho' here likewise, to make a thing pass to me from another, 'tis in the common and regular course requir'd, that I have an Understanding able to judge of what is done ¹, and to shew by Signs proceeding from real Intention, that I am willing to receive such a thing, and to keep it to my self; yet 'tis the receiv'd Practice of all civiliz'd Nations to permit Children in their most tender Age, and even before their Birth ², to receive and to retain a Property descending to them: And this is no more than what natural Reason and Equity advis'd; inasmuch as the things which Men usually appropriate, belong to the Use and Service of Life, and are no less necessary for Infants than for grown Persons; nay indeed somewhat more necessary for the former; who, by reason of their Weakness in Body and Mind, cannot so well provide for their own Occasions. In Infants therefore a presumed Consent is judg'd equivalent to a formal Acceptance; it being taken for granted, that no one will refuse what conduceth to his Benefit: Yet on Account of their Immaturity of Judgment, the Possession only, and not the Exercise, of this Right could be confer'd upon them. The general Customs of Nations in their Favour might allow them to hold, but not to use any thing by their own Disposal ³. However, lest their Right should by this means come to nothing, Humanity farther requir'd, that Persons of Years and Discretion should act as their Representatives, in the Management of their Goods, till they are capable of understanding it themselves. This Management is either committed to a certain Person by him who transfers the Goods upon them; or, in civil States, the Matter is settled by Direction of the Laws, and of the Magistrates; or, where both these Provisions are wanting, nearness of Blood, or of Habitation, or the bare Law of general Kindness, recommends the good Office to fit Hands ⁴. But all Persons who have engag'd themselves in this Case, by what means soever they came to be entrusted with it, are oblig'd to discharge it with the utmost Fidelity; in regard to that tender Age, insufficient for its own Guidance and Defence. Therefore Hesiod ranks in the same Class of Sinners him that hath hurt a Stranger, or one that sued to him for Protection; him that hath defil'd his Brother's Bed; him that hath used rigorous Treatment toward an antient Parent;

Diogenes Laert. (in Solon) gives us a Law of Solon's much to the same purpose; ordaining, That no Guardian should cohabit with the Mother of his Ward, and that he should be incapable of the Guardianship, to whom the Estate fell upon the Minor's Decease. See also Menage upon this Passage of Diog. Laert.

Plato³ in his Books of Laws (lib. xi. p. 972. Edit. Weckel.) calls Orphans, The greatest and most sacred Charge: Where he likewise offers many Considerations about the Duty of Guardians. Yet that a Man should sustain this Office and Trust without Reward, or with Expence, Humanity and Equity do not always require. Grotius and his Commentators, viz. Bacler, Ziegler, and Felden may be consulted farther on this Subject, in their Observations upon Grotius, B. II. l. iii. c. 6. where they endeavour to prove, contrary to his Judgment, that Infants have a Propriety in their own Goods, not only in respect of the first Act, or Right of possessing, but also in respect of the second Act, or administration of their Goods by themselves; for say they, "The Guardians have only the bare Management of the Right and Goods of another." In all appearance this contest is about words only.

WE are in the next place to enquire into the Object of Property, or to examine what things are capable of coming under that Condition. Now to give a thing this Capacity, we judge these two Qualifications to be necessary¹: First, That it be able to afford some use to Men, mediately or immediately; by itself, or by its connexion with somewhat else: And Secondly, That it be some way or other so far under the Power of Men, as that they may fasten on it, and keep it for their Occasions. And farther, since Property implies a Right of excluding others from your Possession, without which Right would be altogether insignificant, if it could not be effectually exercised; 'twould be in vain for you to claim that as your own, which you can by no means hinder others from sharing with you.

II. Yet some things there are, which, tho' very beneficial to Mankind, yet by reason of their vast Extent, are inexhaustible, so that all may enjoy them together, and yet no Man suffer in his particular use. To appropriate things of this Nature, would be malicious and inhuman: And on this account 'tis usual to attribute an exemption from Property¹ to the Light and Heat of the Sun², to the Air, to the running Water, and the like³: Although since Nature, by denying Men Wings,

² Cajacius in his Observations, l. x. c. 7. brings two Examples; the one of the shadow of the Plane-tree, the other of the Air; upon which a Tax was laid. The one is found in Pliny, l. xii. c. 1. The other is in Cedrenus, who relates it of Michael Palaeologus. See Mr. Selden's Mare Clausum, c. 21.

³ Nothing hinders nevertheless but we may appropriate these things to ourselves in some manner, as to such an extent as is contained within our own Lands. Our Author himself falls voluntarily upon the Subject of running Waters, l. iii. c. 3. §. 4. But we must say, that by the Laws of Humanity we are obliged not to deny any Man the lawful use of these Things, Titius Observ. 287. See also Mr. Thomasius's Instit. Jurisprud. Divin. l. ii. c. 10. §. 127. I observe also, that our Author follows that Notion in his Elementis Jurispr. Universit. p. 84. See also §. 4. following.

hath made the use of the Earth necessary to their using the Light; hence it comes to pass, that some Persons may be utterly debarr'd from the latter; as Criminals, for instance, in their Dungeon. In like manner, since the Air is in some places more clear and pure than in others, in this respect the value of a place may be enhanced. As we see Men who allow pleasure any share in their choice, very highly regard the prospect of Buildings, or of Lands, and especially of the former: For which reason those Services ⁴ have been introduc'd ^a, of not raising a Building higher; of Lights, and of not hindring Lights; of Prospects, and of not hindring Prospects. So though on other accounts no one will pretend to fix a Property in the Wind ⁵, yet we may appoint a Service or Duty of not intercepting the Wind to the prejudice of our Mills ⁶.

III. We are likewise to observe, That as the Substances of those things which Men have Dominion over, are compos'd of different kinds of Matter; so each thing is taken and possess'd in that way which the condition of its Nature admits: For the more closely any thing can be confin'd, and as it were shut up, the more easily will it produce the effects of Property against the Claims of others. And consequently, the more capable a thing is of being guarded from unjust Invaders, the greater Security we promise our selves in the Property of it. Yet, as we are not immediately to conclude a thing exempt from Property, because it cannot without some trouble be kept from other Hands; so in case a thing be in so wide a manner spread and diffus'd, as that either 'tis morally impossible it should fall under any method of keeping, or that it cannot be kept without much greater charges than the Fruits and Advantages of it would countervail, it is not to be supposed, that any Person desires to fix a Property which can bring him nothing but Burthen and Expence in defending it ¹. Though, to render a thing capable of being appropriated, it is not strictly necessary that we should inclose it, or be able to inclose it within artificial Bounds ², or such as are different from its own Substance; 'tis sufficient if the compass and extent of it can be any way determin'd. And therefore Grotius hath given himself a needless Trouble, when to prove Rivers capable of Property, he useth this Argument, ^b That although they are bounded by the Land at neither end, but united to other Rivers, or the Sea, yet 'tis enough that the greater part of them, that is, their Sides, are inclosed.

¹ We cannot when we will. The Will alone doth not suffice here; we must besides this be inclinable to get the possession of the thing, and moreover, the thing it self must be of such a Nature, as to be possess'd in some manner or other. We may then upon a thing, that we may possess it; and nothing is more ridiculous, than to pretend to possess what we can't either make nor preserve in any sort.

² The Bounds of a thing made our Property, are the same with those of Possession. Whatever a Man is seiz'd of, it belongs to him so far as he hath possession of it; and how far he is actually possess'd of it, is easy to determine. See Mr. Episcopius's, De Dominio Maris, c. 9. p. 69, 70.

¹ This Reason is of force only when a thing is joined with an impossibility of possessing it. For on this account alone, that a thing is in so great an abundance, that whatever quantity we take of it, others have enough still remaining, it follows on the other side, that we may appropriate as much as we will, or can possess, since every one may do the same in their turn, and no Man loseth any thing. I am surpris'd that our Author made not this Remark.

IV. Lastly, we farther discover, that the use of some things is confin'd, as it were, within narrow Limits, and cannot admit of Shares; the appropriation of which was highly expedient to the peace of Mankind.

Again, There are things, which as they afford us different Uses, may in regard to some Uses be spent and exhausted, and yet in regard to other Uses yield a never-failing abundance. Now, as on the one side, there is no reason why such things as those should not be brought under Property; so, on the other side, the Law of Kindness and Humanity forbids us to deny the inexhaustible Use of them to any Person that in a friendly and peaceable manner desires it. But if any thing could be found inexhaustible in all its Uses, 'twould be absurd not to leave that in its primitive Community. Indeed in a positive Community, if the Object be sufficient to serve all, when divided, nothing hinders but that we may divide it; if it would not be thus sufficient, 'tis best to possess it still without Division: But that a thing lying in common to Mankind, and sufficient for the promiscuous Use of all ¹, should be shared out into distinct Parts, is certainly repugnant to Reason. The Earth is of such a magnitude, as to serve the Occasions of all People in all Uses to which they can apply it; yet it would not thus serve them, were it possess'd, without Division, by so vast Bodies of Inhabitants as it now contains: Because it could never afford them Sustainance, unless manur'd and improv'd. Therefore there is plainly this particular Reason, why the extent of the Earth should not hinder its being divided; and yet the same Reason would make the division of the Ocean appear a ridiculous Absurdity ².

V. Indeed all other things have little difficulty in this Point; but as to the Sea, whether or no that be capable of Property, hath been disputed by the greatest Genius's of the present Age. On which controversy 'tis easy to remark, that many of the Writers engaged in it were more guided by their Affection to their Country, than by their regard to Truth. Yet by these, and by others who have shewn themselves more dis-interested and impartial, the whole Subject hath been so fully discuss'd, that 'tis hard to say any thing that others have not already offer'd. We may therefore be allow'd to use more Brevity on the Question before us; the Authors ³, who have thoroughly canvass'd it, being so universally read. This then is manifest, that the same Divine Grant which first gave Man a Right of affirming the Sovereignty of the Earth, includ- ed likewise the Sea. The Commission as well runs, have Dominion over the Fishes of the Sea, as over the Beasts of the Land. And we cannot conceive any Supremacy and Rule over Animals, without a Right of using the Element which they inhabit, according as the Nature of it will allow. Indeed mention is likewise made of the Fowls of the Air, yet since we cannot move and support our selves in that Element alone, therefore we are unable to exercise Dominion over the Air any farther than we can reach while we stand upon the Earth. But on the Sea we stretch our Empire much farther, by the means of Ships, now brought to their highest Perfection; which are not only serviceable in transporting Burthens, but likewise carry Mus through the Kingdoms of Neptune in a far more dreadful Array, than he is attended with when he rageth by Land. No one is now so superstitious as to join in the Poet's Scruple;

*Nequicquam Deus absidit
Prudens Oceano dissociabili
Terras, si tamen impie
Non tangenda rates transiliunt vada.*

In vain did Nature's wise Command
Divide the Waters from the Land,
If daring Ships, and Men profane
Invade th' inviolable Main. L. i. Od. 3. 21, &c.
Mr. Dryden.

Nor doth the Sea appear to have any Privilege above the Earth, by virtue of which Men ought less to apply it to their Occasions and Use. However, since the Donation of God doth not immediately constitute such Dominion as shall take effect against the Claims of others; therefore it was left to the choice of Men, whether they would appropriate the Sea likewise, as they had done the greatest part of the Land; or whether they would let it remain in its primitive State, belonging no more to one Person than to any besides.

VI. The Question is, therefore, Whether any thing particular may be discover'd in the Sea, which should hinder it from being an Object of Property? This some have undertaken to affirm, partly upon natural, and partly upon moral Reasons. Amongst the former they have alledg'd the Fluidity of the Sea; that ¹, according to the common Nature of all liquid Bodies, the parts of it are held together by no proper Bands; whereas Possession can take place only in things that are fix'd and terminated. To which others make answer, That Fluidity considered in it self is no Bar against Property: And besides, that the Sea is not without its Limits ², being surrounded by the Shore; and that it is a Work of no such great difficulty to confine the several parts and tracts of it within stricter Bounds. It may be added, that as Rivers are not the less capable of Property, because they pass away in a perpetual Stream; so neither is the Sea, on account of its being driven about by the force of the Winds and Tide. The River is one thing, and the Stream or Current another: And in the same manner the Sea is consider'd distinctly from the Waters which it contains. The vast extent of the Sea doth by no means render it impossible to be kept, and therefore doth not altogether hinder it from coming under Property. For we may abridge others of the use of the Sea, either by Forts upon the Shore, where it toucheth our Territories in narrow Creeks, and Streights; or by Snips of War, which are able to perform the same Service on the Water, as Castles and Forts on the Land. Though it cannot be denied, but that for one People to keep the whole Ocean, is morally impossible: Nor would it be worth their while to maintain Fleets in all Parts, for the defence of it against all others who should desire to share with them in the Use. Now 'tis great folly to covet what one can't keep; especially when by such a pursuit we do not aim at the Necessities of Life, but at the Gratification of vain Ambition, and of needless Avarice. For though otherwise the Defect of natural Ability doth not presently extinguish a moral Capacity, yet inasmuch as the latter, by reason of the Corruption of Mankind, is almost insignificant, Prudence adviseth us to grasp at no more than we can well secure our selves in the enjoyment of. Grotius's Limitation on this point seems superfluous, when he remarks ³, That Rivers or part of the Sea may be appropriated, upon supposition that either the former or the latter are but inconsiderable in respect of the Land, or however, are not so large; but that when compared with the Land, they may only seem to have the proportion of a part to the whole. For let us consider a People seating themselves on the side of a vast River, on a long and narrow Slip of Land; here the River will by no means be inconsiderable in comparison with the Land; and yet we don't imagine that this would hinder it from a capacity of Appropriation. Thus there are Kingdoms, which in extent are far exceeded by their Provinces and Appendages.

The moral Reason which these Authors urge to prove the Sea incapable of becoming Property, is taken from this Consideration, that the use of it is inexhaustible ³, and therefore sufficient for the promiscuous Service of all. So that 'twould be vain and impertinent to attempt the Division of it into separate Portions and Shares. Which Argument we would indeed acknowledge to be the strongest that can be produced in the present Case, were it once made appear that the Sea is, with respect to all its Uses, sufficient for all Men in all Parts. Because the appropriation of things was introduced on no other account but to preserve the Peace of human Society. And since one effect of it is this, That he who against my Will invades and usurps my Peculiar, really doth an Injury to me, which I might justly revenge in an hostile manner; therefore those, who should have desired to turn a thing into Property, which, whilst expos'd to common Use, was not likely to breed any Quarrel amongst Men, ought to have been look'd upon not as promoters of the Peace of Mankind, but as Persons who brought in new occasions of breaking and disturbing it. But whether the Sea be thus inexhaustible in all its Parts, with respect to every Use, will be made more evident, if we examine more distinctly the particular Services which it affords.

VII. The use of Bathing and of drawing Water is indeed inexhaustible; but then this is of no great Consequence, and extends no farther than to the Inhabitants of the Shore. The Sea-water is likewise serviceable for the making of Salt: But this Advantage as well as the former is confin'd to those who dwell on the Coasts. Farther, as to the convenience of Navigation, the Sea is inexhaustible, and suffers no damage from being thus employ'd^{a b}. But then, besides these, there are other Uses, part of which are not altogether inexhaustible; and part may prove an occasion of damage to maritime Countries, whose Interest will not admit that the Sea should every where lie promiscuously free to all. Of the former kind is Fishing, as likewise the gathering of any thing which grows in the Water. As for Fishing, though it be much more abundant in the Sea, than in Lakes or Rivers; yet 'tis manifest that it may in part be exhausted; and that if all Nations should desire such a Right and Liberty near the Coasts of any particular Country, that Country must be very much prejudic'd in this respect; especially since 'tis very usual, that some particular kind of Fish, or perhaps some more precious Commodity, as Pearls, Coral, Amber, or the like, are to be found only in one part of the Sea, and that of no considerable extent. In this Case there is no reason why the Borderers should not rather challenge to themselves this Happiness of a wealthy Shore or Sea, than those who are seated at a distance from it: And other Nations can with no more Justice grudge or envy them such an Advantage, than they can be angry that,

—————Non omnis fert omnia tellus.

All sorts of Goods their several Countries know,
 Black Ebon only will in India grow,
 And odorous Frankincense on the Sabean Bough.
 Mr. Dryden.

An Use of the latter kind it is, that the maritime Countries are guarded and defended by the Sea, as a Rampart. Hence the Duke of Somerset, Protector of England under Edward VI. in an Epistle to the Scots, which we find in Shidan's Commentaries^e, tells them, Oceano claudimur undique, tanquam manibus & wallis firmissimo: We are on all sides enclused with the Ocean, as with the strongest Wall and Bulwark. And we may with much more Justice bestow on the Sea that Name of ἀθάνατον τείχος^f, an Immortal Wall, than Isoocrates^g complemented the River Nile with it. Yet this Defence is not altogether certain and secure. It hinders indeed any Expedition on Foot, but lies open to the Approach of Vessels. For which Reason it must needs be a Disadvantage to any People thus seated, that other Nations should have free access to their Shore with Ships of War, without asking their leave, or without giving security for their peaceful and inoffensive Passage. But we cannot, with any Accuracy, determine in general how large a Space of the Sea ought to be allow'd for such a Defence, in respect of which it may be for the Safety and Interest of the Borderers to claim a distinct Dominion over it. Yet certainly it would argue a very unreasonable Fear and Jealousy, should any Kingdom barely on this account desire to extend their Sovereignty over the Sea for some hundreds of Leagues together. What Cæsar reports of the Germani may serve to illustrate this: The particular Communities look on it as the highest Honour to make a vast Extent of Desert round about them, wasting all the Confines of their Neighbours; this they reckon the surest Mark of an extraordinary Valour, that the former Borderers have retired, and been driven to a greater distance, and that none dare seat themselves in so formidable a Neighbourhood. And then, besides, they thought themselves the safer by this Policy, having taken away all Fear of sudden Incurfions, De Bell. Gall. l. vi. c. 23. However we see by what hath been offer'd, that there may be very weighty Reasons for a People so far to appropriate to themselves some part of the Sea, as to oblige all others to acknowledge the Use of the same Part, as a Permission from them, and an Act of Bounty and Favour.

VIII. But since all Dominion, capable of producing any Effect against the Claims of others, takes its Rise from some Act of Men; therefore how far the Bounds of any People ought to reach on the Sea, is to be discover'd either from their own right of Possession, or from their Treaties with their Neighbours. Thus Isoocrates (in his Panegyric. p. 111. Ed. Paris.) boasts that the Athenians, by their Articles of Peace with the King of Persia, had obliged him not to come beyond Phaselis with his Ships of War. Yet supposing the Matter to be dubious, and that there are no clear Memorials to be found of such Acts as might prove the Occupancy to be real, which is alledg'd; what Preiunptions are to be made in this Case, we may understand from the following Remarks. In the Beginning then, whilst we were yet ignorant of Navigation, it is not probable that the People, which had taken possession of any Territories, extended their Dominion farther than to the neighbouring Shore. For, inasmuch as the Fishing-Trade was yet but poor and barren for want of Boats, and the utmost Advantage they could make was to pick up the Shell-Fish which were left by the Tide, or to angle from the Rocks; there was no Fear that they should in this respect suffer from their Neighbours; who, being necessitated to make their Approaches by Land, might be repuls'd with little Difficulty. Nay, after the Invention of Shipping, most Nations, for a considerable time, left each other at full liberty to fish where they pleas'd: Because they imagin'd that an Imployment of so great Labour and Hardship would not engage such a numerous Train of Followers, as that any publick Disturbance should be apprehended from their Disputes and Contentions. And whilst hostile Heats were yet unknown, the Sea was a sufficient Defence without other Assistances. And afterwards when they began to build Ships of War, Men were contented a long while to appropriate only the Havens and Bays, leaving the other Parts of the Sea in their primitive Community. This Moderation embolden'd the Pirates to carry on their Profession with greater Liberty; whilst they were of Opinion, that 'twas a less heinous breach of the general Peace to commit these Outrages in places subject to no Jurisdiction. At length, when they had found out the benefit of Merchandise, and the conveniency of so short a Passage by Water for Goods and Traffick, some Governments seated near the Streights, or narrow Seas, challeng'd to themselves a Property in them; that, by requiring Toll and Custom¹, they might come in for a share in the Gain, or that their Towns might be frequented by the Trading Part of the World. After this, other parts of the Sea were likewise brought under Subjection, either on account of their great Plenty of Fish, or because this was a necessary Expedient for the Security of the bordering Provinces.

² Mr. de Bynkershoek, in his Dissertation, c. 2. says, "That so much of the Sea may be thought to be seized from the Land, as can be defended by our Arms, i. e. according as we express it, so far as is within Canon-shot." He thereupon sets down an Order which the States-General of the United Provinces gave the Captains of their Ships in 1671. to salute as they pass'd the Coasts of any Foreign Prince, that they might know that they were within Canon-shot, near the Places of that Country.

Yet in these times they scarce exercised any other Right of Sovereignty besides the giving out Injunctions, that all who pass'd within such Bounds should abstain from all Harm and Violence; that no Injuries should be there committed, and no Vessels of War enter without Permission. Thus when the Lacedemonians, in *Thucydides*², had convey'd some Forces to Epidaurus by Sea, the Argives in an Embassy to the Athenians complain'd, that they, having promis'd by League not to grant the Enemies of Argos Passage thro' their Dominions, had nevertheless suffer'd them to sail by unmolested. And accordingly the Athenians interpreted this Act of the Lacedemonians as a breach of Peace. We see it is now the receiv'd Custom, in order to the acknowledgment of this Sovereignty, that foreign Vessels, as they pass by any Fort on the Shore, or any Ship of War belonging to the Prince, who at present carries himself as Lord of the³ Sea, shall pay some mark of Respect.

It doth not seem necessary that particular Nations should make out the precise time when they obtain'd the Dominions of such or such parts of the Sea, by taking Possession of it: But, inasmuch as the Exercise of this Dominion may not at all times be of Use and Advantage, 'tis enough if they then perform'd any Act of Sovereignty, when the Interest of the Commonwealth seem'd to require it: Nay, in our Judgment, it might be no Absurdity to affirm, that when Naval Forces are once brought into common Use, the parts of the Sea, so far as they serve only for a Defence or an Appendage, do without any special corporal Act pass immediately under the Dominion of that People whose Shores they wash^b. For in this respect the Sea is to be look'd on as an Increment of the Land, as the adjoining Moors and Fens are reckon'd the Increment of a City. Now, as in the Occupancy, or the taking possession of Immoveables, it is not necessary that our Body should touch each Part, but the touching of one part only is conceiv'd to create a Property over the whole; so when a People have seiz'd on one particular Region inclosed within settled Bounds, still under the Notion of taking all the void Space about that they shall afterwards have occasion for, tho' at first they have no Design to enlarge, or exercise their Dominion farther than those Bounds, as not thinking what lies beyond to be of Use or Service to them; yet when they come at length to find, that there is a necessity of adding such a void Space to their present Possessions, their bare Intention and Resolution should seem sufficient to extend their Sovereignty over it, as a Part or Appendage of their Empire. Especially when it once appear'd, that other Nations had thus stretch'd their Command over the void Sea: Whence 'tis a fair Presumption, that the rest of the World pretend not that they should be behind with them in this Advantage^{* 3}. From which Considerations it is manifest, that in these times, when Shipping is brought to its highest Perfection, it is presum'd, that every maritime People, at all acquainted with Navigation⁴, are Lords of the Sea, where it toucheth their own Shore, so far as it may be counted a Defence, especially in Ports and other Places

² Mr. Bynkerhook in his Discourse, c. 5 near the End, maintains, That that is not always an acknowledgment of the Sovereignty of that Person, to whom that Respect is paid, over that Part of the Sea where it is done. As for Example, says he, "The State General in their Treaties of Peace made in the Years 1654, 1662, 1674, and 1684, obliged themselves to lower their Top-pisls to the Ships of the King of England in all the Northern Seas as far as Cape Finister; but that was only, because, according to the Law of Nations, all Republicks ought to give place to a crown'd Head, and to those that represent him." In short, the Custom of saluting the Vessels of such Nations to whom they are inferior, in one manner or other, is not so new as our Author would insinuate; For we find in Appian, as Justus Lipsius has long since observed, Elect. i. 23. p. 729. that Mark Anthony and Domitius Ahenobarbus meeting one another, the first Serjeant of Anthony, thinking himself obliged according to the Custom, cry'd out, that he should lower his Standard, which was then us'd instead of a Mast (καθελών τὸ σημεῖον) to pay his Homage to his Master. De Bell. Civ. l. v. p. 1118. Edit. Tollii.

³ When our Author says, That they may, without taking a new Possession, seize on a thing which they had before neglected, as a thing of no Profit, it is not to be understood, that they have called to mind some new Reason, which of itself renders it necessary to acquire that which before they had not troubled themselves to make a Property of. Thus, since the Invention of Cannon, the Sea, which adjoins to a Country, hath upon that account been thought to belong to the Lord of the Country, as far as a Cannon can shoot. But yet there must be a formal Act of taking Possession necessary, without which every one may look upon those Seas and Lands to be common, because they do not appear possess'd by any; for why may not he, who finds them convenient to himself, seize on them?

places where there is Convenience of Landing ⁷. In like manner the Gulphs and Channels, or Arms of the Sea, are, according to the regular Course, supposed to belong to the People with whose Lands they are encompassed. But in case different Nations border on the same Channel, the Sovereignty of each shall be conceiv'd to reach into the middle of the Water, from every part of their respective Shore; unless either all the States have agreed by Covenant to use the whole Water promiscuously amongst themselves, and to exercise a general undivided Sovereignty over it, against Foreigners: Or else, if one particular People has obtain'd a Dominion over the whole by Pact, or by the tacit Concession of the rest, or by the Right of Conquest, or because they first fix'd their Station near it, and immediately took it into full Possession, exercising Acts of Sovereignty against the People of the opposite Shore. In which latter Case, nevertheless, the other neighbouring States, their Fellow Borderers, shall be supposed to be Lords of each of their particular Ports, and of so much of the Sea as the convenient access to the Shore requires. Of the Effects of the Sovereignty (if it may be so term'd) over the Sea, vid. Alberic. Gentil. Advocat. Hispan. l. i. c. 8, & 14. and Selden Mar. Claus. l. ii. c. 20, 21, 22. To which we may add by the way what Dr. Chamberlain takes notice of in his Present State of England, Part I. c. 4. That Persons born on Shipboard upon those Seas which are subject to the English Dominion, are accounted Natives of England, and have no need of Naturalization, as others born without the Realm.

IX. But what shall we say of the main Ocean, which spreads itself between those vast Continents of Europe, Africa, America, and the unknown Southern Coasts? Was this ever brought under Property, or doth it still remain in its primitive state, free and common to all the World? As for the prodigious extent of it, this however doth not absolutely render it incapable of being appropriated. Yet we must confess, the Dominion of it would not be only unprofitable, but unjust; should either any one Nation challenge it all to themselves, or several States divide it into so many Shares, excluding all the rest of Mankind. Navigation, or the convenience of Water-passage, is a thing which suffers no Damage by being enjoy'd; on the bare account of which the Appropriation of the Sea is needless and superfluous; since Men may sail no less commodiously, were the Sea common to all Nations, than if it were peculiarly subject to one. The Fishing-Trade is of no very great Consequence in the main Ocean; and since you do but vainly call a thing your own, when 'tis morally impossible to hinder others from using it promiscuously with your self; we cannot think any State would find it tantamount to maintain Fleets in all parts of the Sea, only to secure the Fishing against Interlopers. But what if a particular Nation, either through Ambition and the Vanity of being filed Lords of the Ocean; or prompted by Avarice, and the hopes of drawing to themselves all the Advantages of Navigation and Trade, should claim the Ocean as their peculiar Possession? Especially if they urged by way of Title, That they were the first who entred upon the Use of it with Sails and Shipping, and that they possess Lands in every Continent round it: And that, since the Sea was originally a void Space, he, who before the rest attempted to fix a Use and Occupancy in it, might thereby acquire a Property exclusive of all others. To this we answer, That Men have indeed a Privilege of making waste Places their own, by first seizing upon them: But then they are always to remember, that God gave the World not to this nor to that Man, but to human Race in general; as likewise, that all Men are by Nature equal. Wherefore, that tacit Covenant between the first Introducers of Property, assigning the Right of those things which did not fall under their prime Division ¹, to the Persons who should first take Possession of them, can by no means be extended to such an Object, which if one should hold alone, he might oppress all others with most unjust Slavery, or might intercept some most important Advantages, which would otherwise accrue to all Nations in common. Inasmuch as such a Case as this could not enter into the Imagination of those primitive Divisors. As then no one would deserve Censure for taking out of a common Store whatever is necessary for his own Occasions, tho' in order to future Use; so he is not to be endur'd, who out of a vain and senseless Greediness should lay claim to more than he could ever spend; and should desire infinitely to enlarge his own Dominion, for no other Reason, but to debar others from the use of those good things which Nature affords. There can then no probable Ground or Colour be alledged, why any one People should pretend to according to Mr. Bynkershoek, there is no part of the main Ocean, nor of any Sea inclos'd with Land, that belongs to any Power farther than he can command it from the Shore, because there is no Power in actual Possession after the manner we have before mentioned. As to the Question of Fact, I will not meddle with it. Our Author may be consulted about that. As for the matter of Right, altho', as I shall shew hereafter, I do not rest altogether in the Opinion of that learned and judicious Lawyer, who lays it down for a general Maxim, That, without regard had to the Laws of Kingdoms, Property is always extinguish'd with the actual Possession; yet I think he hath reason to maintain it in respect to the Sea, and other things of like Nature, which remain such as Nature has produced them. As the Industry of Man has added nothing but the bare Possession, it follows, that from the very Moment that Possession is left in any manner, the things are and may be look'd upon as quite abandoned. As for Example, suppose there be a great Extent of Land unoccupied, which is not encompassed on any side with the Lands of any State, tho' they are near, if the Master of the Country takes no care to till them, or secure them; or if he has sometimes done it, and does discontinue it, any Man may seize it as well as he, especially if the Neighbours have resigned all their Right to him; and in this case also the Renunciation of these last can't be drawn into consequence for others who would settle there, so long as they are not actually possessed. By a much stronger Reason we must acknowledge the necessity of a continual Possession in respect of the Sea, which, excepting a little Distance from the Shore, is much less in use both in itself, and by all the Care that any Man can take to make it profitable in any Manner; wherefore nothing but insatiable Avarice, and a prodigious Disregard to the Equality of all Men by Nature, can suggest such vast Pretensions, and so difficult, not to say impossible, to maintain. See §. following.

¹ It is not necessary to have recourse to the intent of the Agreement, which, as I have shewed above, is a meer Chimera. The impossibility of seizing upon the main Ocean, and preserving a non-interrupted Possession, is sufficient to prove the Ridiculousness and Injustice of these proud Pretensions. See §. viii. n. 6. before-going. And Mr. de Bynkershoek's Discourse, c. 7.

the Dominion of the whole Ocean, so as by virtue of this Right to aim at excluding all others from sailing there. Not one of those Reasons, which first moved Men to the Settlement of Property, doth affect the main Sea. To make it fit for Navigation, there is no need (in regard to the Sea itself) of the Pains and Industry of Men. The Winds labour no more to drive all the Fleets in the World, than a single Vessel. Nor do those Tracts, which the Keels plough up, make the way rougher to those that follow them. As for the Passage to the other Continent, this is not rendered less convenient to one Nation, though another useth the same Road. And to have been the first Travellers through any Place doth by no means give a People the Dominion of it, or prohibit others from turning it to the same Advantage. It is a most imprudent Plea to urge, That any one State, by intercepting the naval Affairs of all others, may be able to draw to it self the whole Profit of a Sea Trade, which Interest all Persons ought industriously to pursue. As if all the rest of Mankind ought to be oppress'd by a most unjust Monopoly, to gratify the insatiable Avarice of a single Government: Or, as if all others must voluntarily turn Slaves, because the wicked Ambition of one Prince or State lusts after the Sovereignty of the whole World. Such hath been the Bounty of Providence towards Mankind, as to give an abundant Supply of all things useful to their Necessities. But as to the manner of possessing these things, Reason enjoins Men to use such Moderation in it, as to rest contented with the Acquisition of so much as is likely to suffice for the Service of themselves and of their Dependents. Nor doth the same Principle forbid them to be concern'd for the future, provided they do not, either by Envy or Avarice, hinder others from gaining a needful Maintenance and Relief. If any one carries his Pursuits further, and scrapes up superfluous Stores, to the Injury and Oppression of others, it can be no Fault in the rest, if, when Opportunity serves, they engage in a timely Enterprize of reducing him to Reason.

X. From what we have observ'd, it is clear, that to sail the Ocean in a peaceful manner both is and ought to be the free Privilege of all Nations: It is, because no one People have attain'd such a Right over the Ocean, as will justify them in shutting out all others from the same Benefit: And it ought to be, because the Law of general Kindness and Humanity requires it. Whence it follows, that no Sovereign can hinder the Nations which border on the main Sea, and are not under his Government, from maintaining a Trade with each other; unless he have by Covenant obtain'd such a Right, as either that some particular State is bound, on his account, to exclude some certain People from all Commerce with them (of which kind was the Contract between the Dutch East-India Company, and the Emperor of Ceylan ^a) or that some whole Nation have surrendered up to him their right of sailing to another ^b. For since I may, at my pleasure, either retain or alienate my Goods, especially such as regard rather the Superfluities of Pleasure than the Necessities of Life; there is no reason but that I may, on some certain Considerations, oblige my self to dispose of them to one Person, and to none besides. And this indeed is one proper effect of Liberty, that Men may by Covenant give up their Rights between themselves; though no such Covenant shall be allowed, if really prejudicial to a third Person. Hence likewise, as a Prince may justly ordain, that no Goods, of the Growth or the Manufacture of his Dominions, shall be exported by Foreigners, unless by such as have obtain'd this Privilege, either upon Covenant, or by free Grant (tho' the Law of Nature doth not at all oblige him to strike such a Covenant, or to make such a Grant, unless some Nation abroad be reduced to such Extremity, as that without this Liberty of Commerce they must necessarily perish) so if a People of Europe, for Instance, have appropriated any Country in Africk, or the Indies, by such means, and in such manner as the Custom of Nations makes effectual towards the acquiring Dominion; they may with like Justice, if they think fit, cut off from others all Passage thither on account of Traffick, or not allow it, but under certain Conditions, or some settled Barthers and Duties. And this we now see in every Day's Practice: Nor doth it appear to be in any respect repugnant to natural Reason. For that Liberty of Commerce, on which some ground such high Pretensions, doth not hinder but that a State may allow more Favour to its own Subjects, than to Strangers.

CHAP. VI.

Of Occupancy.

- I. The several ways of acquiring Dominion.
- II. The Original Methods of acquiring it.
- III. Occupancy is gain'd in whole, or by Parcels.
- IV. The Possession of Moveables depends on the Disposal of the chief Governour.
- V. In some Places the catching of wild Beasts is allowed to every one.
- VI. In other Places 'tis the privilege of great Men only.
- VII. Whether he that hunts contrary to the Law, has a Property in the Beast he takes.

- VIII. When things occupied are understood to be immoveable.
- IX. When they are moveable.
- X. Whether a wild Beast becomes mine as soon as I have wounded it.
- XI. Whether the Fish are ours, that are in our Ponds.
- XII. Things left become immediately the first Occupant's.
- XIII. Of Treasures.
- XIV. Of Possessions obtain'd by War.

IT follows in course, that we consider the several ways of acquiring *Dominion*¹, which, after Grotius's Judgment², may conveniently be divided into originary and derivative. The former are those by which the Property of any thing was first introduced: The latter those by which a Property already settled passeth from one Man to another.

Again, the originary way of acquiring *Property*² is either simple and absolute, as when we obtain Dominion over the Substance and Body of a thing: Or only primitive and with respect, as when we add to a Thing already our own some further Improvement and Increase.

¹ Before we proceed farther, we must here determine a Question which Mr. Bynkershoek has given us an Occasion to examine. That able Lawyer maintains, "That by the Law of Nature, Property, which begins with a corporal Possession, ends with it also." According to him, that same Moment that a thing is out of our Power it becomes common. And if for a long time there has been an Usage that every one remains a Proprietor of his own Goods, although he keeps not the corporal Possession of them, this is the Effect of civil Laws, and of the Agreement of the Members of every State. "Inasmuch, adds he, that if a thing belonging to any Man be found in a strange Country, he being absent, and not securing it, it belongs to the first Occupant, provided there be not some particular Treaty between the two States, by virtue of which they ought to be look'd upon as Friends; for if they are only engaged not to make War upon one another, this Agreement leaves every one's natural Right entire to seize upon that which is not in the possession of the former Owner." Mr. Bynkershoek alludes here the Authority of the Roman Law, and a Passage of St. Austin quoted in the Canon-Law; but since he treats there only of the Light of Reason, I will not stay to examine whether those Passages are well applied, or no, as a German Lawyer affirms, who endeavours to confute the first Chapter of a Dutch Lawyer, De Dominio Maris. It was Mr. Titius, who in 1704, the Year after Mr. Bynkershoek's Book was publish'd, maintain'd a publick Disputation at Leipsick, De Dominio in rebus occupatis ultra possessionem durante, a Discourse which I never saw; but the Author himself gives us the Abridgment of it in his Jus Privatam Romano-Germanicum, &c. l. iii. c. 6. As to the Quotations of the Civil Law, I shall only observe, that the Roman Lawyers did not agree perfectly among themselves about the continuance of the Right of Property, as Mr. Noodt has proved; that they differed in the manner of getting Possession, Probabilia Juris, l. ii. c. 6. As for the Proofs taken from the thing it self, Mr. Titius, as above, delivers himself briefly thus: "1. That the Hypothesis of Mr. Bynkershoek destroys all sorts of Right, and particularly reduces Property to nothing. For of what Use can that Right be which is extinguish'd by the Act with which it is acquired? 2. That there is no plausible Reason to be given why such great Force should be attributed to Possession, if the continuance of Right and Property depends fully and absolutely upon it. 3. Lastly, As to human Right, perpetual Possession is impossible, and so we ought not to believe that it is necessary to preserve them. From whence he concludes, That to follow the Maxims of the Law of Nature, we must on the contrary say, That Property being once admitted continues always, tho' there be no Possession; especially if the Consent of the Proprietor himself, or the civil Laws do not order it otherwise." These Reasons, in my Judgment, prove sufficiently what they were intended for, but we must explain them a little, and add what is wanting to them. I say then, that since Property has its Original from taking Possession, it doth not follow that the Right so acquir'd ceases, when there is no Possession. The intention of Nature in making all things common to Man is, that every one should use and dispose of what he has gotten according to his own Pleasure, 'till he leaves it, and permits it a-new to be seized by the first Occupant, without which this Right will be of little Use. So that Possession is nothing else but an indisputable Mark of the Will to retain what a Man has seized. To authorize us then to look upon a thing as abandon'd by him to whom it belong'd, because he is not in Possession, we ought to have some other Reasons to believe that he has renounced his personal Right to it. Now, as I have observ'd in Note 6. §. 8. of the foregoing Chapter, we may presume this in respect to those things which remain such as Nature has produced them, especially such as are very numerous, or are of a vast Extent; tho' Mr. Titius does not make that Distinction, and maintains, that one may be Master of the Sea, altho' he be not in Possession. But as for other things, which are the Fruits of human Industry, and are either produced by Nature, or are put into a new Form, or are tamed, or are hunted out of their Holes; all this is done with great Labour and Contrivance usually; and it can't be doubted but every one would preserve his Right to them, 'till he makes an open Renunciation; and so they ought to be looked upon as his, tho' he does not keep them ever after, or he loses the Possession by some Accident, which may easily happen, and is almost unavoidable. In the main there is nothing but what is just in this Claim, as may appear from what is said, c. iv. §. 4. n. 4. of this Book. And Mr. Bynkershoek owns, that the first Men left nothing common but what they could not distinctly possess. Their Covetousness and Desire of having was so great, that to express it, the Fable of Clambering up into Heaven was invented, c. 2. p. 10. Can we then believe, that Men of this Temper would consent that the Right of Property should be always extinguish'd with corporal Possession, which can never be without Interruption? Having thus taken liberty to speak my Thoughts about Mr. Bynkershoek's Principle, I shall declare my Indignation against what Mr. Titius (as above, §. 2. 5.) has discourst so boldly. He ought in his first Lecture of that Discourse to have consider'd the Worth of the Author, and not to have accus'd him of favouring Hobbes's Opinions, if he had been cautious, at the End of Chap. iii.

² This Division may also agree with Acquisitions derivative. See what is said upon the following Chapter, §. 1. Farther, we must distinguish also the manner of acquiring Property, into natural and civil. Natural Acquisition is that which is made either by the Will alone of the Acquirer, in relation to such things as belong not to any Person, or by the mutual Consent of him that transfers the Property, and of him that obtains it, as to such things as belong to any Person. Civil Acquisition is that which either transfers a Property with the Consent of the particular Owner, or requires something more than the mutual Consent of Parties. Titius's Observ. 290. We find the like Division in the Institutes: Quarundam enim rerum Dominium nauticemur jure naturali—quarundam vero jure civili, l. 2. tit. 1. §. 11. See Chap. 10. §. 1. n. 1. and c. 12. §. 1. n. 1. following.

II. We have sufficiently made it appear in our former Remarks^a, that after Men came to a Resolution of quitting the primitive Communion¹, upon the Strength of a previous Contract they assign'd to each Person his Share out of the general Stock, either by the Authority of Parents, or by universal Consent, or by Lot, or sometimes by the free Choice and Option of the Party receiving. Now 'twas at the same time agreed, that whatever did not come under this grand Division, should pass to the first Occupant^b; that is, to him who, before others, took bodily Possession of it², with Intention to keep it as his own. Hence, when Grotius^c affirms, That original Acquisition antiently, whilst 'twas possible for all Mankind to meet in one place, might be made by Division also, whereas now it can be made only by Occupancy: The words ought to be explain'd in the following Sense. When Mankind first began to separate into many Families, distinct Dominions were settled by Division: After this Division, he is said originally to acquire a thing lying void and without a Possessor, who happens to be the most early Occupant of it; i. e. he who lays hold on such a thing before others, or gets the start of them in putting in his Claim to it. Thus the word is used in³ Seneca Thyest. ver. 202, & 203.

In medio est scelus positum occupanti.

In Tacitus, H. l. v. c. 1. in fin. Multi quos urbe atq; Italia sua quemq; spes acciverat occupandi principem adhuc vacuum.

In Pliny, l. iv. Epist. 15: In ea civitate, in qua omnia quasi ab occupantibus aguntur, quæ legitimum tempus expectant, non matura, sed fera sunt.

III. In Relation to the Occupancy of¹ Immoveables, especially of Lands, we are carefully to observe and distinguish, whether it be made by one Person only, or by many in Conjunction. One Man is then adjudg'd to be the Occupant of Land, when he tills and manures it, or when he encloseth it with settled Boundaries and Limits: Yet still with this Proviso, That he grasp at no more than what, upon a fair account, seems tenable by one Family, however enlarg'd and multiplied. Should one Man, for Instance, be, with his Wife, cast upon a desert Island, sufficient to maintain Myriads of People; he could not without intolerable Arrogance challenge the whole Island to himself upon the Right of Occupancy, and endeavour to repulse those who should land on a different part of the Shore.

MR. BARB. NOTES on §. II, III.

² What our Author means by, Qui primus eadem corporaliter apprehendisset animo, &c. he will explain himself in §. 8, 9. Yet we may observe with Mr. Titius, that taking Possession actually (Occupatio) is not always absolutely necessary to acquire a thing that belongs to no body. 'Tis only a means to let all others know, that we have an Intention to appropriate such a thing. Indeed, that which properly makes the Right of the first Occupier is, that he makes known to others his design to seize upon a thing. If then he declares his Will by some other Act, as significative, or if others have openly renounced with respect to him the Right which they had to any thing which belong'd no more to him than to them, he may then acquire the original Property without any actual possession. Observ. on Pufend. 292 and in Lauterb. 110. We may also add, that he must be inclined to take what he declares his design to seize on, otherwise the boundless Covetousness of most Men will render his Right unprofitable to others, and be a Foundation for perpetual Disputes and Quarrels. In fine, the Notion which I have laid down concerning the exterior Act, which is necessary to seize on a thing, so that we may acquire such a Right to it as may exclude the Claims of all others; this Notion, I say, is not altogether new. I learn from Mr. Noodt, Probabilia Juris, l. ii. c. 6. That among the Antients, as also the old Roman Lawyers, there were several of the most famous who were exactly of the same Opinion, tho' none took notice of it before this judicious and quick sighted Lawyer.

³ This Grammatical Remark, that the Latin word occupare, i. e. to occupy or possess, often signifies prævenire or to prevent others, might have been spared by our Author.

¹ We must put among Immoveables, first of all, Space, which is in its own Nature altogether immoveable. We may divide it into Common and Particular. The first is publick places, as Markets, Temples, Theatres, great Roads, &c. The other is that which is perpendicular under the Sun, from a particular Possession of Lines drawn, as well from the Center of the Earth to the Surface, as from the Surface to the Heaven. Every one hath a Right to raise a Building under the Sun, as high as he will, and nothing may hinder him but that he may carry it in a direct Line as far as the Orb of the Moon; and likewise as much from thence, if we may suppose that Planet habitable. But if we may dig as deep as we will, we must not go farther than the Center of the Earth, because what is beyond, in respect of us, belongs to the Antipodes, although the Civil Laws of some Countries give to the King's Treasury whatever is found in the Lands of private Men, at any Depth greater than the Plough-share reaches. We must also farther observe always, that perpendicular Lines may be drawn from the Surface of the Sun as well upwards as downwards, and so as my Neighbour may not lawfully raise a Building which by any way may answer directly to my Sun, although it be not at all supported, but born upon Beams laid in an Horizontal Line; so likewise neither can I in my turn raise a Pyramid whose Sides and Foundation extend beyond my Space, especially if there be no Agreement about it between my Neighbour and my self. After Space comes the Substance of the Earth, which we call the Ground, such as the places for Building, Meadows, Fields, and Vineyards. We may next account for things immoveable, whatever sticks fast to the Surface of the Earth; either by Nature, as the Trees; or by Man's Labour, as Houses and other Buildings; although these sort of things may be sever'd and become Moveables. Such are also not only Wind-mills, whose Foundation is fasten'd to the Earth, but also Water-mills; for tho' they may be carried about, they can't be made use of without some Anchor or Stake, which is first fixed in the Ground. Whatever also is fastened to Houses or other Buildings, as what is joined together with Iron, Lead, Plaster, or otherwise for a perpetual Continuance, is also reputed immoveable. Things moveable are consequently all things that are separated from the Earth and Water; whether they have been loosened from it, as Trees fall'n or cut down, Fruits fall'n or gather'd, Stones dug out of the Quarries; or are naturally separated as living Creatures. There are two sorts of things Moveable; the one such as live and move of themselves, and they are call'd living Moveables, or living Creatures; others are inanimate, and may be called dead Moveables. I have taken all this partly out of the Elements of Jurispr. Universal. of this Author, p. 87, 88. and partly out of the Civil Laws of Mr. Daemat. Prælim. tit. 3. Sect. 1. §. 4. &c. The Roman Lawyers often call Immoveables, Res, quæ soli sunt. Labio scribit, ædificium ædificium Curulium de venditionibus rerum esse, tam earum, quæ soli sunt, quam earum, quæ mobiles, aut se moventes, Digest. l. xxi. tit. 1. De Adilitio Edicto, &c. leg. 1. §. 1. It would be too long for me to recite here the other Passages of Lawyers to shew particularly what things they comprehend under the Name of Immoveables.

But when any number of Men jointly possess themselves of a Tract of Land, this Occupancy is wont to be made either by the Whole, or by Parcels^a.

The former happens, when Men in an united Body seize on some desolate Region, encompass'd with certain Bounds, either by Nature, or by human Appointment. The several Parcels of which Region are either granted to the particular Members of the Community, to take and to hold as each shall think fit (a Method but rarely practis'd) or what seems more convenient for the Prevention of Quarrels and Disputes, are allotted to every Person by publick Designation. For that a promiscuous Occupancy is apt to breed Confusion, we may observe from that Description which^b Livy gives us of Rome, Forma urbis erat occupata magis quam divisa similis; Such was the Appearance of the City, as if it had been first possess'd rather by Occupancy than by a regular Division. Tacitus and Caesar will furnish us with Instances. The former reports of the antient Germans to this Purpose^c; Such a number of Men dwelling together (for Grotius reads Vicos, not Vices) occupy or possess such a Portion of Land, which they afterwards parcel out into private Shares, according to the Worth and Esteem of particular Persons; the vast extent of the Country making these Partitions easy and practicable. They change their arable Ground every Year, and are never at a loss on this account. So likewise Caesar tells us of the Suevoi^d, They have an hundred Cantons, from each of which they draw every Year a thousand Men for the Cambr-service; the rest keep at home, and till the Ground for themselves, and for their absent Friends. The next Year they relieve each other; those who serv'd in the Army return to take care of the Land; and those who tarried behind list themselves for the Wars. Thus they never interrupt either the Business of Husbandry, or the Use and Discipline of Arms. But there is no such thing as separate or private Fields known among them; nor are they allowed to inhabit any one Place longer than the Space of a Year. And again^e speaking of the German Nations in common; No Person, says he, hath any certain Quantity of Land, any settled or proper Boundaries. But the Princes and Magistrates every Year assign the several Tribes their Residence, in what Place, and to what Extent they judge convenient; and, the Year after, force them to remove to a new Seat. The Design of which Institution was, no doubt, to preserve the antient Simplicity of Life, so unacquainted with Avarice and with Luxury. We find Horace alluding to this Custom in Lib. III. Od. xxiv. ver. 9, &c.

*Campestres melius Scythæ
(Quorum pluustra vagas rite trahunt domos)
Vivunt, & rigidi Getæ:*

*Inmetata quibus jugera liberas
Fruges & Cereem ferunt,
Nec cultura placet longior annua;
Defunctumque laboribus
Æquali recreat sorte vicarius^f.*

And Getans stiff with native Cold,

Unmeasur'd Lands free Plenty yield,
And Ceres loves to shift the Scene,
A single Harvest loads the Field,
A single Year confines her Reign:
And if the Farmer weary grow,
His honest Second takes the Plough.

IV. As for this Occupancy in general, or by the whole, we are farther to observe, that it confers on the Community, as such, a Dominion over all things contain'd within the Tract which they thus possess, not only immoveable, but likewise moveable Goods and Animals; at least, it gives them such a Right of taking the latter kind, as excludes all others from the same Privilege. And such a universal Dominion, as is here describ'd, is so very different from the Dominion of private Men, that the latter may be transferr'd to a Stranger or Alien, whilst the former remains safe in the Hands of the Community^g. Nor is it necessary that all things which are first occupied in this general way, should be afterwards divided amongst particular and distinct Proprietors. Therefore, if in a Region thus possess'd, any thing should be found which is not ascertain'd to a private Owner, it must not presently be look'd on as void and waste, so that any one Person may seize it as his Peculiar; but we must suppose it to belong to the whole People^h. And the same Rule may, in our Judgment, be extended to such desolate Islands as lie in any Sea under the dominion of a particular Commonwealthⁱ; or such as, tho' they do not now appear, yet happen to rise afterwards in the same place; of which we find several Examples recorded by Pliny. Now in the disposal of such things as these, the People take different Methods: Sometimes the Profits of them are laid up in a publick Stock, to be taken out again for publick Uses; sometimes all the Subjects, sometimes those only of a certain Order or Degree; and sometimes Foreigners too are allow'd to hold and enjoy them, as Tenants of the State. Yet in all Cases, whatever Right private Persons obtain over these things, depends on the Appointment of the whole Community. But there is some Difference, as to this point, between Immoveables and Movea-

bles. The former, in regard that they lie in open View, and cannot be forced out of their Place, are by virtue of that universal or general Occupancy immediately suppos'd to belong to the People, so far as concerns the Body and Substance of them. But now, as to moveable things², some of these are so framed or dispos'd, as that the Region may indeed be the Seat of their Production; and yet there is need either of Labour in finding or gathering them, as Metals in the Bowels of the Earth, Jewels, Pearls, and the like, scatter'd about the Shores and other Places: Or else of particular Care in taking and securing them, that they may not afterwards get out of our Hands; as Beasts, Fish, and Fowl, Men having no Power over these things, so as to use them at their Pleasure, before they are found or taken; it follows, that a People by possessing themselves in this general manner of the Seat where they are to be met with, do not properly acquire a Dominion over them, but only a Right of obtaining such a Dominion hereafter, by particularly taking and securing them. Hence, for Instance, we cannot rightly say, that the wild Beasts of any Country, which still remain in their natural Freedom, are the property of the Prince: But the Prince alone hath the Right of taking them, inasmuch as he is Lord of the Soil where they run; and he may communicate this Right to others, in what Degree, and under what Restraints he pleaseth. Therefore he, who is Sovereign of the respective Lands or Waters, may grant a Right of taking and appropriating things of this Nature, either promiscuously to all Persons, or to none but his own Subjects, or still only to his Subjects of such a Quality: Or, lastly, he may, if he thinks fit, reserve the Privilege wholly to himself. For tho' the things themselves be not yet, in strict Speech, under Dominion, yet forasmuch as the Act of appropriating them cannot be accomplished without using some other things which are subject to Dominion; as suppose the Earth, or the Water; it follows, that he who hath the Sovereignty of the latter things, may, by a Decree to this Purpose, prohibit others from using them, as means of acquiring the former³.

V. Hence it is apparent, that it depends on the Will of the Sovereign, and not on any natural and necessary Law, what Right the private Members of a State shall enjoy, as to the gathering of Moveables not yet possess'd, as Hunting, Hawking, Fishing, and the like: Nay, and as to the Occupancy of desolate Regions; which the supreme Governours may hinder any of their Subjects from entering upon. Such a Prohibition cannot indeed prejudice Foreigners¹, who by taking possession of those Regions may make them their own: But it will be a stop to the Subjects of the respective Governours, so that none of them shall acquire the said things, but those only who have obtain'd a Grant and Commission so to do. For in some Places private Men are allow'd more of these Advantages, and in some less, according as the Rulers in every State have judg'd convenient. By the Jewish Custom, as Mr. Selden^b informs us, Whatever was found in desolate Places, or in such as were void of the Dominion and Culture of private Persons, became the Property of the Occupant; as Grass, Fruit, Wood, and the like. Also the Fish, whether in salt or fresh Water, and the wild Beasts and Birds: Yet no one was permitted to hunt or to hawk in another Man's Ground; tho' even there, if he had once taken any Game, it was his own. But to rob the Parks and Ponds was utterly unlawful. The Roman Lawyers talk much to the same purpose. For thus *Gaius*²; All Animals taken on the Land, on the Sea, or in the Air, that is, wild Beasts, Birds, and Fish, belong to those who take them: For what is yet no Body's, natural Reason assigns to the first Occupant. On these and the like Places the Expositors of the Civil Law observe, that under the Term Fera are comprehended all living Creatures, which Nature hath endued with an unlimited Power of straying up and down about their proper Elements; so as to take in those likewise which have been tamed by the Use and Company of Men. Though perhaps the Distinction between wild and tame Creatures might be thus better express'd; that the former are more averse to human Society, take greater delight in enjoying their boundless Liberty, and cannot, without great Difficulty, be accustomed to live with us; nor may we, after all, depend very safely on their Fidelity: Whereas the latter are quite different in each of these respects. Yet 'tis a Saying of Grotius^c, That the Reason why some Creatures fly and avoid us, is not the want of Gentleness and Mildness on their Side, but on ours: Which he grounds on the Observation of Travellers; that in the most remote Parts, where Men had scarce ever or very rarely came before, Birds have been found, which offer'd themselves freely to be taken. Some may rather choose to form the Distinction by saying, That wild Crea- tures have naturally a more intractable, a more rough and stubborn Disposition than the tame.

We may here remark by the way, that in one place of the Institutions,^a and another of the Digests, Pigeons and Peacocks are falsely reckon'd amongst those Fowls which we term Wild³. The Mistake about the Peacocks hath been already noted by Gotofredus, on that Passage of the Institutions: And as for Pigeons, the Reason which in the very next Section is there given to prove Hens and Geese to be tame⁴, will reach them likewise, there being other Pigeons expressly denominated Wild. And therefore, by the Jewish Customs, none might take them, unless at thirty Furlongs distance from the Dove-house^b.

Yet Bees are no doubt wild by Nature⁵, since their Custom of returning to their Hive doth not proceed from their familiarity with Mankind, but from their own secret Instinct: They being in all other respects utterly unteachable. It is nevertheless one of Plato's Laws,^c Whoever shall pursue the Swarms which belong to others, and by striking on the Brass shall draw them with the delightful Sound to fix near himself, let him make Restitution for the Damage. Where he seems to presuppose, that the Owner of the Bees did not follow them, when they left his Hives^d. Pliny^e will have the Bees to be neither wild nor tame: Others divide them into both those kinds.^f But that, so long as they return to our Hives, they are properly our own, and cannot be hurt without our Loss and Damage, is very laboriously proved in that Declamation of Quintilian, entituled, The poor Man's Bees^g.

According to the Roman Laws, 'tis the same thing whether a Man take Game in his own Land⁶, or in those of others: Because wild Creatures, in whatsoever place they are found, are no Body's Property, whilst they retain their natural Freedom. Yet the Owner of Land may hinder others from coming there to follow their Sport⁷. But still what another hath taken with his Dogs or his Hawks, though against the express prohibition of the Lord of the Soil, he thereby makes his own. Indeed, as to this last Particular, Cujacius^h is of a different Opinion; grounding his Exception on a Law of the *Digests*ⁱ.

VI. But in most Places the privilege of Hunting is left wholly to the Governours of the Commonwealths; who in some Countries admit their principal Subjects to be Sharers with them: Only Beasts of Prey are almost every where allow'd to be kill'd by all Persons without Distinction. Many Reasons may be assign'd for this general Custom. It did not seem convenient that Country-men and Labourers should be permitted to quit their Work, that they might ramble about the Woods; which Indulgence might have drawn them on by degrees to the practice of Robbery and Plunder^k. Sometimes too it is reckon'd unsafe to trust the common People with Arms. Tully^l mentions one Lucius Domitius, who executed a Slave only for striking a large Boar with a hunting Spear, when after the Servile War in Sicily an Order had pass'd, forbidding any Slave to appear with a Weapon. On the other side, for the Princes and Nobles, on whose Arms the Safety of the Commonwealth was to depend, Hunting was esteem'd a most agreeable Exercise, as a Representation of War, and very proper to inure them in bearing the Hardships and Labours of the Field. On which account what a high Value the Parthians, Medes, and Persians set on this manly Sport, we may learn from Xenophon^m and other Authorsⁿ. Bajazet the Turk is said to have maintain'd seven thousand Men only for the care and management of his Hawks; and to have had six thousand Dogs for the Chase. When he was taken Prisoner by Tamerlane, and upbraided with this Fancy by a Present of Hawks and Dogs from the Conqueror, he fiercely replied, For me who owe my Birth and Education to Amurath the Son of Orchan, both Sovereign Princes, Hounds and Hawks are proper Diversion: Not for you a rambling Free-booter of Scythia, bred up to Thieving and Rapine^o. And indeed it was but equitable to allow this manly Recreation to Princes and Chief Men, by whose Toils and Cares the publick Welfare is secur'd. But should the same Favour, in great and flourishing Countries, be granted promiseously to all Persons, it would be of very little Benefit and Advantage to any one in particular^p. For these, therefore, and the like Reasons, a Sovereign, if he thinks it for the Interest of the Kingdom, may against the consent of the common People abridge them of the Liberty of Hunting, without any Injustice. For he doth not hereby take from them what was their own, but barely forbids them to use certain means of acquiring things, which the meer Law of Nature, if it obtain'd without any civil Constitutions, would allow them. For as to what some ignorant Persons have urged, that the prohibition of Hunting is therefore unlawful, because God Almighty invested Men in general with the Dominion over Beasts, the poorest Subjects being no less Men than their Superiors: Or, as to that common Assertion of the Roman Lawyers, that Hunting is free to all by the Law of Nature and of Nations; learned Men have long since put an end to these Doubts, by distinguishing between the preceptive and permissive Law of Nature, and by explaining the different acceptations of those Terms Jus Gentium, or the Law of Nations ^a.

But farther, it is very probable, that in many places this Right was conferr'd on Princes by the voluntary Motion and Act of the People ^b. For since there was a Necessity of assigning them some Advantages for the supporting their Dignity with a sufficient Train and Splendor; it was wisely consider'd, that 'twould be most convenient to allot them such things as might be given without the Damage or Prejudice of any Man: And of this kind are all those in which no other Person can yet claim a Property ^c.

VII. But such Laws as these did not, strictly speaking, confer on Princes the Dominion over wild Beasts, but only a Right, by virtue of which they alone should afterwards make them their Property, by seizing and possessing them. Which Right, nevertheless, had this effect in common with Dominion, that in case any other Person had illegally taken the said Beasts, they might be challeng'd at his Hands. For it doth not seem reasonable to admit the Opinion of some, who tell us, that even before actual Occupancy the Law might fix the Dominion of these things, nothing more being required towards the producing of Dominion than a legal Appointment. Thus much indeed the Law of any Country may effect, that a Dominion already established over things shall pass from one Subject to another, without any antecedent Act of the Parties. But the Law alone is not sufficient to introduce originally a Dominion over such things as have not yet been actually brought under the Power of Men: But there is requir'd farther some corporal Action; especially as to the Possession of living Creatures. But now the first constituting Dominion, and the preserving it after it hath been once constituted, are different things.

Some again there are who assert, that Prohibitions of this Nature by civil Ordinances only stop the Right of taking Game, not of keeping what hath been already taken. For two things, they say, there were which the Law of Nations allowed with reverence to wild Beasts: First, That all Men should enjoy the liberty of Hunting: And Secondly, That the Dominion of these Beasts should be acquired by the way of Occupancy. The former of which Privileges seems in this case to be restrain'd, but by no means the latter. Whence if a Person, who was forbidden to hunt, shall nevertheless have follow'd the Chase, and succeeded in it, any Game found upon him may be forced away; not because he had not made it his own, but in way of Punishment he was unworthy to possess it. In the same manner altogether, as Nets, Spears, and other hunting Instruments are seized in such Mens Hands; tho' none can deny these to be their real Property. For which Reason, if Game, thus taken contrary to Law, be given in charge to another as a matter of best Trust, it may not be forcibly challeng'd from him by the Magistrate: As it might be, were it indeed stolen, some other Person being the just Owner of it. But the Prince cannot be call'd the Owner of these Beasts, before he hath actually caught them; and therefore he, who hunts contrary to the Royal Prohibition, doth not commit Theft, nor take away the Goods of another; but only acquires a thing which another had a private or exclusive Right of acquiring; and therefore he may be punish'd; but as for the thing which he thus got into his Possession, it ought not to be look'd on as matter of Theft, or to be challeng'd accordingly ^{d e}. But indeed 'tis very simple to imagine, that a Man is by any natural Necessity made Proprietor of the things which he first lays his Hands on; we having already shewn, that this Right is grounded on the Strength of a previous Covenant ^f. Therefore if a Prince shall forbid his Subjects to use this Method of Acquisition, in regard to some particular things; their being the first Takers shall avail them nothing in order to the obtaining of Dominion over them. And that Law of the Prince hath so far the Effect of Property, as that after it the Subject ought not to lay hands on the said Beasts; or if he doth so, he cannot thereby make them his own. Nor doth it follow, that because 'tis not usual in these Cases to challenge the Flesh, especially from a third Person, when perhaps it is ready to corrupt; therefore the unlawful Hunter was the just Proprietor of it. Again, taking must not presently be confin'd acquiring: The former being a bare natural Action, whereas the latter includes a moral Effect. It may rather be said, that the Possession of these Men is a plain Contradiction; for thus it runs, The Right of Hunting belongs to Princes alone, and if any private Person takes Game, he thereby acquires the Dominion of it; that is, Princes alone may use that means by which the lawful Dominion over wild Beasts is gain'd and establish'd; and yet another Person may acquire the same Dominion, whilst he cannot lawfully apply the same means.

But what if it should be demanded, Who then is the Proprietor of Game thus taken contrary to Law? We have absolutely denied the Taker himself to be so ^g; and as for the Prince, how could he fix a Property in the Game, when he was not concern'd in the Sport? It seems reasonable in this Case to affirm, that here the Hunter, tho' in a very unacceptable way of Service, labours for the Prince; and consequently, by taking the Game, he makes it the Prince's, in the same manner as other Huntsmen, who act by a Royal Commission and Deputation.

For that the Right of prohibiting is consistent enough with this Right of Acquisition. That, whether a Man by taking Game acquires it as his Property, and whether a Man ought to make use of this way of acquiring, are two different Questions. That, as to the former, the Sovereign hath no Authority to interpose: Because, as he cannot make those things become some body's, which are no body's, or these to be possessed which are not possessed (l. iii. f. 14. D. De acquir. p. ff.) so neither can he hinder Acquisition, or cause that those things which are already acquired, shall not be acquired." But that, as to the latter of these Questions, the Sovereign is free to enact what he pleaseth. ^e Vid. D. l. 41. tit. 2. De acquirend. vel amittend. possess.

MR. BARB. NOTES on §. VII.

^f We have proved the contrary, c. 4. §. 4. n. 4.

^g This Supposition, to which our Author is obliged to have recourse, and which does not appear to be the least satisfactory, is sufficient almost to shew that he reasons upon false Principles, and that he knows not how to keep himself from yielding to what we have said in the Note before quoted.

It is, moreover, certain, that a Stranger likewise is bound by such Constitutions as these; tho' perhaps in his own Country the Liberty of Hunting may be universally allow'd. Forasmuch as this is a necessary Law of all States, without which their inward Peace and Tranquillity cannot be secured, that he, who enters upon the Territories of another Prince, tho' only for a time, ought so long to conform to the Customs and Orders of the Place; at least to all those, the Reason of which will hold good against him as well as against others, and from which the Legislator hath not peculiarly exempted Foreigners^a. But, on the whole, 'tis the Admonition of wise Men, that Statutes of this kind ought with great Moderation to be put in force; unless some particular Aggravation in the Offender deserves a greater Severity of Proceedings^b.

VIII. We are then said to have occupied any thing, when we actually take possession of it; and this commenceth at our joining Body to Body, either immediately, or by a proper Instrument. The regular Course therefore is, that the Occupancy of Moveables be made with the Hands; the Occupancy of Soil with the Feet, together with an Intention of manuring it, and the Action of setting Boundaries to it, whether exactly, or with a wider Liberty. But the bare seeing a thing, or the knowing where it is, is not judg'd a sufficient Title of Possession^c. Thus Ceres speaks in Ovid, Metamorph. l. v. ver. 518, 519.

En quaesita diu tandem mihi nata reperta est.

MR. BARB. NOTES on §. VIII, IX.

¹ This Passage, tho' quoted by Grotius, l. ii. c. 8. §. 3. as well as our Author, upon this Occasion, can be no farther to the Purpose, than as an Illustration, because he treats here of another thing. He might much better have mention'd that Dispute which Plautus feigns to have been between two Servants, one of which had fish'd out of the Sea a Cloak-bag, and the other claimed a Part, because he saw him from the Shore. For thus they argue;

Gripus. Quemne vidulum ego excepi in mari?

Trachal. At ego inspectavi è littore. Rudens, Act. iv. Scen. 3. ver. 79.

Nothing is more impertinent than this Reason. For besides that Gripus could not know the Intention of Trachalion, this last could not have any Thoughts of taking the Cloak-bag, 'till the other was possess'd of it. The Arguings that follow are not at all convincing. I shall give them in Madam Dacier's Translation. "Should the Man to whom the Cloak-bag belongs come now, shall not I that stood by, and beheld afar off, be counted the Thief as well as you who fish'd it up? How then can you prove, that I, who must be an Abettor in the Theft, should not also share in the Gain?"

² The Determination of the Arbitrators, and that of our Author, is not at all satisfactory. He had better have said, when two Persons at the same time declare their Intention to seize a thing that belongs to neither of them, the thing is common to both, Titius Observ. 293. Indeed, as I have already said, that which properly constitutes the Right for the first Occupant is, that he has declared before some others, some way or another, his Intention to make a thing his own; inasmuch, as soon as he hath so done, all others, who have yielded him the first Place, ought not to pass over his Bounds, because it would be as dishonest and unjust as if one over-runs another's Land; but if two Persons declare at the same time that they'd have a thing, and one makes known his Design one way, and the other another, such an Agreement gives them equal Right, in so much that neither of them can exclude his Companion; wherefore they must accommodate the Matter between themselves, and both, according to the Proverb, have a Part. See the Interpreters of the Passages quoted by Mr. Noodt, Prob. Jur. 2. 6. & P. Vavassor, De vi & usu quarund. locut. p. 165. But I am amaz'd that he did not see, that in the Example he uses there was a special Reason, why neither the Running of the Chalcidian Spy, nor the Dart shot by the Andrian, was of any Use to secure the Possession of the City that they went to for their Countrymen. They were both sent, doubtless, in Behalf of the whole Colony; so that they could not seize upon the City but in common, whatever Notion they might otherwise have of the nature of taking Possession by the Right of the first Occupier.

¹ This is always necessary, as is before proved. So that in the Example propounded by our Author, supposing that one finding a Nest, and seeing that the young ones need to remain yet with their Dam, leaves them, with a Design to come again another time; they to whom he tells it, declaring to them his Intention at the same time, do not deal well with him, if they do as the Curate, of whom Boursault speaks in one of his Letters, did to a Countryman; who to revenge himself went to him to put a false Confidence in him about something curious; whereupon the Curate, desirous to know all the Particulars of the Matter, to play a like Trick with the Countryman, answer'd him, A Bubble, the Birds are gone. By the Laws of Saxony, if any one has found a Swarm of Bees in the Hollow of a Tree, and makes a Mark whereby it may be known that he is gone to seek an Hive to put them in, no Man may meddle with them; they are thought by Right to belong to him that first discover'd them, as the first Occupier, because he has manifested his Design to make them his own. This Account I have from Mr. Thomajus's Notes upon Huber. De Jure Civitatis, l. ii. Sect. 4. c. 2. p. 455. where nevertheless he affirms, that this Law is not agreeable to the Law of Nature and Nations, but it does not appear to me that he has said any thing which destroys these Principles, upon which my Arguments are built, no

Whether Possession of an immoveable thing may be taken by an Instrument, we may understand from the famous Story which Plutarch^c relates to this Purpose: The People of Andros and Chalcis made a Progress together into Thrace, to find out new Seats where they might fix and inhabit; and soon after their Arrival the City Sana was by Treachery put into their Hands: After this, being informed that the Barbarians had deserted the City Acanthus, they sent two Spies to discover the Truth of the Intelligence. These, as they drew near, saw the Place to be really forsaken. Whereupon the Chalcidian Spy ran with all his Force to take possession of it in the Name of his People; but the Andrian seeing himself outrun, threw the Spear which he had in his Hand at the City Gate, and as it stuck there, cried out, That by this Cast of his Spear he had taken the prior Possession in Behalf of his Countrymen. A Dispute arising hereupon, the Eretrians, the Samians, and the Parians were chosen Umpires; of whom the two former gave Judgment for those of Chalcis, and the last for those of Andros. The disappointed Party were so enraged at the Arbitrators, as to engage themselves by Oath, never to make or to allow any Marriages with them. Indeed a Spear seems a very improper Instrument for the Occupancy of Immoveables, since we may strike many things with such a Weapon which we can never approach so near as to touch with our Body².

IX. It is the general Opinion, that moving things cannot be made our own but by bodily Seizure; and this we are to use in such manner, as to take them from the Place where they were found¹, into our Lordship, or at least into our safe Custody. Thus a Nest of Birds, tho' I lay my hands upon them, yet are not my own, unless I carry them home. If I find a Litter of young Beasts of Prey,

I then fix a Property in them, when I either remove them as Prisoners to my own Quarters; or for some time set a Guard over them where they lie, to hinder their Escape. Now this Seizure is made not only with our Hands, but with Instruments; as suppose, Snares, Gins, Traps, Nets, Weels, Hooks, and the like^a: Provided the Instruments be, as they term it, in nostra potestate, under our Power; that is, set in a Place where we have a Right of following the Game, and not yet broken by the Prey, but holding them fast, at least till such time as we might probably come up. And hence we may decide the noted Case of the Boar in the Toil, proposed in the *Digests*². For if the Beast were so entangled, that he could not possibly break thro', and the Snare were laid either in your peculiar Lordship, or in a publick Place where you had a right of Hunting, then he was certainly your own; and I, if I had loos'd him, and restor'd him to his natural Liberty, should have been bound to make full Satisfaction, whatever Name such an Action might bear at Law, or under what Head soever it might be ranked. But if the Snare were set on my Ground, as I might at first have hinder'd your Entrance thither, so if I afterwards break what you placed there without my Leave, you have no Reason to think your self injured.

X. It hath likewise been disputed, Whether by giving a Beast a Wound in Hunting we presently make him our own? *Trebatius*¹ long since declar'd on the Affirmative side; but then he supposeth us to pursue the Beast, which if we omit to do, he says, We lose our Property, and the Right passeth to the first Occupant. Others are of the contrary Opinion, maintaining, That we can by no other means appropriate the Beast, but by actually taking him, because many Casualties may hinder him from ever coming into our Hands. The Emperor Frederick made this Distinction in the Case^b: If the Beast were followed with the larger Dogs or Hounds; then he was the Property of the Hunter, not of the Chance-Occupant; and in like manner, if he were wounded or killed with a Lance or a Sword. But if he were followed with Beagles only, then he passed to the Occupant, not to the first Pursuer. If he was slain with a Dart, a Sling, or a Bow, he fell to the Hunter, provided he was still in Chase after him, and not to the Person who afterwards found or seized him. According to the Constitution of the Lombards^c, he who found or kill'd a Beast wounded before by another, was to carry off a Shoulder and the Ribs, and to leave the Residue as the Hunter's Right: Though this Right to the Remainder continued no longer than the Space of twenty-four Hours. We judge it may in general be affirm'd, That if the Beast be mortally wounded, or very greatly maim'd, he cannot fairly be intercepted by another Person whilst we are in Pursuit of him, provided we had a Right of passing through such a Place: But the contrary is to be held, in case the Wound were not mortal, nor such as would considerably retard the Beast in his Flight². Therefore when Meleager in Ovid^d admits Atalanta to a Share in the Glory of killing the Caledonian Boar, it was not so much an Act of Justice, as of Love. But the Game which my Dogs kill, when I did not set them on, doth not become my Property, 'till I have actually taken hold of it^e.

XI. The Jewish Customs, as Mr. Selden informs us^f, decided these and the like Points in the manner following: Fish or Beasts were not to be taken from the Repositories or Places of Store: Yet it was lawful to take Fish out of another Man's Net, whilst yet in the Sea, and Beasts out of another Man's Snare, if it were laid in a desert Place. He that spread a Net in another's Ground might possess the Game he had more than in the following Case, where he determines otherwise than I do. Suppose that one seizes upon a thing which he finds in a publick Place, but which he can't carry with him that Moment; whereupon he leaves it, declaring to some other present, that he intends to take it, and will come soon for it. In this Case, says Mr. Thomasius, the first can't complain, if the last takes it, seeing it is out of his Possession, and left in a publick Place; but in my Opinion the contrary must be understood, that either he that took possession of the thing has relinquish'd it, or that he may reasonably presume it, because he delays long his Return to take it, and so may be thought not to mind it. In fine, I can't but take notice, that in the Place which I have quoted, p. 452, &c. Mr. Thomasius confutes the Hypothesis of Mr. de Bynkershoek, upon which I have given my Opinion above, §. 1. n. 1. but I had not then seen the Note of that able and judicious Lawyer when I wrote mine, which I have not since changed; yet I must own, that I have not always the same Notions, tho' for the main we are agreed.

² The Words of the Digests are, In laqueum, quem venandi causa posueras, aper incidit; cum eo hæeret, exemptum eum abstuli — Respondit Proculus, laqueum videamus, ne inter sit in publico an in privato posuerim: & si in privato posui, utrum in meo, an alieno: & si in alieno, utrum permissu ejus, cujus fundus erat, an non permissu ejus posuerim? Præterea, utrum in eo casu ita hæeret aper, ut exsedire se non possit ipse, an diutius latitando expediturus se fuerit? summam tamen hanc esse puto, ut si in meam potestatem pervenit, meus factus sit. De acquirendo rerum Dominio, leg. 55. This Law ought not to be understood as it is by the Interpreter; no, not by Trebatianus. Mr. Noodt with his usual Sharpness has happily discover'd the true Sense of that antient Lawyer; for he proves in his Probab. Juris, l. ii. c. 6. §. 3. that Proculus was one of those who believed, that to obtain a thing by the Right of first Occupancy it was not always necessary to take a corporal Possession; and he proves it from these Words, Ut si in meam potestatem PERVENIT, meus factus sit, signifying, provided that he who laid the Nets, was inclined to seize it corporally, when he saw the Boar that he had been taken, (i. e.) That no other can loose him, though he be in a publick Place, and that if it is upon another's Land, the Proprietor may not hinder him from going on it, though otherwise he has Right to do it. Mr. Noodt afterward quotes, and at the same time corrects another Law; from whence it appears, that Paul the Lawyer, reasoning upon the same Principle, maintains, that one seizes upon a Treasure found in his Field, as soon as he knows it, and will make it his own.

² This Distinction is not necessary. The Author always reasons from a false Notion of the Nature of taking possession. The Truth is, that 'till we cease pursuing the Beast, and so leave it to the first Occupant, it belongs to us as much as can be; so that no Man can lawfully put in a claim to it, caught, unless it were found by the Lord of the Soil, and challeng'd as his Right, by virtue of that Property. Fish that leapt into a Ship belong'd to the Master: Inasmuch as a Ship may be esteem'd a place of firm and secure Custody, not of such as is passing and uncertain; the motion it hath not proceeding from its Nature, but from the force of the Waters. It is worth while to examine that Law of *Nerva*¹ on the same Subject, which determines, That we are properly the Possessors of the Fish in our Pond, not of those in our Lake: And so of the Beasts in our close Park, not of those in our Woods and Forests, though surrounded with a Fence. Which Distinction *Grotius*² dislikes, because Fish and Beasts are no less secured in the larger Prisons of private Lakes, and well fenced Woods, than in the closer, of Ponds and Parks. Yet Nerva's Assertion is indeed founded on very good Reason. For the Propriety both of wild Beasts and Fishes commenceth upon their being taken³. Now the Fish preserv'd in our Pond, and the Beasts in our Park, were once actually taken by us, but not the Fish which swim in our Lake, nor the Beasts which run in our Woods, enjoying thus far their natural Liberty, though perchance they are so inclos'd, as not to be able to wander without end. For to take these Creatures, and to beset them with an Inclosure for the more easy taking them hereafter, are different things; yet inasmuch as I alone have a Right to take them, I may therefore both hinder others from doing the like, and may challenge what I find in their Hands; so that as to this Effect, it is all one as if I were strictly the Proprietor. And the Beasts thus surrounded at large, may so far only be said to enjoy their natural Liberty, as that they never yet were caught by any Person; not as that all Persons without Distinction have a Right to catch them.

XII. We likewise acquire by Occupancy things in which the Dominion they before lay under is extinct⁴: And this happens if a Person either openly throws aside a certain thing, with sufficient Indications, that he desires it should no longer be his own, but should lie free for the first Taker, without designing hereby to gratify any Man else⁵: Or, if having at first lost Possession against his Will, he afterwards gives the thing over⁶; either as despairing to recover it, or because the Recovery of it is not tantamount. For otherwise, a Man, though he loseth the actual Possession⁷, yet never forfeits the Dominion and Property of a thing (unless it be taken from him in way of Punishment, or by the chance of War) but he still keeps a Right of regaining it, 'till such time as his Inclinations to that purpose have ceased, or may be presum'd to have ceas'd. Wherefore the Dominion of such things as these cannot be acquir'd by Occupancy, so long as the Right of the former Owner still subsists⁸. But since to make a thing compleatly abandon'd or forsaken, Two Points are necessary; First, That the Person refuse to own it for the future; and Secondly, That he divest himself of the Possession, by leaving the thing, or casting it away: If either of these Conditions be wanting, the Property is not evacuated. Thus if I throw a thing by, yet without Intention to quit my Right in it, I do not prejudice my self by that Action. And on the other hand, though I am resolv'd utterly to quit my Title to a thing, yet unless I actually cast it off, I am still the Proprietor⁹.

Amongst the things which by this means are brought under Dominion, we may reckon wild Beasts, or any sort of Game, when escap'd out of our Hands, and repossest'd of their natural Liberty. Grotius is not pleas'd with this Position of the *Roman Law*¹⁰, because, says he, the losing our Dominion over wild Beasts, doth not immediately follow upon their Escape from us, but ariseth from this probable Conjecture; That by reason of the great difficulty of pursuing and recovering them, we may be presumed to have given them over. But the same Laws hint as much as this; for they tell us¹¹, A wild Beast is then suppos'd to recover his natural Liberty, ei-

MR. BARB. NOTES ON §. XI, XII.

¹ The Words are, Item Nerva filius ait, feras bestias, quas vicariis incluserimus, & pisces, quos in piscinas conjecerimus, à nobis possideri; sed eos pisces qui in stagno sint, aut feras quæ in silvis circumseptis vagantur, à nobis non possideri, quoniam relictae sint in libertate naturali. Alioquin etiamsi quis sylvam emerit, videri eum omnes feras possidere, quod falsum est, Digest. l. xli. t. 2. De adquirenda vel amittenda possessione, leg. 3. §. 14. But in this Sentence there is a Word omitted, which makes this ancient Lawyer speak what he never thought. For it ought certainly to be read, Feras quæ in silvis NON circumseptis vagantur. And so Nerva opposes the wild Beasts in a Park, whether it be great or small, to those in a Forest not inclosed, and the Fish in a Stew-pond, to those which are in a Lake or Pool, which lies open to any one on all Sides. And he affirms, that by these Inclosures within certain Bounds we are in actual possession of the Beasts so inclosed. Francis Hotman made this Correction first, and Mr. Nois has solidly confirmed it after his manner, in his Observations publish'd in 1706. l. i. c. 11. See also what he says in the foregoing Chapter, p. 54, 55.

² We have sufficiently confuted this in the foregoing Notes, and consequently the Censure of Grotius is well grounded, if the Words of Nerva, recited in the Law of which he speaks, be not corrupted, as I have observ'd in the foregoing Note.

ther when he is quite out of our sight; or when, tho' he is within view, yet it would be very difficult to follow him. And again they determine ⁶, That what the Wolf takes from us, is so long our Property, as there is a possibility of recovering it ^a.

By these Restrictions we must qualify the Argument laid down by Zeigler in his Remarks on Grotius ^b; That since wild Beasts are made ours by losing their Liberty, therefore by regaining their Liberty they cease to be ours; and, by consequence, the Dominion of them is judg'd to consist in Actual Possession. For a wild Beast is not suppos'd to have recover'd its Freedom, so long as any Person pursues, with probable hopes of retaking it. As a Prisoner, though he be got out of hold, yet hath not clearly made his Escape, so long as the Officers are in search of him, and he remain in a place where 'tis possible for them to find him. As for what Grotius conjectures, that by means of some γυψοματυ ⁷, some Badges or Marks we may retain the Property of wild Beasts, after they have broke from our Custody, so that they shall not pass to the first Taker: We are of Opinion, that this ought to be confin'd to those only, which by the Application of Men have been divested of their native Ferity, and are therefore deservedly admitted to the same Rights as tame Creatures. Hence if Tyrhus's Deer in Virgil ^c, was thus distinguished by any proper Mark, Ascanius offer'd a fair occasion for the Commotions that follow'd. But those which are only kept in Parks, though they should happen to wear any such Note in Distinction, yet when they get loose into their natural Liberty, it seems more agreeable that they should pass to him who first lays hold on them. For there is need of a most strict Guard, or a kind of perpetual Occupancy, for the retaining a Creature, which is by Nature impower'd to wander without Bounds ⁸, and which always struggles, and is uneasy under the Confinement of a Possessor; no Mark or Badge being in the least effectual towards the bridling this natural Disposition ^d. Therefore Juvenal makes the Informers about the Turbot argue very wrong, though very ornamentally to his Design;

*Nn dubitaturi fugitivum dicere piscem,
Depastumque diu vivaria Cæsaris; inde
Elapsum veterem ad Dominum debere reverti.
Si quid Palphatio, si credimus Armillato,
Quicquid conspicuum, pulchrumque est aquare toto,
Res fisci est, ubicunque natat.*

Stat. IV. 50, &c.

————— They'd swear,
The Fish had long in Cæsar's Ponds been fed,
And from its Lord undutifully fled;
So, justly ought to be again restor'd;
If we may take the greatest Lawyers word,
Who tells us, that all fine things in the Sea
Belong alone to Cæsar's Treasury.

As to the Case of fugitive Slaves, the Roman Laws particularly ordain'd ⁹, That their Masters should still retain such a ¹⁰ Possession of them as is term'd civil (a Possession in Right, though not in Act) in Opposition to the natural or corporeal; that it might not be in the Power of the Slaves to deprive the Masters of so great an Advantage ^e.

This is certain, that if we lose the Possession of any thing else, against our Will; as suppose we drop a thing by the way, the Property doth not pass from us, or accrue to the Finder ¹¹, till it appears we absolutely give it over for lost; which is usually understood by our forbearing to search or enquire after it. Hence, if a Man find somewhat which 'tis not probable the Owner should voluntarily reject, he ought to give fair notice, that upon

"There is this advantage, says he, in knowing the Leader, that he may not be caught with the rest; the Fisherman " inspires him, that he may deceive and mislead another Company. It is upon Record, that a certain Fisherman, to do his Partner " an ill turn, against whom he had some Grudge or Quarel, took this Captain of the Shoal, whom he might easily distinguish " from others: His Partner espying the Fish in the Market, brought an Action against the Taker, and, as Mucianus adds, re " cover'd ten Pounds for Damage. ^d Vid. Zeigler in Grot. ubi supra. ^e *Lib. i. c. 14. ⁸ This Reason is not good. Our Author always follows his false Notions about taking possession. But we must say, that the Difficulty, or rather Impossibility, that there usually is to know these sort of Beasts, when they are escaped out of their Inclosures, is a sufficient ground to presume, that the Proprietor has relinquish'd them; but if they have any Mark by which they can be distinctly known, the Proprietor has no less right to claim them, than any other thing he has unwillingly lost, and of which he never shew'd any signs of his Neglect.

¹⁰ See c. 9. §. 7. following.

¹¹ The Roman Lawyers say very well, that it matters not, whether we know, or not, to whom the thing we have found belongs, if we take it to our own use without a Design to restore it to its Owner, or endeavouring to find him out, we really commit a Robbery. Qui alienam quid jacens, lucrificandi causa sustulit, furti obstringitur, sive sit cujus sit, sive ignoravit; nihil enim ad furtum minuendum facit, quod cujus sit, ignoret. Digeit. l. xlvii. tit. 2. De Furtis, leg. 43. §. 4. Plautus in his Rudens, or Nursing. FæL. brings in a Servant endeavouring to persuade his Master to keep his Cloak-bag till he went a Fishing on the Sea, his Master, who was an honest Man, said to him,

Egone, ut quod ad me allatum esse alienum sciam, Celem? Minime istuc faciet noster Dæmones.

Although I know to whom the thing belongs,
And might conceal't? I will not, for such Wrongs
Our Dæmones will not bear.

The Roman Lawyers also maintain with much reason, that the Goods which are cast into the Sea to lighten a Ship in a Tempest, when Men are in danger of being lost, do not less belong to those who cast them in. So that if any one fish them up, or find them on the Shore, they can't keep them to themselves without being guilty of Robbery. Alia sane causa est carum rerum que in tempestate levantes navis causa ejiciuntur. Hæ enim dominorum permanent, quia palam est eas non eo animo ejici, quod quis eas habere velit, sed quo magis cum ipsa navis maris periculum effugiat. Qua de causa, si quis eas fluctibus expulsas, vel etiam in ipso mari natus, lucrando animo abulerit, furtum committit, Instit. l. ii. tit. 1. §. 43. See also Levit. vi. 3. with the Notes of Mr. Le Clerc, and what shall be said, c. xiii. §. 4. in the end, following.

a just Claim it may be reassum'd. But if the Owner can't be discover'd, then 'tis but right the thing should be kept by him that found it. Yet Ælian reports it as a Law of the Stagirites, ἀ μὴ κατέθε, μὴ λάμβανε; Take not up what you did not lay down. And elsewhere ^b he tells us of the Bibilians; That if they light upon any thing in their way, they never touch it, unless they laid it there themselves: To do otherwise, they say, is not to find, but to steal. Amongst Solon's Laws there was one to the same purpose; ἀ μὴ ἔθε, μὴ ἀνέλε ^c. And the Chinese, in Obedience to the Doctrine of Confucius, exactly observe the like scrupulous Nicety ^d ¹⁴. The anti-ent Jews, as Mr. Selden informs us ^e, held that the Law of Deut. xxii. 1. belong'd to those of their own Religion, not to a Gentile; yet so as if such a Beast were utterly relinquish'd by the Owner, it became his who found it and took it into his Possession. They distinguish'd likewise between those things which were mark'd, and those which were unmark'd. The latter they presumed to be given over by the Proprietor, but not the former; unless he made express and open Declaration to that purpose. So again, they thought it unlawful to keep the former, till they had been twice or thrice publicly cried, but not the latter. For which use there was a Scaffold erected in the Suburbs of Jerusalem, from which the Cryer made Proclamation of lost Goods. But in case they belong'd to an Apostate, they did not look on themselves as bound to restore them. As for things lost by Gentiles, they judg'd it reasonable to deliver them again to their Owners, only on this Consideration, that by so kind and friendly a Treatment they might purchase a like return of Humanity and Favour. Wherefore they concluded, that the Dominion of the Gentiles Goods did, by the Law of Nature, immediately expire upon the loss of them; but that the Restitution of the same Goods depended wholly upon the force of civil Constitutions. Which false Opinion, as many others, flow'd from the covetous Temper of that Nation, and from their extream Hatred and Aversion to all the rest of the World.

XIII. Amongst the things in which the Dominion or Property is extinct, the Civilians likewise reckon what they term Thesaurus, Treasure-Trove ¹, or Money found, the Owner of which is not known. If therefore a Man either on the Account of Fear, or for the better Defence and Security, shall have hid his Money in the Earth, it doth not fall under this Name of a Chance Treasure; and he that takes it, is guilty of Theft. As the Slave in Plautus's Aulularia, that carried off Buclion's Pot of Gold. But such casual Treasure, as we first mention'd, doth naturally and without the particular Interposition of civil Ordinances pass to the Finder; that is, to him who first lays hands on it and removes it out of its place. Because a thing, the Proprietor of which is undiscovered, is in moral Estimation judg'd the same as if it were under no Property, or belonging to no Body, and consequently is the Right of the first Occupant. On which Point, nevertheless, this Question will arise, Whether a Person living in a place where the Laws adjudge such things to him that finds them, is bound, for the making his Title good in Conscience, to give publick notice of what he hath found, though it should appear to have lain hid a very considerable time? (For if it proves to have been lately hid, we doubt not but such a publick Discovery is always necessary.) In the Case propos'd, it seems most reasonable thus to determine: If a Man dig up Money in his own Ground, he is not in Conscience obliged to discover his good Fortune, but may enjoy it in Silence, till such time as another of his own accord makes Enquiry, and withal produceth probable Reasons, both of his hiding his Money at first, and of his omitting to speak about it till now. For here the former Owner, from whom the Land or Tenement pass'd to the present (the Finder of the Treasure) cannot be presumed to have knowingly left a secret Store in a place, which he alienated and convey'd from himself. Again, he who hath hid any such Treasure in another's Ground, without acquainting the Lord of the Soil, is judg'd to have slipt his Opportunity, and neglected his means of claiming and securing it; since there was at first good Reason for him to fear lest it should fall into other Hands, which he ought to have provided against. But if the Ground belong to another, then the Finder seems engag'd by his Conscience to enquire, at least indirectly, of him concerning the Matter: Because without this it cannot certainly be known, but that the Money was laid there by the Master of the place, only for the greater Security, or by some Persons else with his Privy and Consent.

But as for positive Laws, we find them in different Countries ², very various on this Point. ³ Plato orders, ⁴ That neither Treasure, nor any kind of lost Goods shall belong to the Finder, but that the Oracle shall be consulted in order to the disposal of them. Which, without doubt, was too scrupulous a Superstition; somewhat like the Humour of Chiungai the Chinese Philosopher, who, as Martinus observes, ⁵ held it unlawful to touch any thing that was suspected, either to be in itself evil, or to have proceeded from evil, and unjust Men: For which Reason he refus'd to dwell in his Father's House, believing the Builders to have been wicked Persons; nor would he take his Meat from the hands of his Parents or Brethren, fearing it might be ill gotten. It seems to have been the Law of the Jews, That Treasure found should pass to the Owner of the Land^a, as is gather'd from Matr. xiii. 44. Spartian in vit. Adriani mentions a Decree of the Empevor Adrian to this purpose; That if a Man found Money in his own Land, he should enjoy it all himself; if in another's, he should restore it to the Owner of the Soil; if in a Place that belong'd to the Publick, one Moiety should go to himself, and the other to the Treasury. And to the same purpose, in Vit. Severi. Zonaras, Tom. ii. in Nerva; we read a Story of Atticus, Herod's Father, That lighting upon a vast Treasure in his House, he wrote to Nerva, desiring to know his Pleasure about disposing of it; the Emperor return'd no other Direction than this, Utere quæ invenisti, Use what you have found. And when Atticus in a second Letter complain'd, That the Sum was too great for his Occasions, and quite overloaded him, Nerva answer'd, Abutere invento, quæ do tuum est; Why e'en abuse it, and since Fortune hath made it your own, get rid of it how you can. ^b Plilistratus Apollonius, ^c in a Contention about this Point between the Buyer and the Seller of a Field, orders Enquiry to be made which was the best Man of the two; an Expedient which can never pass into a general Rule.

XIV. The Roman Lawycrs, to the Class of things acquired by Occupancy¹, add farther, the Goods of Enemies. For the right understanding of which we are to know, that by a State of War, as all other peaceful Rights are interrupted, so Dominion thus far loseth its Effect, with regard to the adverse Party, as that we are no longer oblig'd to abstain from their Possessions, than the Rules of Humanity and Mercy advise us. In War therefore the Goods of one Party, in respect of the other, are render'd, as 'twere, void of Dominion: Not that Men do, by virtue of the Right of War, cease to be Proprietors of what was before their own; but because their Propriety is no Bar against the Enemy's Claim, who may seize and carry away all for his own Use. As the bare taking hold of a thing, which lay void, is a sufficient ground for Dominion. Though indeed, in the Case of War, those who come to make use of this Claim, and to take a violent Possession, may very justly be resisted and repuls'd with equal Violence; as we see in daily Practice. We may therefore observe, that the Dominion of things taken in a War doth then at length gain its full Strength and Validity, when the Person, from whom they were taken, renounceth his Pretensions to them, by consenting to a Peace.

Farther, and what is very particular, this violent Seizure, in a hostile Method, may likewise initle us to a Sovereignty over Men²: Whereas otherwise³, Men do not come under the Object of Occupancy, whether subject to a Lord, or enjoying their natural Freedom; excepting only that one antient Case of expesed Infants^{d 4}, who belong'd to those that found and preserv'd them. For Liberty, as well as all other Rights, is attend'd with this Effect, that it cannot pass without my Consent, into the Power of any other Man besides an Enemy. But now Occupancy in those things which are capable of it, supposeth no Consent; but to the completion of it these two Points only are required; First, The Act of the Occupant, in seizing on such things; and Secondly, The Ablence of all Right on the part of the Objects, which might else hinder them from being acquired by this means. Hence when upon the Deceale of a Man who hath no Heit to succeed him^e, either by Testament, or by Law, all those Rights die with him which he held over things or Persons, the things pass to the next Occupant, but the Persons recover their natural Liberty. For we can hardly imagine, that there was ever one Instance of a Wretch so basely low-spirited, as that he would voluntarily desert his Freedom, and as it were give it up to any one that would accept of the Resignation. Should Men in this Case be never so much inclin'd to continue in a servile Condition, yet, at least, they will reserve to themselves the Power of choosing their own Master.

Indeed Grotius^e seems to reckon Sovereignty amongst the Objects of Occupancy; whilst he tells us, That in things which belong to no Body, there are two Rights which may be in this manner acquired, Sovereignty, and Dominion, as distinguished from Sovereignty. But this Assertion must be explain'd with great Caution and Dexterity. For Sovereignty in proper Speech is applied only to Men; which except in War, and in the Case but now mention'd, can't be obtain'd by Occupancy: Because he who is not Another's, is not therefore No Body's but his Own. But we improperly use the term of Sovereignty in speaking of Places or Territories; for then the Effect of it is only this, That no one can fix in such a Place without the Sovereign's Consent; and they who come to sojourn there only for a time, are, during that Space, oblig'd to acknowledge his Jurisdiction.

But now this Sovereignty is really nothing else but the Effect of that Dominion or Property which was before establish'd over the Place, and includes a Power and Command over Men, indirectly, and by Consequence. Because what is mine, none can take to his own Use, without my Leave: And he that enters a Place belonging to me, is so far at least under my Rule and Guidance, as that I may hinder him from endamaging my Dominion, or may provide that my Right over the Place shall not suffer on his Account.

MOST of those things which are subject to the Dominion of Men, have this common Affection, That they do not always continue in the same State, but abound with great variety of Increase. Some of them swell their inward Substance to larger Dimensions, some receive external Improvements; others are attended with several Fruits and Advantages of a different kind from themselves; many rise very considerably in Value, from the Fashion and Figure which human Industry hath put upon them. All these additional Profits may be comprised under the general Term of *Accessions*¹, and will for the most part fall under one of these two Classes: Those which proceed purely from the Nature of the things, without the assistance of any human Act; and those which the Labour and Diligence of Men doth either wholly, or in part, procure.

II. 'Tis a general Rule in this Case, That whoever is Owner of a thing, to him likewise belong the Accessions of it¹: Which evidently flows from the very Nature of Property, and from the End for which it was first introduc'd; inasmuch as the possession of many things would be vain and useless, should the Fruits of them accrue to others; and the common Peace of Mankind would be very little promoted, if other Persons might challenge these Improvements with the same Right and Title, as the Proprietor of the Substance to which they adhere. It is needless therefore to derive the Dominion of Accessions from the Title of a seign'd Occupation, by which we should seem, through the intervention of a thing belonging to us, to take possession of any After-improvement; or by virtue of which, a Thing already our own, should be supposed, on account of its Pre-eminence, to make some other inferior thing cleave to it, as an Appendance.

III. The Increments¹, Multiplication, and Profits of any kind of things are usually stiled *Fruits*²; except that the Increase of Animals hath the peculiar Name of Fetus, or the Breed. Fruits are most commonly divided into those of which the thing itself is the proper Cause and Original, and those of which it is only the Occasion. The former are called natural: The latter legal or *civil*³. Amongst the natural, some arise from the bare Operation of Nature⁴, without the Culture or Labour of Men: In others, we assist Nature's Strength⁵, and render her more kind and fertile by our own Pains, whether in a greater or a lesser Proportion: On which account these are wont likewise to be termed, The Fruits of Industry. As for civil Fruits, we see Instances of them in *Usury*⁶, Hire, Carriages, and the like. 'Tis observable, that Fruits of the former kind, so long as they are not separated from the thing whence they proceed, are look'd on as parts of it; but

Mr. BARB. NOTES on Chap. VII. §. 1, II, III.

² This Rule is very uncertain and imperfect, and we may better put these two instead of it. I. If the Addition made to a thing belonging to us proceed from the thing itself, or from any Act of our own; and if coming otherwise it belongs to no body, it is naturally our Acquirement, or at least we can't be deprived of it upon the account of any other. II. But if the Thing or Work which is added to our Possession belongs wholly or in part to another, it naturally follows, that there must be a kind of Community in relation to the whole between us and him, so that one of us must transfer his Right to the other, tho' this does not often happen; for this Community ends, and consequently the additional Acquirement is then made, either by the mutual Agreement of the Parties, or by the Settlement of some positive Law, which ends the Difference according to the nature of the Circumstances and Maxims of Equity, Titius's Observ. 298. See also his Observations in Compend. Lauterbach. Observ. 1018. and his Jus Privatum Romano German. printed in 1709, l. iii. c. 5. §. 25, &c.

⁴ This Author observes here, that that which is brought forth by a Beast has a particular Name given it, viz. the Fetus; but this is done only in Latin; and we likewise (as every one knows) use the same Word, Fœtus, in speaking of Plants. I may add also, that the Word Fruitus is sometimes attributed to young Beasts, as Mr. Noadt shews us in his Observations, l. i. c. 10. p. 55.

⁶ As for Example, Food, Fruits of Trees that grow wild, Underwoods, the Oar of Mines, and Stones of Quarries.

⁷ As Bread-Corn, and other sorts of Grain, &c.

when separated ⁷, they are consider'd as distinct Beings : But both kinds agree in this ; That they belong to him who is Master of the thing from which they flow.

IV. As for the Breed of Animals ¹, it hath been generally determin'd, That they should follow the Venter ², and so should belong to the Owner of the Female, not of the Male ; not only for this Reason, because the Male is for the most part unknown, but likewise because the young was once a part of the Female, as it never was of the Male ; and because what the former contributes to the Birth, is much more considerable than what proceeds from the latter ; though we should allow them to be equal, when look'd on barely as natural Causes : For the Question here is not whether the existence of the Calf is to be ascrib'd more to the Cow, or to the Bull ; but whether the Calf belongs rather to the Proprietor of the one, than of the other. Now the Male is obliged to little Trouble, so that his Service in this respect brings very little or no Damage to the Owner. But the Female, whilst she carries her Burthen, is almost usefess to all other Purposes, and besides requires, at this time, more than ordinary Care and Charge in the keeping : Therefore, at least, the Owner of the Male cannot pretend to so much Merit as the Owner of the Female. Especially, since one Sire is sufficient for a great number of Breeders. Yet in case a Man keeps Males purely for this Use, 'tis but just he should receive some Consideration from others who shall desire to employ them ³ :

V. It is likewise a common Rule ¹, That things planted or sown shall go with the Soil ; because they are not only nourish'd by it, but growing into a most strict Union, are made, as it were, parts of the same Body. For which Reason it is farther required, that they shall have taken Root ; they belonging 'till then to their first Owner ². Yet Grotius ^b is of Opinion, That this Appointment proceeds only from positive, and not from natural Law ; since the nourishment of a thing already existent, being no more than a part of that thing, the Lord of the Soil can only pretend to a part in the Right over it ; which, naturally speaking, cannot take away the Right of him who own'd the Seed, the Plant, or the Tree : And therefore in this Case the thing must be held in common by them both. But notwithstanding what is thus objected, the Roman Laws, in giving the former Judgment, went on very good Reason. For they did not hereby design that the Owner of the Seed, the Plant, or the Tree, provided he acted with honest Intention, should suffer an utter Loss ; nor do they forbid but that the two Proprietors may, if they please, hold the thing henceforth in common, according as the Use and Benefit of the Ground on the one side, and the Worth and Excellency of the Plant on the other side, shall assign them their fix'd Proportions. But because they would compel no Man to hold on in a common Possession against his Will, and because such things as these are incapable of Division, therefore they take the Question to be, Whether it will not be more equitable to assign the whole thing to one of the two Proprietors, with this Burthen, That he shall be obliged to pay the other the Value of what he receives from him ? Now here, since it happens most frequently, that the things we speak of, being closely knit and fasten'd to the Earth about them ³, cannot conveniently be transplant-ed, or be any way preserv'd out of their Place, it was thought fit to ordain in general, that things set or sown should go with the Soil ; yet so, as that the Lord of the Soil shall satisfy the other Party for his Seed, or his Plant, in case he acted like an

² So the Law appoints, Si equam meam equus tuus prægnantem fecerit, non esse tuam, sed meam, quod natum est, Digest. l. vi. t. 1. De rei vindic. leg. 5. §. 2. See the same Title in the Code, leg. 7.

³ The Roman Law is, Si Titius alienam plantam in solo suo posuerit, ipsius erit ; & ex diverso, si Titius suam plantam in Mævii solo posuerit, Mævii planta erit : Si modo utroque casu radices egerit ; ante enim quam radices egerit, ejus permanet, cujus erat——— Qua ratione autem plantæ, quæ terræ coalescunt, solo cedunt ; eadem ratione frumenta quoque, quæ sunt sata, solo cedere intelliguntur, Instit. l. ii. tit. 1. §. 31, 32. As for a Tree, whose Roots spread into our Neighbour's Field, see Hieron. Magius Miscell. 4. 7. and Mr. Titius on Lauterbach. Observ. 1020, as also a curious Discourse of Mr. Thomafius's, De Pretio affectionis in res fungibiles non cadente, c. 3. §. 63. This last, from §. 38. to the end of the Chapter, endeavours to shew that the Roman Lawyers are very confus'd in determining the Cases which presented themselves about this Matter, because they have argued upon subtle Principles, rather than by an attentive Consideration of the nature and usage of things, or upon that plain Rule which Mr. Thomafius lays down, viz. That we ought to content ourselves with an Equivalent in such things as are capable of re-placing (res fungibiles) and that they ought not to be prized in this Case, as is done to him to whom they belong, for some particular Love to them.

³ Mr. Thomafius, in the Discourse before quoted, says, that these sorts of things are of that Nature, that they may be restor'd either by other things of the same kind, or their Value may be given in Money. There are but few People but will be contented to recover them in that manner ; and it rarely happens, that there is any particular Reason which may make Men to insist upon recovering what is planted or sown in the same kind. We must add this Consideration to those of our Author.

honest Man⁴. Yet if a Person sows my Field with a meaner Grain, when I design'd it for one more generous, here I don't seem oblig'd so much as to pay him for the Seed; it being really a Damage to me, that my Ground is like to afford to ignoble a Crop. But should the Plants admit of being removed, especially if they be more in Value than the Use of the Soil amounts to, it would, no doubt, be equitable that the Owner of the Plants should be allow'd to take them away, only paying the other for the Use of his Ground. On which Point the Law of Solon is remarkable; He commanded (says Plutarch, in Sol. p. 91. Ed. Wech.) that every Person, who planted the common kinds of Trees in his own Ground, should set them at five Foot distance from his Neighbours. But that he who set a Fig-Tree, or an Olive-Tree, should enlarge the Distance to nine Feet; because these not only cast a longer Root, but are very mischievous, when they stand too near some others; either by drawing away the Nourishment from them, or by sending out a Steam offensive and hurtful to them.

VI. Most of what hath been here offer'd may likewise be applied to the Case of Buildings, rais'd either on the Ground, or out of the Materials of other Men. Indeed if the Structure be moveable, 'tis certain the Lord of the Soil can claim no Right to it¹; provided it be removed, and Satisfaction made him to the Value of what his Ground suffer'd by it. If another builds a House with my Materials, it is commonly best for me to receive the Value rather than the things themselves; since what is thus fitted to one Building will not serve again for the like Use. But if the Materials are not prejudic'd by being thus applied, and I have occasion for them, and cannot conveniently furnish my self with others of the same kind, then I ought in Equity to be allow'd the privilege of seizing them for my own Service. And tho' this is forbidden by the Law of the Twelve Tables, yet they relieve the Owner of the Materials another way, by granting him an Actio for double their Value². In Case a Man builds with his own Materials upon another's Ground, if he knew what he did³, it seems hardly possible but that he must have had a dishonest Design; and it being presum'd that he purpos'd to steal the Ground, the Owner of it doth not seem oblig'd to pay the Price of the Materials, or the Hire of the Workmen; or to permit the other Party to pull down, and carry off what he brought thither⁴. If there was no knavery in the Design, and the Building cannot be removed without being utterly demolish'd, the Roman Laws enact, *That it shall go along with the Soil; yet so, as that in case the Builder be in actual Possession, the Lord of the Soil shall pay the Price of the Materials, and the Expence of the Work*⁵. For tho' the Pile which is rais'd be for the most part of greater Value than the Soil and Surface on which it stands, yet they judg'd it inconvenient, that an immoveable thing should cleave as an Appendage to another, which at least, if taken to pieces, is moveable. Yet still, if the Owner of the Ground can conveniently be without the Spot on which the Building is erected, and cannot so well purchase the Building it self, it seems most reasonable, that upon receiving the worth of his Ground, he should leave the Building to be enjoyed by the other⁶.

VII. But when the Roman Lawyers extend this Rule, *That things built and sown shall go with the Soil, to Papers and Parchments, we cannot subscribe to their Opinion*⁷. As if when I with a good and honest

⁴ We must here observe this. For if there was a knavish Design in him who planted or sowed, I mean, if he knew that the Land did not belong to him, he deserves to lose both his Labour and Goods, because he has mixed them with the other. Without this every Man would be expos'd to see his Land sown or planted with Trees by some other, who would leave it, because he can't enjoy it himself. See the Law of the Cote cited above, Note 2. and Instit. l. ii. tit. 1. §. 32. We shall add a Remark made by Thomasius, Instit. Jurisprud. Divin. l. ii. c. 10. §. 227. which is this, When a Person with a good Design sows another Man's Field, if there happens a great dearth of Corn, Equity obligeth the Master of the Soil to permit the Person who sow'd it to take the Crop, and be contented to accept of Satisfaction for the Use of the Ground.

² This Actio is call'd, actio de tigno juncto, understanding by tignum all sort of Materials for Building. The Reason why the Twelve Tables so order'd it was, to hinder a Building, that was a great Ornament to the City, from being demolish'd soon after it was rais'd. Cum in suo solo aliquis ex aliena materia ædificaverit, ipse intelligitur dominus ædificii, quia omne quod solo inædificatur, solo cedit. Nec tamen ideo is, qui materiæ dominus fuerat, desinit dominus ejus esse; sed tantisper neque vindicare eam potest, neque ad exhibendum de ea re agere, propter legem duodecim tabularum, qua cavetur, NE QUIS TIGNUM ALIENUM ÆDIBUS SUIS JUNCTUM EXIMERE COGATUR, sed duplum pro eo præstet per actionem, quæ vocatur de tigno juncto; appellatione autem tigni omnis materia significatur, ex qua ædificia fiunt. Quod ideo provisum est, ne ædificia rescindi necesse sit, Instit. l. ii. tit. 1. §. 29. But if the Building was pull'd down for any other Reason, then he, to whom the Materials appertained, might recover, if he had not already received double Damages. Quod si aliqua ex causa dirutum sit ædificium, poterit materiæ dominus, si non fuerit duplum jam consecutus, tunc eam vindicare, & ad exhibendum de ea re agere. The Interpreters commonly think, and the Sequel of the Discourse shews, that the Paragraph of the Institutes that I have quoted a Part of, grants an Actio for double Damages to the Owner of the Materials against the Proprietor of the Ground, provided the other had an honest Design in building, i. e. he made use of the Materials, not knowing that the Materials belong'd to another. See Ann. Finnius upon this Place. But Mr. Thomasius, in his Discourse already quoted, De pretio affectionis, &c. c. 3. §. 59, &c. maintains, That Trebatianus, in composing the Institutes, misapprehended the ancient Lawyers, and the Sense of the twelve Tables, which speak only of him who builds with an ill Design with another's Materials; whence it comes, that in the Digests, the Title, De tigno juncto, l. xlvii. tit. 3. is placed immediately after that, De furtis. See also Jan. Vincent Gracina's Orig. Jur. Civil. l. ii. p. 356, 357.

honest Intention have wrote somewhat on another Man's Paper, I must be oblig'd immediately to resign it to him, only receiving some Consideration for my Pains in writing. But rather, since commonly the Writing is of more Worth than the Paper, 'tis much the fairest Method that the other shall rest satisfy'd with being paid for his Paper^a. Especially, if we reflect on what some have added, and not without Reason, That Paper being used, doth, as it were, die and perish; and that therefore Writing is of a quite different Nature from Building. For the true and proper Essence of Paper seems to remain no longer than it continues clean and fair, capable of admitting any Characters. When 'tis once fill'd, it passeth in the Name of a Book, a Letter, a Roll, or the like. Therefore writing Paper is, in this respect, lost and dead to me, that I have no longer the Power of committing to it what I please. And hence, if I do but receive the Value of it, I have no Cause to complain, since I can furnish my self with new, which will serve my Occasions as well.

VIII. They are more in the right, when they determine¹, that the Table shall go along with the *Picture*²; the latter being usually of far greater Value than the former; and it being easy for a Man to part with so common a thing, upon receiving its Price. Yet this very Reason shews, that in some Cases Equity will direct a contrary Decision. As suppose a vulgar Dawber, whose Skill never carried him beyond a Sign-post, should have laid his vile Colouring upon some precious Wood, which we should gladly rescue, as soon as possible, from the Injury it suffer'd; or if some awkward Figures should be cut in Plates of Gold or Silver, or in Pearls and Gems. As it would be an unparallel'd Impudence for a Rascal that rubs his Brush upon my Walls, on that account to claim my House; nay farther, since this Labour was perform'd purely for his own Humour, he can hardly require to be paid for the Work, unless perchance the Owner of the House be in so good Circumstances, as that we may think he would willingly have put himself to such an Expence^{a b}.

IX. The same Lawyers declare¹, that Purple applied to, or engrafted on another's Garment, shall go with the Garment, however the former may exceed the Value of the latter. Now this may be understood two ways; either that a Person shall interweave among his own viler Thread some Purple Yarn belonging to another², or that he shall fit another's Purple Cloth to his own Garment. In the former Case there is scarce the least Doubt, but that the Cloth thus made ought to be judg'd to the Owner of the Purple. For that without which another thing cannot exist³, and which is, as it were, the natural Ground to support and uphold it, is not always to be look'd on as an Accession to that other thing⁴; but we ought by all means to take the Value of each thing into the Account; so that if they are equal in all other Respects, that which is more precious shall draw to it that which is less. Indeed if we speak of the physical Concomitancy or Adherence of things, it is necessary that thing should go along with another, which cannot be without the other; or that the Adjunct shall follow the Subject. But in assigning the Property of things, where we are chiefly to consider the Price and the Use of them, and how easily a Person may bear the want of such or such a part of his Possessions; this Reason cannot always prevail.

esse videtur; sed si à Titio petas tuos libros, traxerit membranas, nec impensus scripturæ solvere paratus sis, poterit Titius se defendere per exceptionem doli mali, utique si caram chartarum, membranarumque possessionem bona fide nactus est. Instit. l. ii. tit. 1. §. 33. See Note 22. upon §. following. "This Place, says Mr. Darwin in his civil Laws in their natural Order, Part I. l. iii. tit. 7. Sect. 2. "§. 15. ought to be understood of some other Matter more precious than the Paper, or of a Writing that is not more worth than the matter on which the Writing is, being used by the Writer, as what is written upon waxed Tables, to be blotted out afterwards. But as for writing on such Paper as ours is, he says, that the Owner of the Paper does not become the Owner of the Writing, be it so much only as a bare Letter; and much less, if they are Writings or Acts of some Consequence." This Explication solves in part the Absurdity of the Decision of the Roman Lawyers; but the Misfortune is, it has no Foundation. The Text is too clear to admit of a favourable Interpretation; and nothing can better prove that the Notions, which the Roman Lawyers have framed of what is to be look'd upon as an Accessory, are false and very ill connected together, since they make a clear different Decision as to Painting, although they be exactly the same.

² Francis Hotman; and it comes to the Rule of Mr. Thomasius spoken of before. See his Discourse, De Pretio affectionis, &c. c. 3. §. 65, 66. and Vinnius upon the Paragraph of the Institutes, which I have set down in the foregoing Note.

² Most Lawyers pretend here, that as to what hath been sown or built in another's Ground, a good Design is necessary to give right to recover and preserve the Canvass, paying the Value of the Cloth to him to whom it belongs. And indeed, Justinian or rather Tribonian tells us in §. 34. before quoted, Utique si bonæ fidei possessor fuit ille, qui picturam imposuit. See Vinnius above. But to me this Decision seems to deserve Amendment. The Matter on which we paint, as well as that on which we write is usually of a small Value; so that we can have little Reason to suppose an ill Design, and that it can happen very rarely; and when it evidently appears, the Principle that hath produc'd it can never be so ill, but he must see so much Worth as to deserve a much greater Value than can belong to him, and so not desire that the thing which it is incorporated with should be returned to its true Owner. So that unless some extraordinary Circumstance aggravate the Fact, Equity, in my Opinion, will engage every Man to be content to recover the Value of the Paper, the Canvass, or the Board, or at least, by preserving the Picture or Writing, secure the Painter or Writer from losing his Labour, or depriving him of the things, which not being possible to be restored, would be absolutely lost as to him, with all that depends on it.

² The Roman Law does not relate here the Case of Specification, of which our Author speaks in the following Paragraph. But in both Cases we may say with Mr. Thomasius, that it ought to be indifferent to the Owner of the Purple, whether he restore the Wool, or Cloth in kind, or give him another like it, of the same Nature, and same Price. So that it is just, that he content himself with this Equivalent, knowing that the other has acted with an honest Intention.

⁴ As the Roman Lawyers affirm, saying, In omnibus igitur istis, in quibus mea res, per prævalentiam, alienam rem trahit, meamque efficit, si eam rem vindicem, &c. Digest. l. vi. tit. 1. De rei vindic. leg. 23. §. 4. There went before immediately, Sed necesse est ei rei cedi, quod sine illa esse non potest, §. 3.

As for what Grotius^a affirms in this Matter, That for the greater part to swallow up the less, is natural only in Fact, not in Right; we allow it under the following Sense. In Fact what is stronger may draw to itself what is weaker; but 'tis not always rightful or just, that a strong Man should carry off the Goods of his weaker Neighbours; or that a Person should lose a thing of his own, which is less, if it happen to be join'd with somewhat of another's, which is greater. For he who hath but the twentieth part in a Field, is as much a Lord and Proprietor, as he who hath the other nineteen. But indeed the Question we are now upon is not strictly, whether he who hath the greater part in a thing, ought on that Score to gain the less; but what Expedient may be found out to decide the Business, in case two Persons happen to be joint Proprietors of a thing, which they are unable or unwilling to hold in common, or to divide. Now here certainly the entire thing ought to be adjudged to one of the Parties, upon Condition that he satisfy the other to the Value of his Share. And which of the two Persons ought, in this case, to carry the whole thing, is to be determin'd from the Price and Excellency of one Share above the other, and from considering which of the Men is in the greatest want of that for which they contend. Thus suppose a Man to have us'd my Purple in a Garment for himself, tho' possibly the Purple be of much the greater Value, yet 'twill be my best way to leave him his Garment safe and whole, upon receiving Satisfaction: for should the Garment be taken to Pieces, the other Party must needs be endamaged; and where's my Advantage in receiving my Cloth, when reduced to Rags? And as for the whole Garment, this being already fitted to the Body of another, is commonly disproportion'd and unserviceable for mine. So indeed in all the Compass of this Subject it is more easy to judge what's fit and equitable from the Consideration of particular Cases, than from any general Decision.

X. As for Specification^c, or the turning a thing into such a Form or Shape, we are first of all to observe, that it cannot strictly and properly be ranked amongst the ordinary ways of Acquisition: For since in the Course of Nature nothing can be made but out of some Matter before existing, we ought to enquire whose that Matter is. If it were our own, then upon the introducing of a new Shape, our Dominion still continues. If it were no Body's, then we should obtain the Dominion of it by the present Act of Occupancy. But if it were another's, then the Question lies, Whether 'tis now to be adjudged to the Owner of the Matter, or to the Author of the Form? On which point the old Masters of the Roman Law being divided^d, at length they came to this middle Resolution; That if the Form could be reduc'd to the first rude Mass, then the thing should go to the Owner of the Matter; if not, to him who gave it the new Shape and Figure. Some have thought this Distinction to be founded on most evident Reason; Because, say they, when the Shape cannot be thus unmade, the thing seems to have utterly perished, and some new Being to have risen in its Place; Wherefore it ought, in this Case, to be adjudged to him who caus'd it to exist under this new Form: Whereas, when the Figure may be reduced to the first Lump, then the thing is suppos'd still to exist, and not to have perished at the Arrival of the new Form, and consequently not to have chang'd its Owner. Others, on the contrary, are of Opinion, that the whole Business turns on this Issue, Which of the two, the Matter or the Form, is highest in Value^e. In our Judgment, neither of these Determinations can with Equity be apply'd to all Cases; but the other particular Circumstances ought likewise to come under Consideration and Regard. Thus suppose a Man hath made Wine, Oil, or Bread out of my Grapes, Olives, and Corn, or hath taken my Honey and Wine to mix in a compound Liqueur, why should he have a Right to the Forms thus produced rather than I, only because they cannot be restor'd to their original Matter? Therefore, if the things of which we are speaking, will admit of Division, they ought to be parted according to the Value of the Matter, or the Labour in working out the Form. Yet in case the Owner of the Matter hath occasion to enjoy the thing entire, we think that his Claim ought on all accounts to be preferr'd to that of the Fashioner. Thus, if a Man casts or shapes a Work out of another's Metal, where the Form is much more precious than the Matter, 'tis but fair that however capable the thing is of being brought back to its Principles, yet it should be left in the Possession of the Fashioner; provided he either restore the like Metal in Quantity and Kind, or pay the just Value of it. But a contrary Decision seems most reasonable, if I had design'd that Metal for the very same Work, of which I stand in great Necessity, and cannot procure new Metal for that Purpose. For here Equity will favour the Owner of the Matter, though the Form or Make should perchance far excel in Value.

MR. BARB. NOTES on §. X.

³ The most plain and general Rule which can be given here is Mr. Thomasius's before-mentioned, according to which the Whole, or the Work which ariseth from two things belonging to two Persons, usually appertains to him that brought it into a new Form, because Matter for the most part is of that Nature, that it may be restored either in itself, or by its Value in Money. But if the Matter be something produced by Labour, for which we have some particular Reason to prize it above its just Value, as if it be a Silver Cup given us by a Prince, which we have made into a Basin, the Owner of the Cup ought to be contented with another Cup of like Weight, or with the Value of it. For if he should give him the Basin, or make it again into a Cup of the same Form, it will not nevertheless be the same Cup which the Prince gave him. The Sum of all is this, if he that turned the Cup into a Basin, knew that the Cup was another Man's, the true Owner may make him pay for the Cup according to his private Estimation. See the Discourse, De pretio affectionis, &c. c. 3. §. 43, &c.

Others conceive, that in the case before us we ought farther to enquire, whether the Power which the Matter had to receive a particular Form was near, or remote: If the former, they think the Owner of the Matter ought to be prefer'd; if the latter, the Fashioner. For Instance, That if a Ship be thus made out of the rough Wood belonging to another, then it shall go to the Builder; but if the Timber were before fitted and prepared for the building a Ship, then the Ship shall go to him who own'd the Timber: That, if a Man works my Wool into a Garment for himself, he shall keep it, when he hath done; but if he cuts a Coat out of my Cloth, I have a Right to challenge the Coat, and to refuse any Equivalent: That a medicinal Composition, if the Ingredients were before perfected and prepared, shall go to the Owner of those Ingredients; if not, to the Author of the Composition. But neither will this Distinction alone be always agreeable to the Rule of Equity: For if I hold any such Matter in my Possession, whether rude and unwrought, or whether fitted or disposed to receive a Form, which I either keep for Sale, or else have in such Abundance, as to be still furnish'd for my own Occasions, there's no reason why I should not leave such a thing to the Fashioner of it, upon his refunding the Price of the said Matter. But if I have design'd any Quantity of Matter to my own particular Use, and have no Convenience of procuring the like, then the Want which I am in turns the Favour of my Sentence on my side, though perhaps the Matter was only in potentia remota, had only a distant Capacity, not an immediate Fitness for this Work^a. Nay, tho' a Man should frame a thing partly out of his own Matter, and partly out of another's, yet even this doth not in all cases make it undubitably certain, that the thing ought to be assign'd to him that made it, on this Reason; because the Shape and Figure is not only owing to his Pains, but he likewise contributed Part of the Matter: For, it may be, his Pains were of little worth, and likewise his part of the Matter inconsiderable, so that the Matter belonging to the other Person exceeds both. And again, there are some things which take up a certain Quantity of Matter; so that in any Degree to lessen it renders it unserviceable, if not absolutely, yet however to that particular Design. In this case Judgment is to be given for him who stands most in need of the thing thus framed.

As for what remains, Grotius's Assertion^b is universally true, That since things consist of Matter and Form, as their constituent Parts, if the Matter belong to one, and the Form to another, there naturally follows a Community to each, according to their respective Proportions^c: Just as a whole Body composed by the mixture of two Parcels of Matter of the same kind, is common to the two Owners^d. But when a thing can neither conveniently be held in common, nor divided, then either positive Laws or Equity must determine which Party shall resign the whole to the other, upon receiving the Value of his Share^e. It is still in all cases to be enquired, Whether the Person who bestows a Shape on another's Matter, doth it with an honest or with a dishonest Design? For he who acts thus out of a knavish Principle, can by no means pretend that the thing belongs to him, rather than to the Owner of the Matter, tho' all the former Reasons should concur; that is, tho' the Figure should be most valuable; tho' the Matter should, as it were, be lost and swallow'd up in the Work; and tho' he should be in very great want of what he had thus compacted. For the greater part of the two doth not draw to itself the less, barely by its own Virtue, or on its own Account; but there is required farther some probable Ground and Plea in the Owner of that part which exceeds, on which he may build his Claim. Hence, if a Man out of wilful and design'd Fraud, puts a new Shape on my Matter, that he may by this means rob me of it, he neither gains any Right over the Matter by this Act, nor can demand of me a Reward for his Labour, any more than a Thief who digs thro' my Walls can desire to be paid for his great Trouble in making a new Door into my House; or than one can desire a Fee, who breaks an Imposthume, otherwise incurable, with a Blow that he design'd for my Death; or than Autolycus could have ask'd a Price for painting the Horses he first stole. And all this doth not proceed from any positive Constitutions, but from the very Dictate and Appointment of natural Reason^e, tho' Nature doth not determine any particular Penalty in the Case. For to have exercis'd such a Villany gratis, is not properly a Punishment: And on the other hand 'tis most just and reasonable, that I should not be obliged to pay a Man Wages for endeavouring to do me a Mischief.

XI. What the ancient and modern Lawyers have so laboriously deliver'd concerning Increment by Rivers, depends, for the most part, not so much on any constant and natural Reason, as on the positive Ordinances of particular Nations: And therefore we may be allow'd to use more Brevity on this Subject.

The two chief Enquiries made in the case before us are, First, Whether the Rivers, by thus secretly forsaking their Banks, do add to the Dominion of whole Territories? And, Secondly, Whether they improve, in the like manner, private Estates?

The former Question is of greater Moment, in as much as it may often prove the occasion of great Controversies between Nations; it being usual for Rivers to lie as the common Boundaries of different States. Now when such a River hath any way alter'd its Course, the Point in Dispute is, Whether the Limits of the Seignories are likewise chang'd, and whether the additional Land goes to them whose Banks

it augments? Here we are first of all to suppose a Distinction between such States as are *limited*¹, or encompass'd with artificial Bounds (with which we may reckon those that are parcell'd out by Measure, as by the number of Acres, being as to the present Business the same) and arctifinian, such as are naturally fenced against Invaders, with the Boundaries of Rivers and Mountains. After this we are to enquire, Whether the neighbouring People of the two opposite States left the River between them void of particular Dominion, and common to the Use of both; or whether they agreed to fix their respective Limits in the midst of it, so that half should belong to one People, and half to the other? And lastly 'tis to be consider'd, Whether the whole River belongs to one People, so that the Limits of their Dominions reach to the Bank of their Neighbours? If then both the States are bounded in the manner first described, by artificial Enclosures, or by Measure, which immediately touch each other, without any void Space between, tho' the River should change its Course, yet the Territories will remain of the same Extent: Nor can there here be any room for the Case before us, since whatever Space should thus happen to be left, already belongs to one or to the other State. If the River in the middle were left void and common, then the Ground added to the Bank or little Ilelets which start up, shall go to those who first take them into Possession: Yet 'tis most convenient, that both the former and the latter should be occupied by that People to whose Banks they are most nearly seated. If the whole River belong to a single State, the Ilelets rising in it shall belong to the same State only; but as for what is gotten from the River by the opposite Banks, it seems most reasonable that it should belong entirely to the other People. But it most commonly happens, as 'tis most agreeable, that the Lands reaching to the Stream on each side are suppos'd to be fenced only with these natural Bounds; and that consequently the End of each Dominion is to be conceiv'd in the Midst of the Channel: For here the Water, as it plainly separates and distinguisheth the respective Lordships, so it affords to each County a kind of natural Bulwark. Yet still it is requisite in this Case, that the River do not, as it were, make a common Custom of drowning its Banks, and of cutting it self out a new Channel every Year. When therefore two neighbouring Nations possess Lands thus bounded by Nature (which in a doubtful Case is always presumed) the River by gradually changing its Current, changeth likewise the Limits of the Dominions, and whatever Addition it makes to either side belongs to those on whose Banks it falls, provided that this² Alteration be made by small Degrees, and that the River do not at one sudden Rupture forsake its Channel, and force a new way. For the gaining or losing of insensible Parts, or any such Change as entirely leaves the old Shape and Figure, suffers a thing to remain in all³ appearance the same as it was. And the Conveniency of a natural Boundary is too great to be slighted and forsaken upon a small Damage. But if a River, deserting the Channel it once fill'd, shall have broke up another Passage for its whole Current; and the People through whose Lands it now runs, do not think the advantage of a natural Boundary to be of so great Consequence, as that for the sake of it they should resign so considerable a part of their Territory, then the Borders shall continue as before, in the middle of the forsaken Channel. For as a Stone is used for a Boundary, not on the account of its Nature, but of its particular Position; so a River concludes and separates different Countries, not in its vulgar Notion, as 'tis a Bulk of Water gather'd from certain Fountains and Rivulets, and from other Streams of Note and Size, and then distinguish'd by a particular Name; but as it runs in such a Channel, and hath such Banks to encompass and confine it⁴.

XII. As to the Lands of private Persons in this Case, we are of Opinion it ought first to be consider'd, whether the River on which such a particular Estate happens to lie, divides the Territories of two distinct Governments; or whether it only passeth thro' the Dominions of one: And then, whether the River be publick or private. In the former Case it depends absolutely on the Pleasure of the Government, either to leave such Increments in private Hands, or to challenge them for the common¹. For at first it generally happen'd, that such or such a People seiz'd on this or that Tract

MR. BARB. NOTES on §. XI, XII.

² Hence it is, that the Roman Lawyers take it for certain, Est autem alluvio incrementum lateris; per illud non potest em id venditur aliquid, quod ita paulatim adjicitur, ut intelligi non possit, quantum quoque temporis momento usufructus, Instit. l. iii. c. 1. §. 20. See also, Digeſt. l. xli. tit. 1. De acquir. rerum Dominio, leg. 7. §. 1.

Traße of Land by the Great, and afterwards parcell'd out to each Man a particular Possession in it, usually contain'd under a certain and definite measure. As therefore what remain'd of the Territory, after this Allotment to private Persons, was still the publick Possession of the State; so whatever happens to be added to any particular Share, is likewise supposed to accrue to the Publick. Yet inasmuch as the adjoining Fields frequently suffer great Damages from the Rivers by Floods, and because the Increments we are speaking of, advancing by slow degrees, seem to be of little Consequence to the publick Revenue; therefore many Governments have thought it a reasonable Favour and Bounty to grant these Improvements to the Persons on whose Lands they happen to fall. And there is the more Equity in this Constitution, in case the respective Persons were wont to keep up the Banks at their own Charge. This Right is presum'd to accompany any piece of Land assign'd to a private Person, not by any determinate measure, but in gross; though perchance in the formal Delivery of it some kind of measure might be express'd^a: And 'tis the same Case, when in assigning the Bounds of any Land, the neighbouring River is mention'd at large. But if this Increment be very considerable, and far exceeding the measure of the private Possession, then it shall be adjudg'd to belong to the Community. As for the Islets which arise, these no private Man can claim to himself, without the express Grant of the State; because being plainly separated from the particular Demesne, they can on no account be esteem'd a Part or Increment of it. And their being seated next to such a Possession, is no more an Argument that they ought to pass to the particular Proprietor of it, than that any other Man should challenge a part of a Street or a publick Place, only because it lies just by his Door.

If a River separates the particular Lands of Persons subject to the same State, then, since it can add nothing on one side, but what it took from the other, 'tis by all means reasonable, that the Increment shall go to him on whose Land the Damage is committed. Thus the *Roman Laws*² rightly ordain'd, That in case the Violence of the Current adds a piece to my Land, which it hath torn from yours, it shall remain your Property as before. Which Judgment will more especially hold good in floating Lands, such as Strabo^b mentions in the Fens of Euphrates, built upon Hurdles of Reeds, and moved with Boat-Poles into their former Seat, when the Water had carried them off.

But if it hath stuck long upon my Banks, and the Trees which it brought with it have there taken Root, from that time forward it shall be deem'd an acquisition to my Estate. Whence 'tis clear, that the Owner of the lost Fragment ought to have brought it back again to its former Place, before it was incorporated with my Land, if he intend to resume the Property of it. When 'tis uncertain what and how much hath been wasted from another's Soil, the Sufferer is hereby hindered from putting in his Claim to the Increment; which yet, according to natural Law, doth not accrue to him who owns the Ground where it fastens, but to the People who are Sovereigns of the River. For 'tis in the highest manner agreeable to Reason, that not only the Water of a common River, and the things contained in it should be publick, but likewise the Channel, and the Banks, and whatever Improvement either that or these happen to gain. For it seems very improper to say, that the Channel, consider'd in it self, is a part of the adjacent Land; but that it is look'd on as publick, so long as it's cover'd with the publick River; which being once remov'd, it becomes private, according to its primitive Nature: As if 'twas only a Burthen or Service laid on the Grounds of particular Men, that they should grant the River a Passage thro' them.

If a River forsakes its Channel, or any Part of it, and cuts out a new way, since the latter is taken from the opposite Land, the former deserted Channel ought in Equity to be adjudg'd to the Owner of the Land, who now suffers, to comfort him for his Loss: And in case the River forsake likewise this new Passage, the Ground shall then return to the antient Proprietor, and not to those who possess the Country about it. But whatever is determin'd in those Cases of the Increments left by the Current, and of the Alteration of Channels; this, no Doubt, is but just, that the Burthen which before lay on any Ground, should be lessen'd in proportion to what it loseth by such an Accident. Which Point, as Herodotus informs us, was settled amongst the Egyptians by a particular Law.

It is not less equitable, that Land drown'd by a Flood should belong to the former Owner, either when the Water⁺ is gone off without trouble, by one violent outlet, or by slow degrees; or when his Pains and Labour have cut out a Passage for it. But 'twill be ask'd, To whom shall the new Bulk of Water belong, 'till such time as the Land by draining shall be recover'd? Here we judge it necessary to enquire, Whether the drown'd Land hath pass'd into the Form of a Lake, or a Fen, or whether it form the Body of a State. It does not nevertheless follow from hence, as Mr. Hertius affirms, that the Right which a Subject may have to appropriate such things as he finds without an Owner, within the Bounds of the State, as the first Occupier, does not depend either upon the tacit or express Will of the Sovereign. After what manner soever the State is form'd, the whole Country belongs to all the Body; and so it follows, that the Laws of Union extend so far as to give the People, or them that represent them, Right to dispose in divers manner the Goods of each particular Person, as the publick Good requires. See l. viii. c. 5. This is so much the more certain at present, because our Kings have for a long time enjoyed this Right by the consent of the People.

² The Words of the Roman Law are; Quod si vis fluminis de tuo prædio partem aliquam detraxerit, & vicini prædio attulerit, pilam et eam tuam permanere. Plane si longiore tempore fundo vicini tui hæserit, arboreque, quas secum traxit, in eum fundum raíces erunt; et eo tempore vicinæ tui fundo acquisite esse. (It ought to be read, Videtur — adquireta, as the Florence MSS. has it) See Finnius upon the Place, Instit. l. ii. c. 1. §. 21. and Digeft. l. xii. leg. 7. §. 2. and l. xxxix. tit. 2. De damno infecto, &c. leg. 9. §. 2.

⁺ These Alluvions happen for the most part thro' the Negligence of the Proprietors, who take not sufficient Care to secure the Banks of the Rivers bordering upon their Possessions. The Roman Law did not restore Lands overflowed to their former Owner, unless they had not chang'd their Form, i. e. when they were covered with Water for a small time, without making a true Channel. This Mr. Nott proves contrary to the Opinion of the Lawyers in his Probab. Juris, l. i. c. 1.

is added to the Channel of a publick River? In the former Case, the Lake or the Fen shall for ever appertain to the Owner of the Ground; and in like manner in the latter Case⁵, for so long time as he shall entertain any Design of reducing the Current to its former Banks. As for private Rivers, which give me in one Place as much as they rob me of in another, the Matter is clear beyond Dispute. But what if a River belonging to my private Estate shall make it self a new Channel through the Ground of another Man, shall that Part of it, which covets my Neighbour's Ground, belong to me, or to him? In our Opinion Judgment ought to be given for the latter. Yet still I retain a Right of turning the Current to its proper Place. But if I refuse thus to bring back the Current to my own Demefns, I cannot oblige the other Party to pay for the Water, nor so much as pretend that it ought to be common to us both in that Part. For those things which are our own barely on account of their being contain'd within our Limits or Space, and which therefore seem Accessions to the said Space⁶, when they once happen to get out of it, are either to be recall'd by our Care and Diligence, or else to pass out of our Propriety, and to be reckon'd henceforward the natural Increments of the new Space to which they are removed. But in all these Cases the positive Laws of different Governments may variously determine, as shall appear convenient. In Aggenus Urbicus's Comment we find the following Rules laid down, If this be done in Lands taken by Occupancy, whatever the Force of the Water hath stolen away, no one may have the privilege of recovering: which Consideration lays a Necessity on Men to keep up their Banks, yet so as not to endamage their Neighbour. But if it be done in Lands that have been meted out, and assign'd in Portions to distinct Owners, then the Possessor shall lose nothing; because every one knows the exact Form and Dimensions of what was allotted for his Share in the Hundred to which he belongs.

Concerning the Lands which border on the Po, Cassius thus determines; *Whatever the Water washeth away in its ordinary Channel, the Possessor shall lose: Because he ought to defend his own Bank, without prejudicing other Mens Property. But if the Flood fall down with a greater Force, so as to alter its Channel, every Man shall regain his own Measure; because 'tis manifest the Damage happen'd not through the Neglect of the Possessor, but through the Violence of the Torrent. If in this Case the Water form an Islet, it shall be his Property from whose Land it was taken; but if it was borrowed from out of several Estates together, each Person shall receive his own. Comp. - IV. The Right of a Ground-plat.
- V. The Right of an honest Possessor.

SUCH is the force of Property or Dominion, that the Proprietor alone hath Power to dispose of his own Goods; and all others are bound to abstain from them. Yet inasmuch as the Division of things amongst Men was not introduc'd with this Design, That all Communication of Goods should thereupon cease; it hence comes to pass, not only that we are often by the Law of Humanity engaged to grant others the Substance or the Use of our own Possessions, but likewise that others may acquire a¹ Right to them, either perfect or imperfect, and consequently may procure by a good and just Title some Benefit or Advantage from our Peculiar.

We shall here observe in short, how many ways this may happen; the whole Subject being so largely explain'd by the Expositors of the *Civil Law*².

II. The chief Rights over the things of others, accruing to Persons who are not the Proprietors, are by some reduc'd to these five: The Right of holding in Fee; the Right of Ground-plats; the Right of Possession upon an honest Presumption; Pledges or Mortgages, and Services¹.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on Chap. VIII. §. I, II.

² We may add the Right of Fealty, of which we shall speak in Note ult. of this Chapter. I shall also by and by shew that Mr. Hertius hath taken notice of this plain Omission.

III. The ¹ Right of holding in Fee, which is granted to another by the Owner of an immovable thing, upon condition of paying such a reserv'd Acknowledgment, impowers the Tenant in Fee, not only to use and enjoy the said thing after the fullest manner, but likewise to dispose of it; though not without some little Restraint as to the Point of Alienation. The particular Contract, by virtue of which this sort of Right is immediately settled, can be rank'd neither under Buying and Selling, nor under Letting and Hiring; since it doth not confer an absolute Property on the other Party, and yet a much greater Degree than in ordinary Leases; but especially since the reserv'd Acknowledgment is (commonly speaking) far less considerable than the Rent of vulgar Tenants. As the Rules observ'd either by common Law, or by particular Agreement, in the renewing of this Contract, in the paying of the settled Rent, in the Alienation of the Fee, and in the Continuance of it, the Civilians afford us large Information.

IV. He that either upon paying such a Fine, or engaging for such a certain Rent, hath obtain'd the ¹ Right of a Grund-Plot, may enjoy the same, and make any Disposal or Conveyance of it, as much as if he were the first Proprietor ²; and consequently may claim the Lordship, though not of the Soil itself, yet of all that is built upon it. It was otherwise in the former Case; where even profitable Dominion of the Soil belongs to the Tenant of the Fee: The Reason of introducing such a Right was this; That Persons were willing to admit Strangers upon their Land, yet so as not to lose any thing in the Bulk and Dimensions of it. Therefore they made a Grant of the Surface, reserving the main Soil to themselves, and requiring a moderate annual Rent to be paid on this ² Consideration. If the Surface be lost, as suppose, if the Buildings fall, or are consum'd by Fire, the Right of the Ground Tenant ³ expires, so that the Lord of the Ground may again dispose of it as he thinks fit.

V. The Right of Possession ¹ upon an honest Presumption (belonging to those who with a good and sincere Intention receive a thing of another's from a false Proprietor, yet upon a just Title, and such as would otherwise be sufficient to convey the real Dominion to them) is thus far equivalent to strict Property, That such a Possessor may challenge all the ² Fruits and Profits as his own, may dispose of the thing as he pleaseth, and defend his Possession, nay, and ought to be maintain'd in it by the Laws against all Claimants, except the just Lord. And this Possession after a certain Term of Years will give the Possessor an irrevocable Dominion, and such as shall hold good even against him who was at first the lawful Proprietor. On which Point we shall hereafter enlarge ^b.

Now this Right was at first set on foot for the Benefit of human Commerce, and the Peace of Society and Government; to the intent that he who endeavours to obtain a thing upon a good Title, and with an honest Mind, should not afterwards be unreasonably oppress'd, or incommoded; as he must needs be, were all other Persons for such a Space allow'd to disturb him in his Hold; or were he bound upon the true Proprietor's challenging the thing to refund likewise the Fruits and Profits which he had consumed: Or, Lastly, If his Possession were always to hang in an uncertain fluctuating Condition. As indeed it is a Rule not only enacted by civil Constitutions, but likewise founded on natural Reason, that every Man shall

MR. BARB. NOTES on §. III, IV, V.

¹ The Word Emphyteusis, from which this Jus Emphyteuticum is derived, comes from the Greek Word ἐμψυτεύειν, which signifies to engraft or plant. Since the Owners of barren Land can't easily find such as will farm them, it has been thought expedient to make over these sort of Inheritances for ever, to till, plant, and improve them any way. By this Agreement the Proprietor of the Ground reserves to himself a certain Rent for ever, and the Emphyteute or Lessee on the other side entitles himself to the Profit of his Labour and Industry by gathering the Fruits of another's Estate, which he has enrich'd by his own Care, only paying some small Rent. In the Issue the Lands are restored to the Lessor, not only fertile and in a good Condition, but the Estate likewise, which in its own Nature produce no Fruits, although it is otherwise of some Value, as Houses and other Buildings are. See Instit. l. iii. c. 25. De Locatione & Conductione, §. 3. Digest. l. vi. tit. 3. Si ager coligalis, i. e. Emphyteutarius, petatur, Cod. l. iv. tit. 66. De Jure Emphyteuticis, and Mr. Dumoulin's Civil Laws reduced to their natural Order, Part I. l. i. t. 4. Sect. 10. Mr. Titius, in his Observat. on Lauterbach, 209. affirms, That it is not necessary to make any particular kind of Contract in Emphyteusis. "For, says he, when we have transfer'd to another the Property of a thing either in whole or in Part, if he doth it gratuitously, 'tis a Donation; if he require a certain Price, 'tis a Sale, altho' he otherwise makes some private Agreement for an annual Rent." See the same Author's Jus Perpetuum Romano German. l. iii. c. 11. §. 5, &c. where he also treats of the Right of Place.

³ This Right may be most properly called Dominium utile Fundi, and not Jus Superficiarium, as our Author does. For he that has this Right has Power to place any thing upon the Surface of that Ground, though it belong to another. Indeed, the German Lawyers express themselves sometimes after that manner. And Mr. Hertius has an entire Discourse (among his Comment. and Opusc. Tom. 3.) which he entitles, De Jure Superficiariorum. And the Roman Lawyers call him that has this Right Superficiariorum, i. e. as they expound it, qui in alieno solo superficiesem ita habet, ut certam pensionem præstet, Digest. l. vi. tit. 1. De rei vindic. leg. 74. 75. The Buildings also which are possess'd after that manner are named Bona Superficiariorum, Digest. lib. l. t. 16. De verborum significatiōe, leg. 49. and the Rent paid Salarium. Vestigal enim hoc sic appellatur, Salarium, ex eo, quod pro solo pendatur, Digest. l. 43. t. 8. N. quid in loco publico vel itinere fiat, leg. 2. §. 17. See a whole Title in the Digests upon this Matter, l. xliii. t. 18. De Superficiariorum.

be left to enjoy what he hath got with honest Intention³, till such time as the Claimant shall have demonstrated a stronger Right than Possession. For what Troubles and Disquiets might be every day brought on any Person, if upon Suit of every Petitioner he should be oblig'd to relinquish what he fairly holds, and to prosecute the other Party in order to a Recovery⁴? The Case of Pledges or Mortgages will hereafter be explain'd⁵.

VI. Services, in respect of the Person to whom they are due, are so many Rights of receiving certain Profits or Advantages from things which belong to others, or of abridging the right Owner in the use of what he possesseth, so that he shall not be able to apply it to all purposes. But in respect of the Person who is to pay them, they are so many Obligations to grant another somewhat out of a Man's own Possession⁶; or, for the benefit of another to forbear using his own Property in such a particular manner. *Services*⁷, in respect of the Object towards which the Payment of them is directed, are divided into personal and real: Not as if the Benefit of each did not ultimately terminate in the Person, but because some Profits of this kind accrue to a Man, only on account of his possessing some certain Estate⁸. Which Distinction others express in this manner: Advantages, arising from other Mens things, either come to a Person directly and immediately, on the score of his being such a Person, or else mediately, by the Intervention of something which he holds as his Property, and to which this Service is owing.

VII. In the List of personal Services are commonly reckon'd those which follow, Use and Profits, Use,

*Dwelling, and the Works of Servants*¹. Use and Profits is a Right of enjoying freely what belongs to another, yet so as not to impair the main Substance²; or, a Right of receiving all such Advantages from another's Property, as can arise from it without injuring the Principal. For, though in the ordinary Course of Nature, he who is Lord of the Thing is also Lord of the Fruits, yet there is nothing to hinder, but that these two may be separated, and the Diminion or Property lodg'd in one Person, whilst another hath a Right to all the Benefits. And this may be ordained and appointed, either by the standing Laws of any Government, or by the occasional Sentence of the Judge; as when a thing held before in common, cannot conveniently be divided any other way³: Or by the Act of private Men, as by Testament⁴, or by Compact⁵. Only there is one Case which seems to require Service by the bare Notion of Nature and Reason; and that is, That the Father shall have the Use and Profits of all Goods which fall to the Son in his Minority⁶. It is evident that Use and Profits can be appointed properly in those things alone which afford some outward use of themselves distinct from their Substances, or which are not consum'd by being enjoy'd; provided they are really capable of yielding any Service, Ornament, or Delight. But there can be no proper room for the like Tenure in things which are no way serviceable, but in being spent: Inasmuch as the very Body and Substance, and consequently the Propriety of any thing is presumed to belong to him, who hath a Right to waste or consume it at his pleasure. Yet 'tis a Rule in the Civil Law, That Money and other consumable things may be turn'd by

Item alii usufructum, alii deducto confundum legari potest, Instit. l. ii. tit. 1. §. 1.* So a Testator may bequeath a Property, and leave an Usufruct, either to an Usufructurer or to his Heir, or any other Legatee, as also he may make a Reserve of his Usufruct for a Portion, a Gift among Survivors, to be sold, exchanged, passed away, or other things of like nature. *Quævis rem aliquam donando, vel in dotem dando, vel vendendo usufructum ejus retinere, &c. ⁸ As an House, Land, a Slave, a Beast, &c. But Wine, Oil, Bread-Corn, Money, &c. are not capable of an Usufruct. *Constitutur autem usufructus non tantum in fæcis & ælibis, verum etiam in servis & juratis, & cæteris rebus, exceptis illis, quæ usu consumuntur. Nam hæc res, neque naturali ratione, neque civili recipiunt usufructum; quæ in numero sunt vinum, oleum, fenum, cætera, vestimenta, quibus proxima est pecunia numerata. Namque ipso usu assidue permutatio quadammodo extinguitur, Instit. l. ii. t. 4. §. 2. Trebonianus has very justly joined to these Habits, as Cajatus has observed, for they do not consume at all by their Use. See Mr. Nodt's Præb. Juris, l. ii. c. 4. and Mr. Trentham's Discourse, De Præb. affect. c. 1. §. 18. Medals, and such pieces of Money as are not current, but are desired for their Antiquity, may be bestowed as an Usufruct, as appears by the following Law which Mr. Nodt explains learnedly after his manner in his Observations, l. i. c. 5. Nominatim novorum vel argenti, sive ætæ rerum, quibus præ gemmis uti solent, usufructus legari potest, Digest. l. vii. tit. 1. leg. 28. We may say the same thing of Pictures and Statues. Statue & imaginis usufructum posse relinqui magis est, quia & ipse habent aliquam utilitatem, si quis hoc pignus permutat, Ibid. leg. 41. The Ancient Lawyers do not agree upon this Question, Whether we can have the Usufruct of a thing incorporeal, or of a bare Right, as a Permission to pass through another Man's Ground, or to carry Water through it, &c. As for my self I am of Opinion, that if we consider the thing in it self, without any of the Subtilties of the Roman Lawyers, there is no Difficulty in it, and we may without scruple affirm it: For these sort of Rights are valuable, and do not perish in the using. Nor is it necessary that the Ground of an Usufruct should be a sensible thing, and really exist any where but in the Mind. It is sufficient, that 'tis a thing that may be look'd upon as belonging to any one, and from whence we may receive some advantage, and without which it ceases to be as before. So also Debt being may be repaid a real, good, and a true Fund.*

Will⁷ into this kind of Tenure, and be given in Legacy; in which case the Money or Things are so made over to the Legatee, as to be his own; but under this necessary Condition, That he give Security to the Heir to restore the like Sum, and the like things, or the Value of the things, when the Term of his Grant is expired. So that the Security here given to the Proprietor doth, as it were, supply the place of the real Substance.

He that holds the Use and Profits of a thing hath a Right to claim all the Advantages proceeding from it, as well natural as civil⁸. Yet the Roman Laws excepted⁹ the Issue of a Maid-servant; probably on this Reason, That the design of granting another the Use of our Servants respected their Work only, and not their Off-spring. As for the other natural Fruits, they become the Tenants of Use and Profit, by taking or gathering them; that¹⁰ is, when he hath separated them from the Body or Substance, and laid them by themselves. Whence it follows, that the Fruits or Profits, if not yet separated, belong to the Proprietor; and in case the Tenant for Use and Profit dies before he hath gather'd them, they cannot be challeng'd by his Heir: Though, if it appear that any Pains were spent, or any Industry employ'd¹¹, in bringing the Fruits to Perfection, it will then be equitable to admit the Heir to a Participation of them; so far, at least, as to compensate the Pains of the Deceas'd, and to hinder him from labouring in vain. Civil Fruits belong to the Tenant for Use and Profit, till the time is laps'd¹², for which the Grant was first made.

Further, As he who holds a thing in this manner, ought to use it like an honest Man¹³, or as becomes a good Husband, and so apply it to that particular kind of Advantage, which either the Nature of the thing, or the Will of the Proprietor requires; so is he likewise bound to guard, maintain, and keep it safe, and whole¹⁴; as also to pay *Taxes*¹⁵, Dues, and other Burthens, ordinary and extraordinary, at least such as do not exceed the main Profits. For all these Troubles, as well as that of Culture and Improvement, necessarily fall on him who desires to reap the Benefit and Gain: Nor is it presum'd that any Person would lay so grievous a hardship on himself, as not only to grant another the Profits of his Goods or Estate, but likewise to reserve the Burthens to be discharg'd at his own Expence.

This way of holding is said to expire at the decease of the *Tenant*¹⁶; because, commonly speaking, at the first making such a Grant, the Merit of the Party was consider'd, which cannot descend to others. And inasmuch as 'tis a great Burthen upon a Man to have the Fruits of his Property pass still into other Hands, therefore the Words in these Grants are to be interpreted in the strictest manner; so that if the Form ran thus, to him and his Heirs, it shall not be extended to the Heirs in a

⁷ Quasi usufructus, 'tis an Expression of the Roman Law, sed utilitatis causa senatus censuit, posse etiam earum rerum usufructum constitui, ut tamen eo nomine heredi utiliter caveatur. Itaque si pecuniæ usufructus legatus sit, ita datur legatario, ut ejus fiat, & legatarius satisfaciat heredi de tanta pecuniâ restituenda, si morietur, aut capite minuetur. Cæteræ quoque res ita traduntur legatario, ut ejus fiant, sed æstimatis his satisfiat, ut ——— tanta pecuniâ restituatur, quanti hæc fuerint æstimatæ. Ergo senatus non fecit quidem earum rerum usufructum (sic enim poterit), sed per cautionem quasi usufructum constituit, Instit. l. ii. tit. 4. §. 2. De usufructu, & quemad. quis datur, fruatur, leg. 7. prin. where we may find all the Particulars at length in the rest of this Law and the next. The Usufructuary for example may search for Mines, Quarries, Beds of Chalk, Coal, &c. which are found in the Ground, of which he has the Profit, although the Proprietor himself knows nothing of them, provided nevertheless that he do no Damage to the Corn, Trees, Vines, and in a word, all things used in Husbandry, to which the Owner of the Ground has designed it. See Mr. Noodt's Observations, l. i. c. 9. This able Lawyer in the following Chapter of the same Work examines how, and by virtue of what the Usufructuary of the Ground, where there are Deer, may appropriate the Profit and Revenue to himself. We may read all this in the Original, and withal the Reflection which Mr. Bernard makes thereon in his Extract of the News of the Republick of Letters, April 1706. p. 430, 431.

De rerum divisione, &c. §. 36.*

For Example, he may not cut up the Trees which are planted in a Walk to make himself a Garden, or sow it with Corn. Et si forte colaptare just prædium, curcularia, vel gestationes, vel deambulationes arboribus infructuosis operari, atque amœnas habens, non debuit cœtere, ut forte hortus obiter faciat, vel aliud quid, quod ad reditum spectat, Ibid. leg. 13. §. 4. There are several Laws with this Title that may be consulted.

De usufruct. & habit. & ministerio serv. leg. 7.* This extends to the least Reparations, and other necessary Expences to improve and preserve the Goods they have the Profit of. For if the Houe, for Example, tumble down without the Fault of the Usufructuary, he shall not be obliged to rebuild it. *Si quæ vetustate corruerunt, reficere non cogitur, modica igitur restitio ad eum pertineat, quoniam & alia opera agnoscit, usufructu legato, &c. See Col. l. iii. t. 33. De usufr. & habit. &c. leg. 12. For the Reason why a certain or uncertain time is fixed, is only, that the Usufructuary, if he lives beyond it, may not preserve his Right; so that if he dies before, the general Rule holds in its full Force as to him. Further, our Author ought not to have forgotten another way by which his Usufruct may be lost; and that is, when the time of Continuance is at an end, or when a certain Condition is to be accomplished.

second Descent¹⁷; since the Property of a thing, if for ever excluded from the Use¹⁸, is utterly insignificant: In which Sense we are to take Cicero's Definition, Id cuiusque proprium est, quo quisque fruatur atque utitur: That's truly the Property of every Man, which he useth and enjoys. Hence, if a Legacy only for the Use and Profits was left to a publick Community, which in other respects may be perpetual, yet the Roman Laws order'd¹⁹, *That the Grant should expire at the end of a hundred Years: As it must cease before, if the State or City be dissolv'd or raz'd by the Violence of an Enemy*²⁰. From the same grounds it proceeds, that a Tenure of this kind cannot be alienated²¹; because at that rate the Proprietor's Claim might be for ever shifted off, and the thing might pass to one whom he would look upon as an Intruder into his Rights and Possessions. A grant of Use and Profits was likewise, according to the Roman Laws, made extinct by the two higher degrees of the Capitis diminutio, or Disfranchisement of a Citizen²². For as they were unwilling to let this Burthen lie on the Proprietor, after the Party, in whose favour it was at first appointed, could receive no benefit from it; so they judg'd it by no means convenient, that a Person, who had forfeited the Privilege of a free Subject, should be still capable of holding such a Right over the Goods of those who were true and lawful Members of the State.

To proceed; this Right, by virtue of some publick Law, or of some private Covenant, may in a certain period of time²³ be lost by Disuse (which alters many things for the worse) or by using it in a different manner from the Rules prescrib'd²⁴; or by impairing the thing, either through design'd Wickedness, or gross Neglect. The Right is likewise extinct, if the thing happen to perish²⁵; nor doth it revive, though the thing be renewed or repaired; by reason of that strict Interpretation which this Affair demands. For Instance; If I build a House in the same place with another which I lost by Fire, it is not judg'd to be the same as the former. And indeed, since the Work must have put me to considerable Charges, it would be very hard, if I must raise a Building which on my side will turn to no account.

Lastly, If either the Proprietor make over his Right to the Tenant²⁶, or the Tenant resign to him, the Use and Profit expires; since a Man cannot receive Service from what's his own; or, because this,

Mr. BARB. NOTES on §. VII.

²⁰ The Law does not speak at all of an Enemy; it only says, If a Plough passes through a City, &c. (i. e.) if it be destroy'd any manner of way, which may happen by the Order of the Supreme Governour for the Punishment of the Inhabitants. Si usufructus civitati legetur, & aratrum in eam inducatur, Civitas esse desinit; ut passâ est Carthago, ideoque quasi morte desinit habere usufructum, Digest. l. vii. t. 4. Quibus modis usufr. vel usus amittitur, leg. 21. The Sacking of a City is expressed here with an allusion to a Custom of which Horace speaks, l. i. Ode 16.

Imprimeretque muris
Hostile aratrum exercitus infolens.

Th' insulting Army brought unto the Wall,
The Hostile Plough to raze it till it fall.

See the Notes of Dion. Gothofred. upon the Law itself, of which he treats.

²¹ i. e. The Usufruct being a Right purely personal, it can't be transferred to a third; so that he acquires and enjoys it in his own Name, as holding it immediately of the Proprietor. But this does not hinder but that the Usufructuary may not only let it out to farm, but resign, sell, or give the Enjoyment of it to a third. All that is meant is this, that the third person shall enjoy it no longer than the Usufructuary enjoys it himself, yet not so fully as if he had the proper and immediate Usufruct. Usufructuarius vel ipse frui ea re, vel alii fruendam concedere, vel locare, vel vendere potest; nam & qui locat, utitur, & qui vendit, utitur. Sed & si alii precario concedat vel donet, puto cum uti, atque ideo retineri usufructum, Digest. l. vii. t. 1. leg. 12. §. 2. Whence it appears, that when the Usufructuary disposeth of the Enjoyment of the Goods, of which he has the Usufruct, according to his Mind, 'tis the same as if he enjoy'd it himself; and in this Case the Right of the Usufruct remains always in the Usufructuary, though he has transferr'd the Enjoyment of the Fruits to a third, as the Expression of the Roman Lawyers implies, Ut ipsum quidem jus remaneat penes maritum [qui post divorcium reddere teneretur usufructum fundi dotis nomine acceptum] perceptio vero fructuum ad mulierem pertineat, Digest. l. x. t. 3. De Jure Dotium, leg. 66. This Law is a matter of Dispute among the Interpreters of the Roman Law, about which we may consult Vinnius on the Instit. l. ii. t. 4. §. 3 numb. 4. and Mr. Titius on Lauterb. Obs. 226.

²⁵ Rei mutatione interire usufructum placet. Veluti usufructus mihi ædium legatus est, cædes corruerunt vel exstiterunt, sine dubio extinguitur. In this case the Usufructuary hath neither right to the Materials nor Place where the House stood. Certissimum est — nec arce, nec cæmentorum usufructum deberi, Digest. l. vii. t. 4. leg. 5. §. 2. See also, leg. 8. 9. 10. 12. 23. Est enim jus in corpore, quo sublato, & ipsum tolli necesse est, Instit. l. ii. t. 4. in princ. But this must be some particular Usufruct, for when we have an universal Usufruct, (i. e.) over all the Goods, the Enjoyment of the rest is preferred. Bonorum autem usufructu legato, arce [ædium incensarum] usufructus peti poterit, quoniam qui bonorum suorum usufructum legat, non solum eorum quæ in specie sunt, sed & substantiæ omnis usufructum legare videtur, in substantia autem bonorum etiam arca est, Digest. l. vii. t. 1. De usufructu, &c. leg. 34. §. 2. Farther, the Interpreters of the Roman Law say, That to know whether the thing of which we have the Usufruct be destroyed, we must consider whether the Name be changed. See Vinnius upon the Institutes, l. ii. t. 4. §. 3. n. 5. 6.

and all other Services do properly denote a Right over somewhat that belongs to another. But when a Person useth his own Possession, and receives Advantages from it; this he does by virtue of his Dominion²⁷, and wants not a new Title or Commission.

VIII. Use, as they term it, is when a Man receives from a thing belonging to another¹, only the daily and necessary Service, the Substance remaining as before. And this is of less Extent than Use and Profits, the Person to whom it is granted being only allowed to take so much Advantage from the thing, as is sufficient for himself and his Dependents; which Allotment is measur'd according to his Dignity and Condition². Thus, for Instance; As he, who hath obtain'd the Use of another's House, may dwell in it with his own Family; so he cannot fairly receive either a Guest of long continuance³, or an Innmate who shall lodge there without being a Member of the same domestical Society; in case the Proprietor himself dwells likewise under the same common Roof; (but 'tis otherwise if the Grant runs for the sole Use of the entire Tenement) nor can he, according to the regular Course, transfer the Use to another; it being a Matter of very weighty Consideration, and of great Difference, whom a Man takes to cohabit with him. As to the Preservation and Reparation of the thing in which any Person hath thus obtain'd a Use, it seems most agreeable to Equity, that if such a Use be once granted, there remains no farther Fruit or Benefit to the Proprietor, than the User shall be obliged to keep the thing safe and sound. If the Profit accruing to both be equal, they shall maintain or repair the thing at joint Charges⁴. But if the Use be inconsiderable in comparison with the Profits which the Owner still reserves to himself; in this Case 'tis easily presum'd, that he intended not to charge it with any Burthen.

IX. Dwelling, in the Civil Law, is a Right by which a Man receives all the Advantages commonly proceeding from the letting out the Houses of others¹. This is of a narrower Compass than the Use and Profits of the same Houses; the latter taking in likewise the Benefit arising from the Reception of Goods, and many the like Causes. And yet it is of a wider Extent than the bare Use; inasmuch as the Person who hath obtain'd it, may let out the respective Buildings to other Tenants, instead of inhabiting them himself.

X. By the Right of Servants Works is receiv'd all the benefit arising from the Labour of another's Servant¹. Which Right the Roman Laws make more contracted, than the Use and Profits of the same Servant; because he is capable of bringing in Advantage by other means besides his Work.

XI. Real Services, due to any Person on account of some Estate or Possession, are, in general, so many Rights, by virtue of which my Neighbour's Estate is charg'd with yielding some certain Advantage to mine. The Civil Law divides them into *Services of City Estates*¹, and Services of Country Estates. By Country Estates are meant Lands, and inferior Buildings, erected only for the Convenience of Agriculture, and preservation of Cattle. Under the Term of *City Estates*² are comprehended all Buildings design'd for the Reception of human Inhabitants, for the Exercise of Commerce, and the like Uses, though seated at any Distance from the City. The Occasion of establishing all these Services was generally taken from Neighbourhood; a Relation which may justly be thought to border very near on that of Friendship. For, inasmuch as it contributed highly both to the Profit and the Pleasure of Men, that many of them should join their Dwellings and Possessions, which Convenience could scarcely subsist, should each Person go about to exclude another from the Use of his Property in every Degree, therefore Neighbours were wont Nam is qui fundi nudum habet usum, nihil ulterius habere intelligitur, quam ut oleibus, pomis, floribus, feno, stramentis & lignis ad usum quotidianum utatur.* By the Roman Laws the User can neither sell, nor make over, nor give away his Right. Nec ulli alii jus quod habet aut locare, aut vendere, aut gratis concedere potest, Instit. l. ii. t. 5. De usu & habit. §. 1. This Right is establish'd, and ceas'd in the same manner as the Usufruct. Idem illis modis, quibus usufructus constituitur, etiam nudus usus constitui solet, isdemque illis modis finitur, quibus & usufructus desinit. Ibid. princip. ³ All that our Author says about the Use of an House is not at all agreeable to the Roman Law; but I must own, that several of the Laws which I have quoted, and some of which our Author refers to, are confuted. See one of them corrected by Mr. Noodt in his Probab. Juris. l. iii. c. 7. who in the following Chapter of the same Work corrects and explains another which relates to this Matter. One general Remark may be also made upon all the Places mention'd in this Chapter, which is, That the Laws of each State, and the mutual Agreements of Parties, or the Will of him that gives freely, may be distinguished a thousand ways. So that no Rule can be made which can absolutely and unchangeably agree to all Cases, and we must seriously attend to the particular Circumstances of every Affair to decide it afterward according to the Nature of the thing and Maxims of Equity, what are the Engagements both of him that confers any of these Rights, and of him who receives them.

² The Words of the Law are, Urbana prædia omnia ædificia accipiuntur, non solum ea que sunt in oppidis, sed & si forte stabula sunt, vel alia meritoria in villis & in vicis, vel si Prætoria voluptati tantum deserventia, quia urbanum prædium non locus facit, sed materia, Digest. lib. l. t. 16. De verbor. significat. leg. 198.

wont to settle it amongst themselves, That no Man should use his own things to all purposes, and in all respects, lest others should thereby be reduc'd, as it were, to Hardships and Streights; but that each Person should allow others such a moderate use of what he himself possess'd, as they could not want without great Prejudice to their Affairs⁴. Τὸν δὲ μάλισα καλεῖν, ὅστις σέθεν ἐγγύθι νάει,
Εἰ γὰρ τοι καὶ χρῆμ' ἐγχώριον ἄλλο γένηται
Γέιτονες ἀζώνοι ἐκίον, ζώσαντό δε πῆοι
Πῆμα κακὸς γείτων, ὅσον τ' ἀγαθὸς μέγ' ὄνεικρ
Ἐμμορέ τοι τιμῆς, ὅς' ἔμμορε γείτονος ἔσθλις.

In English thus;

Call Neighbours first, when Work is to be done;
Your Kinsmen stay to dress, undress'd your Neighbours run;
Ill Neighbours Heaven for Punishments design'd,
As good for Blessings: If one good you find,
Think you have found a Treasure —

Socrates (in Xenophon. Ἀπομν. Lib. ii. p. 432. in fin. Ed. H. Steph.) reckons up these Advantages of a Neighbour's Service; To light your Fire when you have Occasion; to assist you in any good Office; to be ready at hand for the affording you his kind Succour, if you happen to fall into any Misfortune, Add. Plato de LL. lib. viii. p. 915. Edit. Francof. 1652. On the other side, 'tis a general Rule to be observ'd in the challenging these Services, that they be not carried too far, and that they be us'd with Modesty, so as to cause no Trouble or Uneasiness to those that live about us.

The particular Services of City Estates are reckon'd (for the most part) as follows: The Services of bearing a Burthen⁵, by which any Neighbour is bound to let my House rest upon his Wall or Pillar. The Consequence of which is, That the Person who owes me this Service, shall be likewise engag'd to repair the said Wall or Pillar, because otherwise, if the Support should fall, the Service comes to nothing. The Service of letting in a Beam⁶, by which I am allow'd to carry on a Rafter or Beam, or any other Piece which joins my Building together, till it enters into my Neighbour's House, and is there fasten'd.

MR. BARR. NOTES on §. XI.

⁴ The Rights of Service are not confin'd to what is absolutely necessary for the Use of the Possessor of the Ground, but they extend also to whatever is for the Convenience and Pleasure of the Owner, as much as for his Profit. See Mr. Nott's Probab. Juris, l. i. c. 2. where we may find many curious Observations for the understanding of several of the Roman Laws about Services.

The Service of jutting or shooting out⁷, which impowers me to extend any kind of Building over the House or Ground of another Man, yet so as not to make it rest upon the said House or Ground: As in Balconies, Pent-houses, and the like. The Service of raising a Building higher⁸, by which we are bound, though to our own Inconvenience, to give another leave, for his Benefit and Advantage, to raise his House; which we might otherwise forbid, or prevent.

The Service of not raising a Building higher⁹; by which a Man, for the Profit and Convenience of the adjoining Tenements, is constrain'd to keep his House low, or not to raise it beyond such a fix'd Height.

The Service of Lights¹⁰, by which my Neighbour is oblig'd to admit my Lights, or my Windows for the Conveyance of Light.

The Service of not hindring Lights; by means of which my Neighbour can attempt nothing towards the lessening or obscuring the Lights of my House.

The Service of Prospect; by which my Neighbour is bound to let me look freely into his Estate, and cannot deprive me of that Benefit.

The Service of not hindring Prospect; by which a Man is tied up from doing any thing in his Estate, which might interrupt a free Prospect on any side, especially towards any delightful Place.

The Service of receiving Dropping Water¹¹, denotes an Obligation to suffer any such Conveyances to empty themselves upon our Ground, though to our Burthen and Trouble.

The Service of not receiving Dropping Water, denotes an Obligation not to turn the same little Spouts or Gutters, which are already useful to our Neighbour, into a new Course for our own Advantage.

The Service of receiving the River¹², by which my Neighbour is bound to grant Passage to the larger Currents which flow (like a River) thro' my House in Pipes or Canals.

The Service of not turning away the River, restraining my Neighbour from diverting any such Channel or Stream which issues out of his House, so as to hinder it from passing through my Estate, to my great Benefit.

Lastly, We are to refer to the same Head¹³ The Service of employing Sinks and Kennels; of pouring out any thing upon a Neighbour's Ground, and whatever there are besides of the same kind.

XII. The Services of Country Estates ¹; or which are due to Lands and Hereditaments employ'd in rural Affairs, are commonly reckon'd in this Catalogue. Passage; the Right of a Path for Men to walk through my Neighbour's Ground into mine, for the Benefit of the latter. Carriage; the Right of driving Beasts or Wains. Road, or Way; the Right of going, walking, driving; as likewise of carrying, leading, bearing, and drawing any thing which makes for the advantage of my Estate. Water-course; the Right of bringing Water thro' my Neighbour's Field, for the Benefit of my own; whether I use this Water for the Ground, or for the Beasts, or only to free my Land from an unnecessary Burthen and Flood. 'Tis the Nature of these Services, that they cannot be granted in part ², being of no Use unless entire. For, as the Civil Law observes in one of these Instances; A Road or Way is then wont to be finished, when it reacheth either to a Town, or to some high and publick Way, or to a Ferry, or to some other Farm of the same Lord. Therefore it would be vain and useless to obtain a Passage only thro' half another's Ground, if we were not allow'd to go farther. Water-draught; the Right of fetching Water from a Spring, or other Place, for the necessary Occasions of our Ground: Which Grant is presum'd to include also another ³, of free Passage to the Spring or Well. Waterage for Cattle; a Right to drive the Beasts which feed in our Ground, to drink at our Neighbour's Pool. To the same Head belongs, The Right of feeding our Cattle on another's Pasture: Concerning which Right it hath been observ'd, That the Lord of the Ground, which is charg'd with this Service, is not hereby hinder'd from feeding his own Cattle in the same Place, provided he do not over-stock it, so as to intercept the Right of the other Party. And so too he, who hath the Right of Pasturage, ought not to bring in diseas'd or scabby Beasts, which might communicate the Infection to others.

Lastly, To these are added, The Right of burning Lime, of digging Sand, of cutting Stakes, of felling Wood, and of hewing Stone; as they turn to the advantage of Country Estates. All which have been by others explain'd more at large ⁴.

⁴ See Mr. Daumat's Civil Laws in their natural Order, Part I. l. i. t. 12. As to the Right of Fiefs or Fealty (which our Author has omitted) 'tis the common Opinion, that they are derived from the People of the antient Germany. See Grotius, De Jure Belli & Pacis, l. i. c. 3. §. 23. and Paul Haebenbergs's Germania Media, &c. Dissert. 9. or the Extract in Bibliothec. Univers. Tom. vi. p. 356, &c. as also Mr. Thomasius's Discourſe, intit'led, Selecta capita historiæ juris feudalis Germanici, which is among his Selecta feudalia printed at Hall in Saxony in 1708. Yet some, among whom is our Author, as we may see l. viii. c. 4. §. 30. following, believe that it had its Original from the Romans. See Mr. Hertius upon the Place, and his Discourſe, De feudis oblatiis, Sect. 1. §. 2. which is in Tom. ii. of his Comments and Opusc. Mr. Thomasius himself thought formerly, that Fiefs were in use among several People before the Germans, tho' he could not find out the first Rise of them. See his Discourſe, De Origine & Natura Feodi oblati, which is the twelfth among his Disputations at Leipsick. But be that as it will, there are several sorts of Fiefs, of which at this time we shall speak of the most common only. A Fief then is a Right of enjoying fully an immoveable or incorporeal Estate that belongs to another, to whom we have obliged ourselves to pay Homage and Fealty with certain Services and Duties upon that account. The Right passes to the Heirs, but most commonly to the Males only in a right Line, or the collateral Relations on the Father's side; for those on the Mother's have no Title. He that grants these Lands in Fealty is the Lord, and he that receives them is called his Vassal. Where the lineal Heirs capable of Succession are extinct, or the Vassal is found guilty of Felony, i. e. hath broken the Engagements he was under to his Lord, or neglects certain Forms in his Tenure: Or, lastly, performs not the Conditions by which he holds his Fief, it then returns to the Lord. We may find the Customs of Fiefs in the Body of the Civil Law, which Collection was made about the Year 1154. But Mr. Thomasius has publish'd an Author more antient, De Beneficiis, as Fiefs are called, written before the eleventh Century, and has joined with it two fine Discourſes; the one concerning the Author and Antiquity of that Work; the other of the good Use of it; and in them proves, that the Author wrote in the twelfth Century, and at the Bottom of each Paragraph has made References to parallel Places in the Speculum Saxonicum & Suevicum; all which are found in his Selecta Feudalia beforemention'd. In fine, Multitudes of Authors all over Germany have published Treatises about the Nature of Fiefs.

Of Transferring of Property in general.

- I. It proceeds from Property, that we may alienate a thing.
- II. The Consent of two Persons is required in every Alienation.
- III. Which is to be expressed by some Signs.
- IV. An Alienation is made entirely, or upon Conditions.

- V. Whether Livery be required in every Alienation.
- VI. Property is either accompanied with, or separated from Possession.
- VII. What, and how manifold Possession is.
- VIII. How Property is gained by bargaining only.
- IX. True, and feigned Delivery.

WE are now to consider the derivative Ways of Acquisition, by which Dominion or Property already establish'd passeth from one to another: Which, before we proceed particularly to examine, it may be convenient to premise somewhat about the transferring of Property¹ in general. The Power and Privileges then² of alienating our own Possessions, or of conveying them to others, ariseth from the Nature of full Property³: For since this enables a Man to dispose of his own how he pleaseth, it seems the very principal part of that Ability, that he may, if he thinks convenient, transfer the thing to another, by which means he may either procure to himself something more serviceable, or at least may have an Opportunity of obliging a Friend by his own Turn.

II. Now as the Conveyance of Rights and of Things is transacted between two Parties, the one from whom, and the other to whom they pass^a; so in those Methods of Acquisition which flow from the Force and Virtue of Property, the Concurrence of two Wills is required¹, the Giver's and the Receiver's^b: For Alienation doth especially denote, that the thing passeth from the Proprietor with his free Consent, and is not taken from him by meer Violence against his Will. Again, To make a thing change Masters, it is necessary likewise that the latter agree, as well as the former; it being inconvenient, that a thing, which, as to its natural Substance, exists separately from me, should be, as it were, join'd and united to me, unless I embrace it with my own Consent and Choice. But in Cases where the Property is said, of Right, to pass to Men without their Knowledge, as in Inheritances, there the Law is presumed to make an Acceptance by way of Fiction, in Favour of the Heir. Of which this is an Evidence; that the Heir may refuse the Inheritance²; and unless, either in Person or by Proxy, he takes actual Possession of it, he is not affected by those Obligations which arise from it, or are charg'd upon it.

III. Farther, since Alienations ought to be made with the Consent of both Parties, and since it is inconsistent with human Society, that bare internal Acts should be allow'd a Power of producing Rights to hold valid and effectual with regard to other Men; therefore 'tis required on both sides, as well on the Giver's as on the Receiver's, that they declare their Consent by sufficient Signs, that others may be fully assur'd of it: Such as are, Nods, Gestures, Words, Writings; to which, in some Places are added, solemn Profession before a Magistrare, publick Registring, and the like¹.

IV. It is evident, moreover, that when a Transfation or Alienation hath been perfectly and unconditionally made, the Alienator retains no manner of Right or Title to the thing which was before his own. Which Consequence, though it be naturally implied in every Act of this kind, yet 'tis usual in solemn Renunciations and Surrendries, expressly to declare, That neither we our selves, nor our Heirs will hereafter make any Pretension or Attempt upon what we have now given up; and that if any such Motion happens, it shall be null and void: Because, when we have once made a thing another's, we cannot, to any purpose, claim the Disposal of it again. Yet frequently, after a thing hath been alienated, the former Owner reserves some kind of Claim, or a sort of Chance Right, which in Case of some particular Event, now unknown, exerts its Force. And this, either because in the Act of Alienation it was thus ex-

MR. BARB. NOTES on Chap. IX. §. I, II, III.

² Nil enim tam conveniens est naturali æquitati, say the Roman Lawyers, quam voluntatem Domini, volentis rem suam in alium transferre ratam, haberi. Instit. l. ii. t. 1. De rerum divis. §. 40.

preſſy covenanted; as is the Practice in Sales with Liberty of Refuſal¹, in things alienated under an Exception or Condition², and when only a diminutive or imperfect Property is transferr'd³, as happens in the Grant of Feads, and of Copies and Leaſes: Or, becauſe the Alienation includes a tacit Condition, which Condition coming to paſs, the Right of the former Owner to the thing thus convey'd revives; whence ariſe thoſe ſeveral Actions in Civil Law⁴, of Falſe Debt; of things given upon a certain Cauſe⁵, which Cauſe did not follow⁶; of the Recovery of ſpouſal Preſents upon not proceeding to Marriage; of Recovery of Dowry upon Divorce or Separation⁷.

Vulcan, in Homer^a, upon his taking Venus in Adultery^b, challengeth the ἔδνα, the Preſents he made his Father in Law, in proſpect of the Match. 'Tis a Rule in the Alcoran, That if a Suitor put away his Spouſe before Conſummation, ſhe ſhall retain half of what he gave her, unleſs ſhe choiſe to throw him back all.

V. But the chief Point uſually controverted on this Subject is, Whether or no in the transferring of Property the Law of Nature requires Delivery? For others have already well obſerv'd, That Delivery cannot rightly be plac'd amongſt the Ways of acquiring¹, ſince 'tis only an Act intervening in the Conveyance of it. Grotius^b is of Opinion, That, according to the Law of Nature, Property may be transferr'd by bare Covenant; and that Delivery is only requir'd by a civil or poſitive Ordinance; which being receiv'd by many States, is through miſtake ſtyled, The Law of Nations. On the other hand, the Expoſitors of the Roman Laws declare, That the Dominion of things cannot be transferr'd by bare Covenants², though this muſt be expreſſly intimated in the Tranſaction; but that Delivery is ſtill requiſite. The Reaſon of which Neceſſity they take to be this: That Dominions firſt took their Riſe from natural Poſſeſſion, and that therefore in paſſing them away, ſuch an Act muſt intervene, by which the natural Poſſeſſion of the thing may be immediately obtain'd. Some have farther remark'd, That in ordinary Acquiſi-tions, as ſuppoſe in Occupancy, or firſt Seizure, the Title or Cauſe, and the manner of acquiring, fall in with each other. But that in derivative Acquiſitions theſe two are ever diſtinct: Delivery and Acceptance being the manner of transferring Property, or rather the Acts which occur in transferring it; whilſt Donation³, Buying, and Selling, &c. are the Titles or Cauſes upon which the Conveyance is made. Tho' we have already ſhewn, that bare Occupancy is not a ſufficient Title for Dominion, but that it muſt in all Caſes be grounded on ſome precedent Covenant⁴. Others take a middle Judgment in the Point; and as they deny that Delivery is by the Law of Nature neceſſary, ſo they maintain, that 'tis however agreeable to Reaſon; inasmuch as I cannot exerciſe Dominion over a thing, unleſs I apply it, as it were corporally, to my ſelf; which can be done only by Delivery on the one ſide, and by actual Seizure on the other⁵.

VI. In our Judgment, the Matter may be clearly reſolv'd, by obſerving, that Dominion is capable of two different Conſiderations; either as it denotes a bare moral Quality, by virtue of which we underſtand that a thing belongs to ſome Perſon, and that it ought to be ſubject to his Diſpoſal; or as it implies, farther, ſome degree of natural Power; by which we are enabled to put immediately in execution any Purpoſe that we have made concerning the ſaid thing: Or, what amounts to the ſame, Dominion is ſometimes conſider'd as abſtracted from Poſſeſſion, and ſometimes is conceiv'd as united to it; this being, as it were, the final Completion of Property; upon the Arrival of which it fully exerts its direct Effects. For the better Illuſtration therefore of the Point, it will not be inconvenient to ſay ſomewhat of Poſſeſſion in general.

VII. By Poſſeſſion then we underſtand, not the bare Retention of a thing; ſuch as a Keeper¹, an Administrator, a Borrower, or a Tenant for Uſe and Profit, have with regard to the Goods of others; but ſuch as carries along with it an Affection and Deſire of having the thing to one's ſelf². This they divide into ³ natural and civil: Which Division may again be consider'd in two respects; either as to the outward manner of possessing or retaining; or as to the inward Form or Essence of Possession. In the former Sense we are then said to have natural Possession, when having once taken a thing, we stick to it, not only by the Inclination of our Mind, but by actual, and as it were, corporal Application. Civil Possession may in this Sense be kept in Mind only, when 'tis lost as to the Body. Inasmuch as national Laws, in some particular Cases, still allow the Advantages, which follow Possession, to those who have quitted their actual hold ⁴, or lost things out of their Hands. In the latter respect natural Possession is, when we have indeed a Mind and Inclination to keep a thing as our own, yet without any just persuasion of Property, such as might arise from a lawful Title. But civil Possession implies not only a Desire, but likewise a reasonable Ground for that Desire; which, according to the common and regular Course, is always understood in national Constitutions, when they allow any favour to Possession ⁵.

See Cujacius's Obſervat. l. ix. c. 33. Farther, here are ſome great Diſputes (which are for the moſt part but Brangles about words) among the Roman Lawyers themſelves, but more among their Interpreters, the one fixing one Senſe upon the Word Poſſeſſion, and the other another, as well as to the diviſion of it into Natural and Civil. See Mr. Dumal's Civil Laws in their natural Order, Part I. l. iii. t. 7. and Mr. Titius's Obſervations on Lauterbach. 1022, &c. as alſo his Jus Privatium Romano German. printed in 1709. l. ii. c. 7, 8.

Now the proper Subject of Possession are bodily Substances ⁶, whether with or without Motion: The less proper or the analogous Subject, are incorporeal Things ⁶, as Rights, which we possess by using them, and by the Power of so using them; as likewise Deeds and Writings, upon which an Action may be grounded towards some certain Claims. To the constituting and compleating the Nature of Possession, it is requisite that the Person to be put into possession shall either by himself, or by Proxy ⁷, corporally take to him the Thing it self, or the Badge and Sign of it, or the Instrument of Custody, according as the Nature of the thing permits; and consequently, that the Thing be after such a manner subjected to his Power, as that he may be able actually to dispose of it. If many Bodies are united and connected to each other, then the taking any one part with a desire of possessing the whole, is construed for taking the whole, so far as it lies free and void of Owners. Thus, for instance, he who would take possession of a Field, or of a House, is not obliged to walk over every Foot of Ground, or to creep into every Garret; but 'tis enoug^h for him to enter on any part ⁸. A complex Body made up of particular separate Bodies, as a Flock; for example; if all the Parts are present, 'tis supposed to be taken all by laying hold on any one: But if the Parts are divided as to place, one part of the Flock, for instance, in this Field, and another in that ⁹; here each part is to be taken by it self. Incorporeal Things, when they adhere to a corporeal, are presum'd to be taken together with it. But if they are to be acquired in the Goods of others, then they are taken either when we are introduced to a thing, over which ¹⁰, for instance, we design to appoint a Right or Service; or when we exercise any Act which flows, as it were, from such a Right.

In negative Rights ¹¹ it is equivalent to Possessions, if I forbid a Man any thing, or oppose him in his design upon it, and if he retts satisfied after my forbidding or opposing him. To proceed; such a Seizure, or the exercise of such an Act is necessarily required in the obtaining of every Possession: Though it may by civil Ordinances be appointed, That the Property of a thing shall otherwise by Right pass to a Man so effectually, as that he shall bring as strong an Action against one who detains the thing from him, as if he had taken corporal Possession of it ^b.

Farther; As to the acquiring a thing by Occupancy, it is necessary, that the thing lay free and vacant: So if a thing is to pass from another to me, with such force and virtue, as that I may be able hereafter actually to dispose of it, it is likewise necessary that he abdicate and divest himself of the Possession, and remove it, as it were, out of his Custody, that I may have Power immediately to seize on it. And this is enough to make it properly be said, that a thing is deliver'd by another; there being no need that he should directly put it into my very Hands. As I may very well be said to feed a Man, tho' I do not chew his Meat for him; and then thrust it into his Mouth, but only lay it

⁵ This is a Distinction of the Roman Law. By things corporal is understood every thing that is the Object of our Senses, and may be touch'd, as the Ground, Man, a Garment, a Piece of Gold or Silver, &c. Whereas things incorporeal are not obvious to our Senses, and consist only in a certain Right that Men have; such are, an Inheritance, an Obligation, a Pawn, an Usufruct, a Service, &c. Corporales hæc sunt, quæ tangi possunt, veluti fundus, homo, vestis, aurum, argentum, & denique aliæ res innumerabiles. Incorporales autem sunt, quæ tangi non possunt, qualia sunt ea quæ in jure consistunt, sicuti hereditas, usus, usufructus & obligationes quoquo modo contractæ, Instit. l. ii. t. 2. §. 1, 2. Cicero in his Topicks calls the first, things that really exist; and the other, things that have no Existence but in our Minds. Essè ea dico (says he) quæ cerni tangere possunt, ut fundum, ædes, parietem, stillitidium, mancipium, pecudem, suppellectilem, penus, & cætera. Non esse rursum ea dico, quæ tangi demonstrare non possunt, cerni tamen antè & intelligi possunt, ut si in usucapionem, si tutelam, si gentem, si agnationem definitas, quarum rerum nullum subest quasi corpus, & tamen quædam conformatio insignita & impressa intelligentia, quam notionem voco, c. 5. See Mir. Nood's Probab. Juris, l. ii. c. 3.

⁹ The Interpreters of the Roman Law infer this from a Law, which imports, That if in an Herd which one has gotten by Right of Prescription, a Beast be found, that belongs to another who has bought it since the time of the Prescription began, to run with the others, he can't become the lawful Owner of that Beast, because he did not take possession of all the Beasts in the Flock at the same time, and of all them that afterwards should be joined to it, but only of the first. Rorum mixtura facta an usucapionem eajusque præcedentem interrumpit, quaeritur? — Non autem grex universus sic captatur usq, quomodo singule res; nec sic quomodo coherentes. Quid ergo est? Est ea natura ejus est, ut adjectionibus corporum maneat idem, non tamen (for so it ought to be read with Halbender and Cujacius) universi gregis ulla est usucapio, sed singulorum animalium sicut possessio, ita & usucapio, nec si quid erant mixtum fuerit gregi, augendi ejus gratia, idcirco possessionis causa mutabitur, ut si reliquus grex domini mei sit, hæc quoque ovis; sed si quædam suam causam habebunt, ita ut, si quæ fortiter erunt, sint quidem ex grege non tamen usucapiantur, Digest. l. xli. t. 3. De usurpationibus & usucapionibus, leg. 30. §. 2.

¹¹ That is to say, which consists in hindring a Person from doing certain things.

in such a place, whence he may conveniently reach it for his use ^a.

VIII. These Rules being laid down, it is evident, that Dominion consider'd merely as a moral Quality, and as it abstracts from Possession ¹, may certainly be transferr'd by bare Covenants; but that as 'tis understood to include likewise some degree of natural Power, by means of which it may immediately be put in Act, besides Covenants, Delivery is farther required: which doth not arise from the force of positive Law, but from pure natural Reason. Nor yet is it necessary to affirm, That before Delivery the Alienator retains some kind of imperfect Dominion; unless we would very unartificially ascribe the Name of Dominion to a bare natural Ability, actually to dispose of a Thing, without a moral Power or Right.

For after the Covenant is compleated, or after the Right is by Covenant transferr'd on another, the thing immediately commenceth his, and regards purely his Interest and Advantage; and the Alienator can lawfully exercise no Act about it, but such as tends towards delivering up the Possession to the other Party. If, before Delivery, he make any other disposal of the said thing, he doth this only de facto, and not de jure. And Delivery it self is not properly the final Act of Dominion, but the Releasement and Abdication of corporal Custody. For that only is esteem'd an Act of Dominion, which by virtue of Dominion is freely perform'd. But Delivery is made not freely, but upon Necessity, or Obligation. As the Resignation of a Magistrate cannot be stiled an Act of his Office, if we consider that Office as denoting a Power to command others.

But tho' a thing can no longer be reckon'd my own, when I have made over the full Right of it to another Man, yet 'tis somewhat different whether I still corporally detain the said thing, or whether the other Party hath already got possession of it. For in the former case he is both unable to apply it presently to his actual Use; and besides, if I refuse to deliver it, he must compel me to grant him possession in a forcible way. And if Matters stand thus, besides the Inconvenience of wanting the thing in the mean time, if you live under civil Government, you must be at the trouble of making out your Right to the Judge; and if he either through Corruption or Neglect shall pronounce a false Sentence, you must sit down contented: But if you are in a state of natural Liberty, you must try out the Matter by the doubtful Fortune of War.

On this account it is that the Roman Laws affirm ², That those Contracts which treat of the alienating of Things, do give only a Right to the Thing; as if before Delivery the Person were plac'd, as one may say, at a distance from the Thing, only with a Right of joining it to himself hereafter. But that when Dominion hath received its final Completion from corporal Seizure, then a Right is establish'd in the Thing. Yet the Law frequently supplies the former Deficiency: As for instance, by reckoning amongst the Rights in a Thing, the Right of Inheritance ³, or that which the Heirs have to the Goods of the Deceas'd, although they have not yet got Possession. As for the other distinction of the Roman Laws, in granting a ⁴ real Action upon a Right in a Thing, and a personal Action upon a Right to a Thing, the ground of it seems to be this, That when a thing once perfectly belongs to me, I

¹ It is evident, that in this Question every body understands a moral Power, or Right of disposing of a thing that appertains to them, and no Man doubts, but to exercise this Right actually, he ought to be in possession of the thing; so that the distinction of our Author is useless, and he might better maintain the Affirmative plainly. Farther, according to the Maxims of the civil Law, a settled Possession does not require a perpetual keeping of it, nor is it necessary to have the thing possessed in our Hands, or under our Eyes. Licet possessio nudo animo acquiri non possit, tamen solo animo retineri possit, Cod. l. vii. t. 32. leg. 4. Why then can't a Property be gained, as it is a Right purely Moral, by a bare Agreement, without taking any Possession? See Balthaf. Wberner. Elem. Jur. Nat. & Gent. c. 14. l. 50.

² Jus ad rem. This distinction is not found in so many Terms in the Body of the Roman Law, as our Author supposes it, but it is in the Canon Law, which uses it in treating of the Collation of Benefices. "Jus vero quod secundo AD PRÆBENDAM, NON IN PRÆBENDA, hujusmodi competebat, &c. Decretal. l. iii. t. 4. De præbendis & dignit. in 6. Can. 40. Quarum gratiarum ratione tunc non erat ad collationem processum, & sic per consequens JUS IN RE non fuerat ipsis impetrantibus adquefitum, &c. ibid. t. 7. De concessione præb. n. d. &c. Can. 8. Per ordinationem seu divisionem nostram prædictam JUS AD REM expectantibus, &c. Extravag. Joan. 22. t. 4. De concess. præb. c. 1. See Mr. Thomasius's Discourse, intitled, Philosophia Juris de obligat. & action. c. 2. l. 115. 'Tis the third among his Disputations at Leipsick. So that the Interpreters of the Roman Law have borrowed their distinction of Jus in re & ad rem from the Canon Law, and they use it as a consequence of what the ancient Lawyers speak, that no bare Agreements transfer any Property, and therefore a thing must be deliver'd, unless there has been a Possession for some time, as it happens in Prescription. See the Law quoted above, f. 5. n. 2. Hence it follows, that when, for example, a Bargain of Sale is pass'd, no Right is acquir'd to the thing it self (Jus in re) but only a Right to oblige the Seller to deliver it to us, that we may take Possession of it, and by that means acquire a Right to it. This is what the Interpreters call Jus ad rem, as much as to say, a Right to have and acquire a thing; whereas by Jus in re, they understand the Right that they have already acquired to the thing.

⁴ A personal Action is, when we prosecute at Law a Person who is obliged to give or do something on our account, by virtue of a real and particular Obligation that he is under, whether by some voluntary Engagement, (i. e.) a Promise, or by a Contract, or for some Crime or Fault, as having stolen something from us, or endamag'd our Goods, &c. And this Obligation is so personal, that he can't engage himself to a third, who is Possessor by a just Title for the thing due to him, till we have actually released him. As for example, if a Tradesman, after he has sold me a Stuff, sells and delivers it at the same time to another, I have no Right to require that this second Buyer should let me have it; but the Roman Laws allow me an Action of Warranty against the Seller. See Digest. l. vi. t. 2. De publiciana in rem actione, leg. 9. f. 4. and Code, l. iv. t. 39. De hæreditate vel actione vendit. leg. 6. On the contrary, an Action real is, when a Man seizes, as we may say, upon a thing as fully belonging to us already, so that we have right to demand it of any one that has it in his Possession, and the Defendant is obliged to yield it to us not by a particular and personal, but by virtue of that general Obligation, by which every one is ty'd to restore the Goods of another. This sort of Action is call'd Vindication, and a bare Demand, whereas a Personal Action is usually stiled Conditio. "Omnium autem actionum, quibus inter aliquos apud Judices arbitrore de quacunque re quaritur, summa divisio in duo genera deducitur, aut enim in rem sunt, aut in personam. Namque agit unusquisque aut cum eo qui ei obligatus est, vel ex contractu, vel ex maleficio, quo casu proditæ sunt actiones in personam, per quas intendit adversarium ei dare aut facere oportere, & aliis quibusdam modis. Aut cum eo agit, qui est ei nullo jure obligatus, movet tamen alicui de aliqua re controversiam, quo casu proditæ actiones in rem sunt, veluti si rem corporalem possideat quis, quam Titius suam esse adfirmet, possessor autem Dominum ejus se esse dicat — Appellamus autem in rem quidem actiones, vindicationes, in personam vero, conditiones, Instit. l. iv. t. 6. §. 1. & 15. In the first, Res, non persona convenitur, Digest. l. xlix. t. 14. De jure fisci, leg. 19.

have nothing to do but to pursue and take it where-soever I find it; and there is no new and peculiar Obligation requir'd in the other Party to engage him to deliver it. But a bare Right to a thing presupposeth that the thing is not yet fully united to me, and that the other Party is by a peculiar Obligation tied to procure that it shall be thus united: therefore I am to urge him, that he would leave the thing, as 'twere, vacant for me, so that I may take it into my own Possession.

As to what remains, tho' it be a common Saying, That a Thing in hand is better than an Action in the Court; yet 'tis certain, that our Estate may be increas'd by a bare Right to a thing, and by personal Actions. As on the contrary, what a Man by a perfect Obligation owes to another, he cannot, to any purpose, reckon amongst his Goods and Fortunes, tho' he retains, as yet, the corporal Possession of it. Hence he, who possesseth a thousand Pounds, and owes a thousand, hath nothing; and he that owes more than he possesseth, hath less than nothing. For in the Words of the Civil Law, *Id ei abesse videtur, in quo est obligatus*²; So much seems wanting to him, as he is bound to make good.

IX. We are to observe besides, that Delivery is either true, or feigned and suppos'd; the latter of which is done *manu brevi*¹, in short, and without Formality, to save Time and Trouble. Now this chiefly takes place, when I make over by Grant the Property of my Goods to another, reserving, for a certain Term², the Use and Profits to my self. (Tho' in some Grants of this kind it is now an usual Practice for the Donor to deliver the Keys to the other Party, who immediately restores them again.) As likewise, when I resolve that a thing of mine, which another now hath in his Possession³, shall for the future be his Right and Property: Or when, having first lent or set out to hire, or given in trust, a certain thing to you, I afterwards sell it you⁴, or resign it in way of Profit or Portion. This feign'd Delivery is likewise of use between three Persons by Delegation⁵; as if, for Instance, a Man out of Bounty or Debt would give me somewhat, and I order him to give it a third Person. For that's the same as if it had been first offer'd to me, and by me deliver'd into the other Party's Hands.

Delivery then is said to be made *manu longa*⁶, or by a round-about way, when a thing is not immediately brought to another Body, but only shewn or pointed out at a less or a greater Distance⁷. For I have, as far as in me lies, deliver'd that, of which I have quitted the Possession, and have put another in a Method of obtaining it for himself. And to this Head they refer also those Cases, in which any Sign or Instrument of Custody (as Keys⁸, for Instance) is given up. As for the Case of throwing or scattering Largettes among the common People, the Design of it is not, that the things thus dispers'd should be look'd on as derelict, or forsaken, and so be afterwards acquired in the way of Occupancy, by the first Takers; but such a piece of Bounty is really a Species of Donation, reach'd out indefinitely to all the Members of the Crowd; so that the thing thus thrown in common is suppos'd to be deliver'd, as 'twere, to the first Man in the Multitude that lays hands on it. Yet Cæsar speaks otherwise in his Complement to the Soldiers, upon granting them the Liberty of Plunder:

— — — *Neque enim donare vocabo,
Quod sibi quisque dabit.*

I call it not my Gift what each brave Man Shall give himself.

MR. BARE. NOTES on §. IX.

¹ Our Author, tho' he does not distinctly tell us, whether the Deliverance, manu brevi, belong to the real or feigned Deliverance, as the Lawyers from whence he borrows this Distinction do; but then he tells us not, that the same Lawyers make the Deliverance with a long hand of the feigned kind also, and so leaves the Reader in the dark. Wherefore, to clear the Difficulty, I shall shew you what a real Deliverance is, viz. it is a Corporal Act, by which we transmit a thing from one hand to another, i. e. from one Person to another; and then, to make our Author's Sense plain, the Sentence ought to be read, Traditionem esse et certam, vel firmam, quæ [vel longa, vel] brevi manu fieri dicatur. And in this Sense we find the Phrase brevi manu, Dig. l. xxiii. t. 3. De Jure Dotium, leg. 43. §. 1.

⁴ " Interdum etiam sine traditione, nuda voluntas Domini sufficit ad rem transferendam. Veluti si rem, quam commodavi, aut locavi tibi, aut apud te deposui, vendidero tibi; licet enim ex ea causa tibi non tradiderim, eo tamen quod patior eam ex causa emptionis apud te esse, tuam efficio. Ibid. leg. 9. §. 5. ⁶ As when a Man tells Money on a Table to any one. " Pecuniam, quam mihi debes, aut aliam rem, si in conspectu meo ponere te jubeam, efficitur, ut & tu statim libereris, & mea esse incipiat. Nam tum quod à nullo corporaliter ejus rei possessio detineretur, adquisita mihi & quodammodo manu longa tradita existimanda est. Dig. l. xlvi. t. 3. De solutionibus & liberationibus, leg. 79. See also l. xli. t. 2. De acquir. vel amitt. possessione, leg. 1. f. 21. and Mr. Nood's Probab. Juris, where he also shews, that the Presence of a thing is not always necessary by the Roman Law, because it may be thought delivered to him on whose Account we paid it.

⁷ If for Example, he that sells me a Field, shews me it from the top of his House, declaring at the same time that he releases it to me, it is as much mine as if I were carried to the Place and set my Foot in it. " Aut si mihi fundum vicinum mercato venditur, in mea turre demonstrat, vacuumque se possessionem tradere dicat, non minus possidere cepti, quam si pedem finibus intulissim. Dig. l. xli. t. 2. CHAP. X.

Of Wills and Testaments.

- I. How many derivative ways of Acquisition.
- II. Grotius's Definition of a Will is examined.
- III. What is a Will to us.
- IV. Whether Wills proceeded from the Law of Nature is doubted.
- V. The Antients disposed of their Goods while they were living.

- VI. How far Wills proceeded from the Law of Nature, and how far from positive Laws?
- VII. An Inheritance given by Will, wanting due Firm, may be enter'd upon, if none oppose it.
- VIII. But the Heir may null that Will, as if his Ancestor had died intestate.
- IX. Donation in case of Death.

AMONGST the derivative ways of Acquisition, some regard the Chance of Death, and some transfer things whilst both Parties are alive¹. In both Cases the things are convey'd from one Person to another, either by express Will of the former Proprietor, or by the Appointment of some Law interposing in the Affair. Varro De Re Rustica, l. ii. Somewhat must necessarily intervene, before what was another's can become mine².

II. On account of Death 'tis the common Practice of Mankind to transfer things by Testament: The Nature and Origin of which Act we ought with some Care to examine. According to Grotius^a therefore a Testament is the Alienation of a whole Estate in case of Death, and before that time revocable; in the mean while the Right of Possessing and of Enjoying being reserv'd. Whereas 'tis not altogether certain, whether a Testament can rightly be call'd an Alienation, in that strict Sense under which it denotes such an Act, by which a Man makes a thing that was his own become another's. For Alienation being in this Sense a transferring of Right from one to another Person, consequently supposeth the Existence of the two Parties at the time of its Date; so that henceforward the thing may be said to be estrang'd from him who thus transferr'd it. But the Testator¹, so long as he draws Breath, retains a full and absolute Right to all his Goods, without the least Diminution. Therefore, whilst he lives, he cannot properly be said to have alienated any thing: And at the Moment of his Death he loseth immediately all the Right he held whilst alive, and is reckon'd as no body in civil Consideration. Therefore an Alienation cannot be said to be made at that time, when in respect of the Party who should alienate, nothing can be call'd his own or another's. Nor is the Difficulty taken off, if we affirm, That the Alienation is indeed made when the Will is sign'd, but depends in the mean while upon the Casualty of Death, as upon a necessary Condition. For in every Act of Alienation two Parties must join Consents; the one from whom, and the other to whom the thing is transferr'd; and these Consents must be united by conspiring, as it were, together at the same time. But now nothing happens more frequently, than that a Man shall not know

^a Lib. ii. c. 6. f. 14.

MR. BARB. NOTES on Chap. X. §. 1, II.

¹ Here is a more exte^d Division of derivative Acquisitions: I. In respect to the Law, by virtue of which Property is transferr'd, we may divide them into Acquisitions; 1. Natural; 2. Civil; and 3. Mixt. Natural Acquisitions are such as are conformable to the Rules of the Law of Nature only, i. e. which depend only upon the mutual Consent of Parties. Thus we acquire by virtue of all Engagements, where the civil Law leaves every one at their full Liberty. Civil Acquisitions are such as transfer a Property without the Consent of the Proprietor. The principal way of acquiring here is by Prescription. See Chap. xii. f. 1. n. 1. following. Acquisitions mixt are made by the mutual Consent of Parties, either express or tacit, but yet with such regard to civil Constitutions, that if they be not conform'd to, the Act is void. Thus we get things by a Will or Contract, yet the Laws of the State prescribe certain Forms to be used in such sort of Actions. II. These three sorts of Acquisitions may be consider'd either with respect to the Time they were made, or in respect to the Thing acquired. As to the Thing, they are universal or particular, according as we acquire the Goods of a Person, in whole, or in part. As to Time, they have place either in case of Death, or in time of Life. See Mr. Titius's Observ. on Puffend. 300, &c. The first sort comprehends Wills, and Gifts in case of Death, which are treated of in this Chapter. The other comprehends all Agreements and Contracts in which any Alienation is concerned, to which we may also refer Donations among the Living, altho' our Author in his Abridgment of the Duties of a Man and Citizen, l. i. c. 12. has ranked them under a different Head, and so has not touch'd on them in this Place. But we shall supply this Defect by a Note, because he has not treated of them in this Work.

shall not know himself to be Heir 'till the Will comes to be open'd upon the Testator's Decease. And likewise when the Will is thus open'd, 'tis at the Choice of the Heir appointed, whether he will enter upon the Inheritance, or wave and refuse it.

Again, Since all the Right of the Heir by Will commenceth at the Testator's Death; he hath not, before that Moment, any Right which can be said to depend on the Death of the Party as on a Condition. Besides, when any kind of Alienation is made, though such as may be recall'd, yet it ought to transfer such a Right on the Person towards whom it is directed, that it shall not be disannull'd at the bare Pleasure of the Alienator. For otherwise, neither the Alienator can be suppos'd to have contracted any Obligation, nor the other Party to have acquired any Right, if the whole Transaction amounted to no more, for Example, than this slight Promise, You shall have, one time or other, somewhat which I now possess, provided you don't displeas'e me in the mean while; but then you shall have no Right to hinder me from being displeas'd at any time when I think fit, or without any manner of Reason. Such an Act as this cannot be stiled an Alienation, being a bare Declaration of a Man's present Design, without any necessity of continuing the same Resolution; which is incapable of producing any Obligation on the one side, or any Right on the other^a. But a Testament is really such a Declaration of a Man's Intentions, as doth not confer any Right on the other Party before the Testator's Death; such, at least, as may have the effect of full and perfect Right against the Claim of the Testator himself. For after the Will is drawn up, the Testator doth not only retain the most absolute Right of possessing and enjoying, making over to the Heir only the bare Property; but indeed the Property itself is still, without the least Diminution, his own. Of which we have this evident Token, That after all this he may alienate his Goods, or may strike out those who at present stand Heirs, without any Possibility of Redress. But now even revocable Alienations ever suppose some Casualty, or some Condition under which they are to be revers'd, and which doth not depend merely on the Alienator's Pleasure or Humour.

III. We shall express the Nature of a Testament more plainly, and more agreeably to the Sense of the Roman Lawyers, if we call it, A Declaration¹ of our Will touching the Successors to our Goods, after our Decease, yet such as is mutable and revocable at our Pleasure, whilst we live, and which creates a Right in others to take Place only, when we are gone. Concerning which Mutability the Law of general Kindness commands thus much, That no Man, unless on Account of his Demerit, be wheedled and cajol'd with false Hopes², or be ridiculed and exposed. Whence, tho' we can hardly disapprove of what Pliny reports of Domitius Tullus, who had chous'd some hungry Rascals in the wicked Tribe of the Hereditaria; Others on the contrary, says he^b, commended this Humour; in that he frustrated the evil Hopes of such Men, whom, considering the Practice of the Age³, it is a Part of Prudence thus to deceive⁴; yet Valerius Maximus^d had good Reason to censure Q. Cæcilius and T. Rutilius, of whom the former put a Trick of this kind on L. Lucullus, the latter on Lentulus Spinther, their greatest Friends and Benefactors.

IV. Whether these Testaments owe their Original to natural or to positive Law, is disputed amongst the learned. The Meaning of which Question is not, Whether a Man be obliged by the Law of Nature to make a Will (for that certainly is in every Man's Choice, unless so far as it proves necessary to prevent Quarrels amongst his^e Relations) but whether after Property hath been introduc'd, it necessarily follows from the Nature of that Establishment, that a Man may effectually dispose of his Goods by Will, or whether this Power is granted to Proprietors by positive Constitution? Grotius's Judgment^f in the Case is, That a Testament, as many other Acts, may indeed receive a particular Form from civil Ordinances; yet the Essence and Substance of it is nearly allied to Property, and up on Supposition of Property, belongs to the Law of Nature. Or, that the Power of disposing effectually of what we possess, is deriv'd from the Law of Nations¹, which the Civilians term Jus Primarium, the first or principal Law; but the Restraint which lies upon us to dispose of them only after such a certain manner, is owing to civil Appointment. In regard to which Assertion, 'tis not improbable,

² Hear what the Oracle of Gascoigne (which is the Title that the Abbot of St. Real in his Preface to Cicero's Epistle to Atticus gives Montagne) says, "I now see 'tis time lost to bestow much Pains in Courtships; one Word ill construed blots out the Merit of Ten Years. Happy is he that can hit the time, please their Humour at the last Gasps! The nearest Action pleases most; not the best or most frequent good Offices, but the freshest and most present do the Work. These Men manage their Wills as Apples or Rods, to encourage or correct every Action of their Dependents. 'Tis a thing of too much Attendance and Weight to be thus hurried every Moment, and against which wise Men resolve once for all, respecting, above all, Reason and publick Observation. Essay, l. ii. c. 8. p. 284, 285." See also a fine Passage in Mr. de la Bruyere's Characters, in the Chapter about certain Usages, printed at Brussels in 1697. The Character begins thus; "It is true, there are a sort of Men whose Will nothing can determine but Death, because so long as they liv'd they were never resolved nor quiet, &c."

⁴ The Distinction of the Law of Nations into primæval and secondary was not made by the Roman Lawyers, but their Interpreters. Moreover, the Power of making Wills ought to be referred to that Right of Nations which they call secondary, and not to the primæval, which is nothing else, according to them, but the Law of Nature taken in the Sense which I have elsewhere explain'd it, l. ii. c. 3. f. 2.

but that some Scruple may arise ². For since the things, over which Property was first established, are designed only to serve the Uses of Men in this Life, and since the dead lose all their Title to worldly Possessions, it seem'd not altogether so needful, that Property should contain in it a Power of ordering what should become of a Man's things after his Decease. But it might have been sufficient to have allow'd every Person the Command of his Goods during Life, disabling him to extend it farther, and to have left to the Care of the living the Management of what belong'd to the Dead, who are no longer Members of human Society.

Farther, since Death removes Men from all Concerns below, it seem'd that the Disposals and Declarations made in their Life-time might be afterwards neglected with Impunity.

MR. BARB. NOTES on §. IV.

² Our Author in my Opinion makes a Difficulty where there is none. I am mistaken if his false Notion about the Original of Property, which we have above confuted, hath not made him without Reason reject Grotius's Judgment, and multiply Beings without Necessity. Another Author, which I have seen since my first Edition of this Work, asserts, That the Power of making Wills is only from civil Right, a Principle worse grounded in my Judgment, as I have shewn above, c. vi. §. 1. n. 1. I shall now only speak of this Position of his, That the Right of Property ends and is extinct with Possession of itself. See Mr. Bynkershoek's Observation, l. ii. c. 2. The Hypothesis being then confuted, 'twill be easy to invert the Consequence. I assert then, That the Settlement of Property being neither founded on any Agreement, nor limited by the time of Possession, but depending only (as we have shewn) upon this, That every one has seiz'd for ever of a certain reasonable Portion of the Goods of this World, which naturally belong no more to one than another, it follows, that when a Man hath appropriated to himself any thing after that manner, no other Person can pretend to it, unless he abandons it anew to the first Occupant, or transfers it to some other; but he hath a Right to dispose of his Goods during his Life, and may leave them, as their Proprietor, to whom he pleases, after his Death. And truly I can't see why this should not be a consequent of the Right of Property. Suppose Men were immortal, should not a Proprietor naturally preserve the Right he has once gotten? The necessity of Dying, to which all Men are subject, will permit them to enjoy their Goods but a few Years, and then it is but natural to make up the Loss, and perpetuate as far as they can their Right of Property after their Death, by declaring to whom they will have it pass; and so the Heir taking the place of the Dead, and representing him in some manner, no other can pretend to his Goods any more than if he had possessed them himself. In the Case 'tis laid down as an uncontroverted Maxim, That Men can desire nothing more reasonable, than to have a liberty to dispose of their Goods at their Death. Nihil est enim quod magis hominibus debeatur, quam ut supremæ voluntatis, postquam jam aliud velle non possunt, Liber sit sibi, & libertatem, quod iterum non redit, arbitrium, l. i. t. 2. De Sacrosanctis Ecclesiis, leg. 1. See the Passage of Quintilian quoted below, §. 5. n. 2. All the World agree, That Men while they live, and hold as it were hand in hand, may transfer to others, either absolutely, or upon certain Conditions, the Right of Property which they have to a thing; and why then may they not do the same at their Death, and in a manner revocable or irrevocable? I can't see the great Difference there is between these two things, especially if we consider the Donations in case of Death, of which this Author treats at the End of the Chapter, and which without doubt are a Right purely civil. Further, the Goods which Men ordinarily leave at their Death being usually either the Fruits of the Industry alone of the Proprietor, or things which are cultivated and improved by Care and Labour, would it not be unskill to have them abandoned after his Death to the first Occupier; so that he can't have the Satisfaction before his Death of thinking that he shall leave them to such Persons as he loves? 'Tis true, that (as Mr. Bynkershoek says) the Earth was appointed for the Service of Men of all Ages, and that all Generations, that succeed one another, ought to have a Provision for themselves by their Labour and Travail. But it does not follow, that by natural Right, when a Person dies, he leaves his Goods to some body, as he must necessarily do, no Man being able to carry any thing away with him to the Grave; and there are in the World besides things enough which belong to the first Occupant, if we will take the Pains to find them out. Mr. de Bynkershoek himself acknowledges, that if every Man's Goods after his Death were left to the Plunder of others, it would cause infinite Disorders; and therefore the civil Laws have regulated Successions and allowed Wills. Farther, it is not necessary that they, to whom we dispose our Goods, should know and accept, when we are alive, what we intend to bequeath them at our Death. Our Author maintains, that in reality the Will of him who transfers his Right, and of him to whom it is transferr'd, ought always to be united in a mutual Consent at the same time; but in this he doth not agree with himself, for he acknowledges above, l. iii. c. 9. §. 4. That a Gift is valid, though the Donor be dead before 'tis accepted by the Legatee, if he who ought to declare it be only a bare Reporter of the Will of the third. As to the dead Persons themselves, they have nothing to do with the thing of this World; but it doth not follow that they never had, while they were yet alive, a Right to order the disposal of their Goods after their Death, but only they are not in a condition to make it of Force themselves. If the Antients, as our Author speak, made their Relations swear to perform the Orders they made when they died, 'twas to engage them more strictly by an Oath, and not that they believed no other Reason sufficient to oblige them to fulfil the Will of a Person dead. We see that in the highest Antiquity such, as were not Members of any Society, dispos'd of their Goods before they died, without Controul. Abraham's Example is remarkable; he had Parents in Charran, in Mejopotannia, and without going far; he had with him in Canaan, where he dwelt, his Nephew Lot; nevertheless, when he thought he should have no Children, he designed to exclude all his Relations, and make Eliazar, his Steward or chief Slave, his Heir, Gen. xv. 2. We must then conclude, that a Power of disposing of our Goods in case of Death, in a manner either revocable or irrevocable, results from the Right of Property, and by Consequence is founded on the Maxims of the Right of Nature and Nations. So that if the civil Laws prescribed certain Limitations and Form to that Power, it proceeds from the Authority which the Sovereign hath to limit the Right of Property, and to regulate the Use that Citizens ought to make of their Goods; as you may see, l. viii. c. 5. §. 3. following. In fine, what I have said is so true, that our Author himself, after an useless Circle, returns again to the same Point, and in the following Chapter builds the Succession to a Person intestate upon the Presumption of the Will of the dead Person. All the Difference is, that instead of making the Power of disposing of his Goods at his Death to depend upon the Right of Property, he refers it to a tacit Agreement of the People, by which he supposes, without Necessity, that they entered into a common Covenant to put such a Strength in Property, as according to him it had not before. This Notion is the more satisfactory to me, because Mr. Buddeus, in his Discourse intitled De Testamentis Summorum Imperantium, maintains also against the Opinion of our Author, That the Power of making Wills proceeds from natural Right, and not from civil only. He also there observes among other things, that the Disposals of the Testator can't be executed without the Consent of the Heir; yet the want of that Consent does not deprive the Testator of that Right which he hath by Nature to dispose of his Goods; a Right which hath such a Virtue and Effect, that no Man can lawfully appropriate to himself the Goods of a dead Person, before he knows whether the Heir will accept the Inheritance devised to him, or no. If this be observed, the Will of the Dead is fully satisfied, because without doubt he intended not to force his Goods upon his Heir against his Will. The Heir also has some Right during the Life of the Testator, altho' 'tis not irrevocable, nor becomes his 'till the Testator is dead, without a Change of Resolution. They, who affirm the contrary, are fallen into this Error for want of distinguishing well between Acts imperfect and not consummate, and such as are null and of no effect. It is certain, that by natural Right a Will can't be entirely fulfilled, 'till the Heir accepts of the Succession after the Death of the Testator, yet it doth not follow that before that 'tis a vain Act, and of no Force. It is valid so far as the Nature of the thing will permit, and in this, that no other Persons can claim the Goods of the Deceased, until he that is appointed the Heir refuses to inherit. The rest of Mr. Buddeus's Discourse is worth the reading. At present I shall only observe, that Mr. Thomasius, who heretofore forsook the Opinion now oppos'd, is returned to it again; but I can't find that either in his Fundam. Jur. Nat. & Gent. l. ii. c. 10. §. 9, &c. nor in his Discourse, De Origine Successionis Testamentariæ, printed at Hall in 1705, he has confuted any of the Reasons now laid down. In a Word, whether it be advantageous to civil Society to leave every one at their Liberty to dispose of their Goods by Will, is a Question of a different Nature, and which our Author himself will treat of in the last Paragraph of the following Chapter.

Id cinerem & manes credis curare sepultos ^a?

Think you cold Dust and Shadows feel such Cares?

An Evidence of this it seems to be, that the most antient Men we read of in Story were wont to engage their Friends by Oaths to fulfil their last Commands, as if no human Bonds were strong enough to oblige them in this Case. See Gen. xxiv. 2, 3. xlvii. 29. Diodor. Sic. l. ii. p. 119. Ed. Rhodom. c. 33. speaking of Parfodes's Death.

Thus too in Sophocles (Trachin. 1192, &c.) Heracles requires an Oath from Hyllus, for the Performance of his last Commands.

So Constantinus Ducas obligeth his Wife Eudocia by Oath never to enter on a second Marriage after his Decease. Yet by what Stratagem she recover'd her Writing from the Patriarch, who had the keeping of it; and how, as if she had hereby been releas'd from her Engagement, is very strange, she marry'd Diogenes, we read in Zonar. Tom. iii. in Eudocia, and in Michael Glyc. Ann. Tom. iv.

So in J. Josephus (Archæolog. Jud. xvii. 10) Herod's Commands for slaying the chief of the Jews are neglected by his Sister and her Husband. So;

Jusserat hæc rapidis aboleri carmina flammis
Virgilius, Phrygium quæ cecinere Ducem.
Tucca venat, Variusque simul; tu, maxime Cæsar,
Non fuist.

Virgil those Strains which rais'd the Trojan's Fame,
Dying, bequeath'd to feed th' injurious Flame.
Tucca and Varius stop the rash Design,
And you, great Cæsar, save the Glories of your Line.

Dio Cassius, lib. lix. relating how Tiberius's Will was declar'd null by Caligula and the Senate, adds this Reflection, That no Counsel or Foresight can prevail against the Ingratitude of Men, and the Power of Posterity. To which may be applied that Saying of Lucan, — Nulla fides rebus post terga relictis, l. ii. v. 628.

In vain we trust to things we leave behind.

Therefore 'twas at the Pleasure of the Survivors, whether or no a Man's Will should take effect, even after he was dead. And consequently they were to determine by some Agreement amongst themselves, how far they should comply with the Desires of those who had now lost the common Rights of Men. Without such an Appointment any precedent Disposal would have been vain and useles, which the Author could not, and others who could would not maintain and put in Execution.

But, on the contrary, it manifestly appears, that 'twas not sufficient, in order to the Peace of human Society, to introduce such a Property or Dominion of things, as should turn only to the present momentary Use; but 'twas needful to make it such as should hold good hereafter: Man, so far as Nature allows, having no less a Right to preserve Life for the future, and to provide Means towards obtaining that End, than for the present Moment. To which if we add, That we are enjoin'd to take a particular Care of those who are allied to us in Blood, whose Race we wish may continue to an indefinite extent of Ages, it will on the whole appear to have been conducive to the Peace of Mankind, not to make the Force of Property depend on any fix'd Period of Time; since this would have created no less Confusion and Trouble than the primitive Community: But to assign it, as 'twere, an Indefinite Duration, by means of which it might pass down and be continued to others. Now as to the preserving and the continuing this Property, those who live in a state of natural Freedom, appoint Means according to their own Judgment. But in civil Governments, as it is supported by the publick Strength, so it hath been variously temper'd and retrench'd, as particular Nations have at any time thought it to be for their Interest.

As for the Notion invented by the Author of the New Method of Law ⁴. I question whether it will meet with the Approbation of sound Judges. Testaments, says he, by meer Right, that is, without the Confirmation of civil Ordinances, would be of no force or weight, unless the Soul were immortal; but because those who are taken out of this World do really still live, therefore they remain Proprietors of their Goods; and those whom they appoint their Heirs are to be look'd on as their Stewards and Managers.

V. But as no one will be forward to maintain, that for a Man to be able to dispose of his Goods at such a time as he is the true Proprietor, and to fix the Effect of his Disposal on a time when he shall not be Proprietor, is repugnant to the Law of Nature: So, on the other hand, it doth by no means appear that this flows by any necessary Reason from the Essence of Property.

Thus much indeed flows from thence, That a Man whilst alive may confer a Right to his Goods on another living Person, which shall not be extinct upon the Death of the Collator, being still kept alive in the other Party who survives. For inasmuch as the Efficient and the Effect are distinct and separate Beings, there's no Necessity that the latter should always die with the former. And therefore, as a Man in his Life-time may fully transfer somewhat which he possesseth on another, who shall not lose the Property of it by the Death of him from whom it was receiv'd; so nothing hinders but that a Man may make over the Property of any thing to some Person else, yet so as to reserve still to himself a certain Right over the said thing during his continuance in this World. Hence in the most antient times we find the Fathers of Families disposing of their Goods at the Approach of Death ¹; (for as to the Passage in Gen. xv. 3. Abraham seems not to have already made his Ser-vant's Son his Heir, but only to have thought of making him, in case he happen'd himself to die without Issue) yet so, as that they themselves open'd and publish'd their Will to their Children, that these, by acquiescing in it, might seem to confirm it by mutual Covenant amongst themselves. By this means the Right immediately pass'd from the living Parents to the living Children; and the latter were admitted presently, as 'twere, into Possession of the Goods. And 'tis probable, that those primitive Men, who follow'd so plain and frugal a way of Life, commonly were not cut off by our sudden and violent Distempers, but decay'd leisurely by the gentle wasting of the radical Moisture; so that they were Masters of their Reason to the last, and were never summon'd by Death unawares, and upon a Surprise^a.

MR. BARB. NOTES on §. IV, v.

After the same manner Cyrus, in Xenophon^b, allot his Sons with his own Mouth the Division of their Father's Fortunes. And indeed these last Disposals ought to obtain great Favour and Allowance; it being thought no small Comfort under our mortal Condition, that what a Man hath labour'd for in his Life, should afterwards fall to that Person rather than others, whom he particularly chooseth and desires^c. 'Tis established, says Quintilian^c, by the Laws and Customs of the State, that as often as it can possibly be done, the Testaments of the deceas'd should be strictly obey'd. And this upon no ordinary Grounds and Reasons. For there seems no greater Consolation in Death, than to have a Will which shall hold good after Death, otherwise a Man might think an Estate a Burthen, if he had not the full Disposals of it; and if all the Right which we are allow'd to have over it, whilst we live, were to be taken from us when we die. Nor is Statius's Reflection on Barrenness unworthy of Consideration:

*O, bitas omni fugienda nisu,
Quam premit votis inimicus heres,
Optimo poseens (pudet heu!) propinquum
Fumus amico.
O, bitas nullo tumultu a fletu!
Stat domo capta cupidus superstes
Imminens leti spoliis, & ipsum Computat ignem.*

From Barrenness, good Providence defend!
Which feeds the Wishes of th' ungodly Heir,
Begging the speedy Funeral of his Friend.
Barrenness buried with no parting Tear!
The eager Successor in th' empty Seat
Stalks like a Victor in a Fortress won,
Greedy to fasten on the Spoils of Fate;
And counts, with grudging Care, the Charges of a Stone. Sylv. iv. vii. 34, &c.

Add to these a Passage out of Pindar, who thus speaks,

*Ἐπέι πλῆθος ὁ λαχὼν ποιμένα ἐπιπλὸν ἀλλότριον
Θνάσκοντι συγερῶτατος.*

Od. X. ver. 106, &c.

The Rich Man much doth grieve,
That when this World he leaves,
Strangers his Wealth receive.

VI. But the Question under Debate doth not proceed so much with regard to these actual Disposals during Life, as to those Testaments by which a Man so conveys his Possessions, as to retain the liberty of altering them to his last Breath, so that the Right of the Heir to the respective Goods shall not commence 'till the Testator's Decease: Which Method of Appointment many have, with very good Reason, prefer'd to that other, but now mention'd, by which Men upon the Brink of Death distributed their Goods amongst their Heirs with their own Hands. For some sudden unforeseen Fate frequently either hurries Men out of the World, or however removes them far from their Friends, so as they want Time or Opportunity to express by Mouth their last Resolution.

And again, Persons who seem'd to have had more than one Foot in the Grave, have often by some strange Turn recover'd their Health, when they utterly despair'd of it. And it was likewise judg'd more convenient, that a Man should dispose of his Goods rather whilst he was in Ease and Quiet, and Master of a sound and clear Reason, than when he was trembling at his last Hour, or when his Mind was shock'd and weakened by the force of his Distemper.

Besides, it was more advantageous for each Person to remain Lord of his own Possessions to his final Gasp, and to give no Man such a Right over them as could not, without Inconvenience, at any time be revoked, when either the Merit of the Party, or his own Inclination shall alter^d. (As the French tell us, 'Tis senseless to put off our Cloaths before we are near going to Bed.) For tho' the Conveyance of Right, in this Case, might be made reversible, or such as the Conveyer might disannul, upon appearance of some Condition, either casual or voluntary^e, on the part of him to whom the Conveyance was made; yet the Doubts which must necessarily have arisen about the proof of this Condition, and which each Person would have urg'd for his own Title, must have occasion'd endless Disputes. At least he, who had been once declar'd Heir, would have conceiv'd the highest and most mortal Resentment against the Disposer, should he for any slight Reason be depriv'd of what he had already seiz'd upon in Hope and Expectation. Many likewise have expos'd themselves to very great Dangers, by openly naming their Heir too soon. Thus Caligula, when Persons had put him down in their Wills amongst their Children, and had made open Profession of it, and yet still liv'd on, gave them the Name of Mockers, and sent many of them a poisonous Mef to dispatch them^e.

When Herod had taken up a Design of dividing his Kingdom amongst his Sons, Augustus forbid him to proceed, ordering him, so long as he liv'd, to keep both his Kingdom and his Sons in due Subjection^a. As the Family of Augustus himself was afterwards distracted with a very fatal Emulation, upon his naming a Successor in his Life-time: It hath therefore been thought safe to take care Mens Wills should only be publish'd after their Death, that they may bring no Odium, and no Danger upon them, whilst they live.

On the same Ground it hath been look'd on as a most detestable and barbarous Villany to unseal and divulge a Testament during the Life of the Testator. So when Cæsar, upon the breaking out of the civil War, caus'd Antony's Will, which he had deposited in the Hands of the Vestal Virgins, to be rehearsed in open Senate; many took very grievous Offence at the Act. For, as Plutarch observes^b, they judg'd it to be most monstrous and unreasonable, that a Man should be obliged to give an Account, whilst alive, of those things which he intended should be done after his Death. Especially since amongst the Romans 'twas an usual thing to give Judgments and Characters of particular Persons in these last Instruments^c. As appears from frequent Instances in Tacitus. Add. leg. l. f. 38. D. Depositi, l. i. f. 5. D. ad L. Cornel. De Falsis.

Now tho' the Reasons here allegg'd, and others the like highly recommend to most Nations this way of final Disposal, yet we cannot hence evince, that such Testaments do naturally flow from the Propriety of things, and consequently are prescribed by the Law of Nature. For tho' we should suppose, that by the common Consent of Mankind such a Force was granted and affixed to Property, as that a Person might constitute whom he pleas'd to possess his Goods after his Decease; yet that this should be done in such a particular manner, whereby both the Testator's Will should remain ambulatory or changeable during his Life^d, and the Right of the Heir not begin 'till the Testator's Death, and the Party who is Heir not know so much 'till then; all this is invented and establish'd by positive Ordinances. For otherwise, in transferring Right from one to another, according to the regular Course, it had been necessary that the Consents of the two Parties should exist together at the same time^e, and, as 'twere, meet and unite: From which Union the Translation of Right is conceiv'd to arise. But now in the Case before us, 'tis so far from being necessary, that the Consents of the Testator and of the Heir should be united; that there is allow'd an Interval of Time, even between the Death of the former, and the Entrance of the latter; the

VII. It is wont likewise, with great Pains and Labour, to be disputed; Whether the Heir by Will can with a safe Conscience enter upon the Inheritance, when the Will was defective in any Point or Form required by civil Ordinances? As likewise, Whether the Heir at Law, or he who was to succeed in case the Party had died intestate, can honestly overthrow such a Will, upon failure of these Formalities, tho' he is assur'd that the Testator seriously design'd to bequeath his Goods to the Person there specified? Those who take the negative side of both Questions, rely chiefly on the Hypothesis formerly mention'd^f, that the making of Wills is a Precept of the Law of Nature. Whence they conceive that he, who overthrows a Will thus defective, may indeed defend his Proceeding in outward Cognisance, or in civil Courts, but not in the inward Judicature, or in the Court of Conscience.

For the thorough Understanding of these Matters we ought beforehand to observe, that national Laws are scarce in any Point more careful, or more strictly exact in requiring certain Forms and Ceremonies, than in Testaments; as well to prevent the many Frauds and Juglings which might creep in to those written Instruments, as to cut off those most grievous Contentions, which Avarice would have rais'd upon the Case; scarce any thing being gotten with less Pains than a rich and plentiful Inheritance. Hence, inasmuch as every Person of competent Years, and not stupidly rude and ignorant, is presum'd either to have known himself, or to have been able to learn from more skilful Heads, after what manner the Laws of his Country command Testaments to be made; no one is supposed to have express'd his serious Resolution in such a way as he knew would not hold good against those who should oppose it in Court; especially considering that Men are allowed so vast a Time for the settling this Business. When therefore a Testament is found disagreeable to the civil Constitutions, 'tis easily presum'd that there hath been some fraudulent Contrivance, or that the Testator either was not well in his Wits, or else drew up the Instrument negligently and hastily, and more by the Instigation of others, than by his own free Motion: So that the only End and Design of those Forms was, that a forged Testament should not be set afoot instead of a true one; or a sudden and unadvis'd Impulse be admitted for a deliberate Resolution: Especially since, without any such Act, the Law calls to

MR. BARR. NOTES on §. VI, VII.

² See Mr. Thomasius's Discourse, already quoted, De Captatoris Institutionibus, §. 10. You'll find in the following Paragraphs many curious things about the Cautions that the Romans took to hinder Men from being put into Wills.

³ I own, that a wise Man ought to dispose of his Goods, and ought not to change his Will rashly or out of an Humour, as they do, of whom Mr. de la Bruyere speaks in a pleasant Railery in the Place I referred to above. "A peevish Man as long as they live puts them into his Will, they appease him, and tear their Draught, and throw it into the Fire; they have as many Wills in their Chest, as Almanacks on their Table; they may count them by the Year." But it doth not follow from hence, that they may not by a natural Right dispose of their Goods in case of Death, but in an irrevocable manner. On the contrary, as upon the most mature Deliberation 'tis easy to mistake in the choice of his Heirs, or suffer himself to be deluded by some crafty Fellow, or change one's Mind, so also a thousand unforeseen Cases happen, from which great Inconvenience may arise, if the disposals of our Goods, which we have once made, must remain unchangeable. It is very natural, that no Man should tie his own Hands, and that Death alone should fix a Testator's Will entirely. Without this the Right of Property will be limited where it ought to have the greatest Liberty, I mean, by the Disposals of his Goods for a time, and to be inevitably strip of them through the sad Consequences of the natural Condition of Mankind.

⁴ See what is said on §. 2. n. 1. and §. 4. n. 2.

the Inheritance the next of Kin, those who are ordinarily suppos'd to have stood fairest in the Opinion and Wishes of the deceas'd. But though it may so happen, that one who goes about to declare his Mind in this Matter, upon serious thoughts and mature deliberation, may mistake as to the usual Forms; yet Courts of Judicature have no other means to be inform'd what was the Intention of the deceas'd, than by these Instruments. And since 'twas at first allowable for the civil Authority to put this power of making Wills under such Rules, as should render it more serviceable to the publick Good, there's no need to recede from the common Decrees, for the sake of one or two private Persons; since if such a Precedent were once admitted, endless Cheats and Quarrels would ever be starting up.

Again, He who is balk'd of an expected Inheritance upon a Failure in the Writings, cannot complain of hard Usage; For, neither can he plead the Prerogative of Blood and Birth (because then he would have succeeded without Will) nor can any Man by Testament acquire a Right which shall hold good, at least in case of Opposition, unless it be squar'd according to the Statute. Wherefore such a Person must attribute his Disappointment rather to his own Misfortune, than to any Injury of others. But, notwithstanding all this, if the Will be not call'd in Question, then the nominated Heir may fairly enter upon the Possessions. For the Flaw which the civil Ordinances suppos'd upon defect of Formalities, doth in this case vanish (it being taken for granted that the Testator seriously design'd this Person for his Heir) and really the Goods belong to him rather than to any others, after those, who according to the general Course of the Law would have succeeded by Birth, acquiesce in his Claim, and tacitly wave their own Right. Because a serious Purpose not declared with due Solemnity is so far only adjudg'd by the civil Laws insufficient to transfer Right, as it seems to require that others should be excluded, who might challenge a Right to the same thing upon another Bottom. Therefore, if the Business be not brought into Court, the want of those solemn Forms requir'd by positive Statutes, doth not in the least affect or impair it, provided it hath all Conditions besides, which otherwise, and according to the general Law of Nature, are sufficient to constitute a Right. So that the Failure in point of Form seems to prejudice the Heir by Will only, if he is oppos'd by those whom the Law would have advanc'd to the Succession, in case the Party had died without Will. But when these are silent, and forbear to plead their Title, then for the Testator to have any way signified in earnest whom he intended for his Heir, is judg'd sufficient to transfer the Property. And this some Nations which were either unacquainted, or disgusted with the scrupulous Exactness of the Roman Law, have thought enough to make a Will perfectly Valid. After all, 'tis certain beyond Dispute, that they who receive any thing by Virtue of a Will, which they know to be forg'd, are really guilty of a Sin, though they were not themselves concern'd in the Cheat². Hence Tully justly censures the Act of M. Crassus & Q. Hortensius, who in the Case of a forg'd Will, because they were not conscious to themselves of any share in the Cheat, did not refuse a share in the Advantage. De Offic. l.iii. c.18. Add. Valer. Max. l. ix. c. 4. §. 1. For, in the first Place, the Testator did not intend that his Goods should come to them; and then, the same Goods were already assign'd by the Laws to others, upon the not appearing of any legal Testament of the deceas'd.

VIII. Nor (as to the second Questiō) doth the Heir at Law, by overthrowing such a defective Will, whatever Assurance he may have that 'twas the serious Intention of the deceased, properly do any Injury either to the Testator himself, or to the testamentary Heir. Not to the former, because he had no Right of bestowing his Goods by his last Disposal on any others than the natural Heirs, unless he had observed the Form prescribed by the Laws of the Country. Not to the latter; because no Right which shall hold good against the natural Heirs can be confer'd on him in any other way, than by a Testament fram'd as the civil Constitutions direct. Nevertheless Persons, who have courted the Fame of extraordinary Humanity, have thought it more generous to stick close to the Will of the deceased, though not exactly express'd according to the Forms of Law; either to avoid the Imputation of Avarice, or because tender and compassionate Minds are so sensibly affected with the Thoughts of Death, as not to suffer that what a Man intended for his last Appointment should be intended in vain³. Pliny, Lib. iv. Epist. 10. You are wont most religiously to observe the Wills of the deceased; the bare Understanding of which (however it be express'd) is to a good Executor the same as the nicest Form of Law. Idem, Lib. ii. Epist. 16. I have fix'd it as a kind of private and peculiar Law to my self, to defend a Will as perfect, though deficient in some legal Point. Idem, Lib. v. Ep. 7. This Testament, if you regard the Law, is null; but if you consider the Intention of the deceas'd, is firm and valid. As for my Part (though I fear the Men of my own Profession will not reliſh very well such a Declaration) I am more sway'd by the Testator's Intention, than by any exactness of Law. He that will follow this Example, ought certainly to be applauded for a noble and bountiful Spirit. For the same Reason those who desire the Character of great Benevolence, are careful to perform the last Commands or Requests of their Relations or Friends, though somewhat burthensome to themselves. On which occasion we may take notice of that irregular Will in *Lucian*², where a poor Man bequeaths to one of his rich Friends his Mother to keep, and to another his Daughter to match her off, and to give her a Portion. Yet still on the other hand he is not to be censur'd, who doth not refuse an Advantage allow'd him by the Laws of his Country².

MR. BARB. NOTES on §. VII, VIII.

² The Story is this; In the Time of Cicero certain Men brought from Greece to Rome a forged Will of L. Manlius Bassus, who left a great Estate; and that they might make it of Force the more easily, they made Marcus Crassus and Q. Hortensius, two Men of the greatest Reputation at that time, Heirs with them. These Men mistrusted that the Will was forg'd; but because they were not concern'd in the Forgery, they thought they might take the Advantage. But Cicero blames them with Reason for their Compliance, by which Means they became not only Favourers and Defenders, but Complices in the Injustice, De Offic. l. iii. c. 18. See also Valerius Maximus, l. ix. c. 4. §. 1. To this we may add the excellent Sentence which Cicero immediately subjoins, Mibi quidem etiam veræ hereditates non honesta videntur, si sine malitiosis blanditiis officiorum, non veritate, sed simulatione quaesitæ, i. e. To me those real Inheritances seem not honest which are gained by fawning Courtships and Attendance, and not by fair Dealings.

The Questions which remain are to be determin'd by the Customs and Ordinances of particular States³: As how far a Man may be authoriz'd to divide his Estate amongst many, either all Co-heirs, or some Heirs, and others Legatees. As likewise, Whether an Inheritance passeth down with a full conveyance of Right; or whether under the nature and burthen of a Trust? On which Points the Civilians discourse at large⁴. But this the Law of Nature manifestly requires, That the Burthens and Debts incumbent on an Estate shall lie on the Heir⁵, by whatever Man he succeeds: Yet not beyond the Value of the Inheritance, nor so as that he should be bound to make up the Deficiency out of his own separate Fortunes, unless he hath laid a particular Obligation on himself to that purpose.

IX. We usually distinguish from Testaments, Donations in case of Death; by which both Parties living and consenting¹, one transfers on the other a Right to his Goods, if he chance to die. Of these there seem to be two kinds especially remarkable.

One², When a Man conceiving himself to be under a probability of mortal Danger, so grants a thing to another, as not to make it his immediately upon his acceptance, but only if the Danger really proves mortal, as he expects: Or, when a Man makes his own Death, which he apprehends to be near, on account of the present Danger, the Condition of his Grant; so that if he escape the Danger, the Grant is void³. See an Example in Homer, Odyss. lib. xvii. ver. 78, &c. It may not be altogether improper to rank under the same Head the Act of King Philip in Livy, lib. xxxii. c. 38. who finding himself under a necessity of engaging with the Romans in Battle, delivered the City Argos to Nibis, as 'twere to hold in trust; to be restored in case he got the Victory, but to be kept, if he proved unfortunate.

MR. BARE. NOTES ON §. VIII, IX.

² See Mr. Hertius's Discourse, De Collisione legum, Sect 3. §. 2. in Tom. i. of his Comments and Opusc. Mr. Bulsius seems to be of a contrary Opinion in his Treatise, De Testamentis Summorum Imperatorum. c. 1. §. 8. but I do not see that he has answered our Author's Reasons. Another thing in question is, Whether he that has disannull'd a Will can in Conscience make void all the Legacies? And whether one may always in Conscience dispense with the Payment of some Legacies of a Testator, which are null in Law, tho' the Will is otherwise valid in itself? To this I answer, That if a Testator has given any Legacies for just Causes, as for an acknowledgment of some Services done him to procure some Advantage to Society, &c. 'tis not only Knavery but Injustice not to discharge them. The Reason is, because he knows it to be the Will of the Dead, tho' there is some defect in the Form, and his Will is so reasonable, that sometimes the Persons concerned have an imperfect, if not a perfect Right, to require the Gifts. Whereas, when he that succeeds a Person intestate, makes void his Will, he may suppose that the Testator was surpris'd, or that there was some Fraud in making the Will; and so much the more, if the Testator labours to disinherit the lawful Heir, it is very hard to observe exactly all the necessary Formalities; so that the Heir at Law may look upon it as a thing morally impossible, and by consequence count that Act null which is not agreeable to Law, by virtue of which he has a Right to claim the Succession, reserving to himself (as I have said) the Execution of all those wise and equitable Disposals which may be found in a Will so made void.

⁴ This is when the Heir is obliged to another, either at the end of a certain Term, or in some Case, to give up either all the Inheritance, or Part of it only. See the Institutes, l. ii. t. 23, 24. and the Interpreters upon the Digest, l. xxxvi. t. 1. of Senatusconsulto Tertulliano. Moreover, a Feoffment in trust is often odious, because it is used to evade the Law, or to deprive the lawful Heirs. See an excellent Passage to this Purpose in Mr. de la Beuvrie's Characters, in the Chapter, Of venal Estates, printed at Braffils in 1697. The Character begins thus: "The Law which forbid Murder, doth not comprehend in it the Prohibition of a Sword, Poison, Fire, Water, Treachery, open Force, and all the means by which Murder may be effected."

But, if the Donor made his Grant reverfible, not on any external Condition, but meetly of his own Pleasurè, then the Grantee shall acquire no Right, so long as the Donor retains a natural Ability to change his Mind; that is, so long as he continues Master of his Reason. For as, on the one side, he is not under any Obligation who may release himself, when he pleaseth, without any Payment or Performance; so on the other side, a bare Hope, which may be taken away purely at another's Fancy, cannot come under the Name of Right. The Right therefore of the Grantee shall commence only upon the Donor's Decease; and consequently this Act approacheth near to the case of a Testament, strictly so call'd.

But, when a Person mov'd with the Thoughts of any Danger which threatens his Life, so grants a thing, as to make it immediately upon acceptance belong to the other Party, and doth not recal it, upon escaping the Danger, then the Promise shall be rather put in the Class of ordinary Donation⁴, or such as are made without any regard to Death. Though in case the Grant was very large, and such as will weaken the Donor's Estate, much more if it comprehend the whole Possession, it shall be presum'd to have been made only upon his present Prospect of Death, and not to hold good, unless he so miscarried.

That kind of Grant likewise, by which a Man transfers Property on another, without the Power of retracting, yet so as to enjoy the Use and Property during his own Life⁵, is to be reckon'd amongst the ordinary Donations, or such as are made between living Parties.

According to the disposal of the Law of Nature, without any particular express Act of the former Lord, the Properties of things are said to pass in Successions to intestates¹. For Property having been at first endued with such a Force and Power, as that by virtue of it a Man was enabled not only to do what he pleas'd with his Goods during his own Life, but likewise effectually to transfer them upon others after his Death; it did not seem probable, that if a Person was found to have made no Settlement of his Goods, whilst he lived, he was therefore willing they should after his Death become, as it were, derelict, and lie free to any that would take possession of them². In this case then natural Reason suggest'd, That Men ought to follow the presum'd Will of the deceas'd, or such a Disposal as he might most probably be suppos'd to have design'd. Now in doubtful Matters every one is suppos'd to have design'd that, which is most agreeable both to his natural Inclination, and to the Engagements of his Duty³.

II. The regular Course of natural Inclination is this, That we should labour to make the most plentiful Provision for those who descend from our own Body, and next to these for the rest who are allied to us in the degrees of Consanguinity: For nearness of Blood commonly uniteth and engageth Mens Minds in a particular Affection; and almost all Persons have this desire implanted in them, that they especially wish well to their own Families, and would have them succeed and flourish as much as possible.

As to natural Duties, one of the chief of them is, That we take due Care for the maintenance of those whom Nature hath oblig'd us to cherish with a peculiar Concern and Regard; as likewise, that we show our selves grateful towards our Benefactors.

Now altho' it might so happen, that these Presumptions should often vary from the real Intention of the deceas'd, yet the Peace and Tranquillity of Mankind required, That no particular Conjectures should be easily admitted against these common Rules; since by this means a Door would be opened to endless Contentions. And therefore the present Affair in the Intentions of the deceas'd is consider'd, not so much according to what it was, as

MR. BARB. NOTES on Chap. XI. §. I.

according to what it ought to have been, and agreeably to the Rules of Duty ¹. Amongst which one of the first Rank is this; That no Man give occasion to Ruptures and Quarrels amongst others. Hence it is expedient for the common Peace, that some general Method should be follow'd in this Business, though the Intention of some few should happen to be neglected, rather than that, by endeavouring to satisfy the Desire of every private Person, we should involve our selves and others in endless Difficulties.

Besides, he who would have his own particular Purpose absolutely obey'd, ought to have expressly signified thus much. Thus nothing is more usual, than for a Father to love one of his Children with a more ardent Affection than the rest: And then who doubts but he is willing an extraordinary Provision should be made for his Darling's Subsistence? Yet if he die intestate, they shall divide the Inheritance by equal shares; not as if 'twere repugnant to the Law of Nature to allot one Child a larger Portion than another, but because there would arise infinite Disputes in Families, if the Father's Affection were to be the Measure of parcelling out Estates. The same Inconvenience would follow, if a Man dying childless should leave several Brothers, to whom he express'd very different degrees of kindness in his Life-time.

Again, 'Tis no uncommon thing for a Man at his Decease to leave behind him a Kinsman in some remote Degree, for whom he had never any particular Passion, and to whom he was never obliged for any Service or Favour; whereas, on the other side, he may have ow'd all his Fortunes to the Kindness of a Stranger: Who will not say, That the deceas'd set a much greater Value on his Benefactor in this Case, than on his Relation? Yet, because to enter into a Comparison between the Ties of Blood, and of Gratitude, must have occasion'd many Controversies difficult to be resolv'd, it hath been the Judgment of all Nations, that in the case of Intestates a Kinsman shall be preferr'd to a Patron or Benefactor. Especially, since if a Person on account of a Kindness bestow'd were to stand in the Roll of Inheritance, before the Relations of the deceas'd, he might seem to have performed the former Act more as a Usurer, than as a Friend. But if the Benefactor were preferr'd in the express Will of the deceas'd, 'tis but Equity that the said Will should be obeyed.

From all which it appears, that natural Reason in deciding the case of Succession, upon default of testamentary Disposals, regards the Intention of the deceas'd Party, not as it was strictly in itself, concerning which there is often very little Assurance; but according as it agrees with the common Inclinations of Mankind, and with the Measures of Duty, and so as that no Fuel may be administered to Controversies and Contentions ².

This Judgment of natural Reason is seconded in all States by civil Ordinances; as well that the Avarice of some Persons might not stir up desperate Quarrels amongst those who seem'd to have equal Reason on their side; as that this whole Affair might be wisely accommodated to the publick Safety.

III. In the Succession therefore to Intestates, by the guidance of Reason, and by the consent of all the known Kingdoms, Children have the Preference of all others, even of Parents themselves ¹. See 2 Corinth. xii. 14. Rom. viii. 17. If Children, then Heirs. Aristot. Nicom. viii. 14.

Parents have a more certain knowledge that such Persons are their Children, than Children can have that such are their Parents. And in this case there seems to commence a stronger Relation from the Cause to the Effect, than from the Effect to the Cause.*

¹ This may suffice in my Judgment to answer the Difficulties which Mr. Bynkerhoek, Observ. l. ii. c. 1. propounds, where he says, "That Fathers and Sons do often not love each other, and Brothers rarely live amicably, much less other Relations: That they also who are nearest related by Blood most easily quarrel, and conceive more implacable Hatred against each other than Strangers or indifferent Persons. The same Author also maintains, That to prove that the Laws are not founded upon the Presumption of the Will of the Dead, 'tis sufficient to consider that a Wife is excluded from succeeding to her intestate Husband, although she must be supposed dearer to him than a Parent, and quotes thereupon, Gen. ii. 24." But besides that there are diverse degrees of Affection, and tho' he may love his Wife with much Passion, as it sometimes happens, though not often, it doth not therefore follow, that he would have her to be the Heir of all his Goods. It only proves, that in ordering Successions to intestate Persons, Regard is had to the Interest of the State, and the Preservation of Families, as well as the ordinary Inclination of private Persons, who nevertheless often agree in their Desires with the Intentions of the Lawyers. For who is there that does not desire that his Estate should go to his Family? Moreover, Mr. de Bynkerhoek furnishes us with Arguments that the Roman Law engages us to follow, if not altogether, yet at least so far as the publick Good permits the Will and Affection of the dead Person, as appears from a whole Chapter of the same Work, l. i. c. 19. where the Author explains the Law very well, which says, That a Father discharges his Duty as he ought when he makes his Son his Heir. Perinde habebitur utique si sua manu pater tuus te heredem instituerit, FUNCTUS DULCI OFFICIO, Cod. l. ix. t. 23. De his qui sibi adhibent in testam. leg. 1. We also know, that Wives are not altogether excluded from succeeding to the Goods of their Husband, and that the Laws call us to them, when the Relations by Father's and Mother's side are wanting. Maritus & Uxor ab int. sibi sibi invicem pro antiquo jure succedunt, quoties deest cuius parentum liberorumve seu propinquorum legitima vel naturalis successio. sibi excluso, Cod. l. vi. t. 18. leg. 1. Unde Vir & Uxor. See the same Title in Digeſt. l. xxxviii. t. 11. and the Interpreters upon it.

Julian in Casarib. §. It is the legal Custom to let the Sons succeed to what the Fathers possess; and this is a Rule which we all desire to see observed.

Thus Valerius Maximus observes, Lib. vii. C. 7. Sect. 2. that the procreationis vinculum, the Band of Generation, is the strongest and closest Tye which can affect Mankind.

That which so highly favours the Childrens Claim is, not only the Obligation laid by Nature on their Parents to provide for their Maintenance and good Institution, but likewise that strong and vehement Affection, which can only be extinguish'd (and that very rarely) either by the enormous Wickedness of the Children, or by the unusual Barbarity of the Parents.

IV. As to that Maintenance, which Parents owe their Children¹, it hath been doubted by Authors, whether the Obligation to pay it were perfect or imperfect, or whether it belong'd to expletive or to attributive Justice². 'Tis the Opinion of some, That Parents do indeed owe their Children Maintenance, but then 'tis by the latter kind of Justice only, and not by the former; so that Parents would act very inhumanly, should they deny them this Assistance; yet Children have no Right to challenge it from them against their Wills, this being the proper Effect of expletive Justice: though civil Statutes may invest Children with a full and perfect Right in this Matter. But we are rather inclined to think, That Parents lie under a perfect Obligation to maintain their Children, so long as they are unable to maintain themselves; and this Duty seems to be laid upon them, not only by Nature itself, but by their own proper Act, in bringing them into the World³. For they would be in the highest manner injurious to their Issue, should they have given the Children Life, for no other Reason, but that they might afterwards see them perish. By the Act of Generation therefore they seem to have voluntarily bound themselves, to endeavour as far as in them lies, that the Life which they have bestowed shall be supported and preserved. And thus the Children will have a perfect Right of receiving Maintenance from their Parents. Yet this Right is hinder'd from producing all its Effects by the natural Weakness of Children under that Age, in which they cannot provide for their own Support. And consequently they do not so much want Right as Power and Strength to execute that Right; only in some Points the civil Ordinances help them out, and compel their Parents to keep and feed them, upon refusal. Though, through the wise Ordering of the Creator, the natural Affection of Parents is of so great Force, as that, commonly speaking, they joyfully undertake and discharge their Duty, without the Compulsion of the civil Government.

V. Not only those things which are necessary for the preservation of natural Life fall under the Term of Maintenance or Alimony, but those likewise which fit and prepare a Man for a social and civil Life. And the former are due, 'till such time as the Children are able to support themselves by their own Industry. As for the Measure of what ought to be spent on Education, in training up Children for a civil Life¹, it is to be stated according to the Fortunes of the Parents, and the Genius and Capacity of the Children. Thus much at least is required, That they be enabled to become honest and useful Members of human Society. But this is a general Rule in the whole Affair; That as Nature doth not command Parents to pinch and defraud their own Inclinations, and to make themselves miserable for the sake of their Issue; so a Parent placed in a high and wealthy Condition is, no doubt, in fault, if he do not take care that his Children be brought up after the most exact and accomplish'd Manner of Institution.

VI. Under the general Name of Children¹ are comprehended not only those of the first Degree, but those too of the second, &c. whether descending from Sons or Daughters; in case their nearer and more proper Parents are not able to maintain them².

Father, Maintenance is due not to legitimate Children alone; but to natural, and even to incestuous Issue³. For what Reason is there that the

'Tis certain that a Bastard has as near a Relation to his Father as a lawful Child; and many among the Greeks made no difference between these two sorts of Children, as Mr. Le Clerc has observed upon Gen. xxi. 10. where he alledges this Authority,

A Bastard's equal to a lawful Heir,
An honest Man is always rightly born.

The Egyptians, as Mr. Le Clerc proves in the same Place by a Passage out of Diodorus Siculus, counted none of their Children Bastard, though they were begotten of their Slaves which they had bought. And we may observe, that the Patriarchs of the Old Testament had an equal Regard to the Children of their Concubines, as of their lawful Wives, as appears from the Example of Jacob, who divided his Goods equally between the Children he had by Leah and Rachel, and those he had by his two Concubines. The same thing is still in use among the Mahometans, as our Author observes below, §. 9.

poor innocent Infant should be suffer'd to famish for another's Sin? Yet if the latter be left together with the legitimate Issue, they shall not easily challenge to be admitted to equal Shares, unless the Parents made express Declaration to this Purpose.

In respect of these several parts of Maintenance, upon the Parents Decease during the Minority of the Children, the Inheritance is not only theirs, if he died intestate, but farther, it cannot rightly be taken from them by his express Will, so far as is necessary for the obtaining this End. For it doth not seem probable that a Child of these Years should be capable of committing any such Offence as might render him unworthy of so needful a Support.

VII. Whatever exceeds this Proportion of Maintenance, is due to the Children, when able to provide for themselves, not so much by any express Command of the Law of Nature, as upon this Principle, That, commonly speaking, Parents desire that none should fare better than their own Children¹. Therefore 'twas a very singular Disposal, that of Crates the Theban, who lodg'd his Money in the Hands of a Banker upon these Terms, That if his Children proved ignorant, it should be restored to them; but if they happen'd to be Philosophers, it should be distributed amongst the common People; because Men of that Profession could be in want of nothing. As to what some have advanced, That Parents get all for the sake of their Children, and therefore the Children, even in the Parents Life-time, have such a Right to their Goods, as shall be valued against them, in other Cases, beyond the Necessaries of Maintenance; this is absolutely false: For, every Man in his Gettings hath first of all an Eye to himself, and labours chiefly on his own Account. Horat. lib. ii. Epist. 2. v. 190, &c.

*Uvar, & ex modico, quantum res poscet, acervo
Tollam, nec metuum quid de me judicet haeres, Quod n n plura datis invenerit.*

*Juv. Sat. xiv. ver. 136, 137.—Manifesta phrenesis
Ut locuples moriatis egenti vivere fato.*

But what remains above his private Necessaries, he is willing should pass to those who are dearest to him, as commonly, his Children² are presum'd to be. And Children have thus far only a peculiar Title to hope for their Parents Estate, as that in case of no express Will to the contrary, their Claim is prefer'd to all others; and because it very rarely happens, that Parents are induc'd to lay aside this ordinary Affection.

It is well enacted by the Roman Laws, That every Parent, who disinherits his Child, shall be oblig'd expressly to give his Reason for so doing; and that some certain Causes only shall be sufficient to justify him in this Proceeding. Nay farther, the same Laws gave the disinherited Children an Action³, de inofficiso Testamento; Of a Will not made according to natural Affection and Duty. The Design of which was not to bring into Dispute, Whether or no the Testator had a Power of transmitting his Goods to others, rather than to his Children, upon just Causes; but to discuss and examine the Reasons which mov'd the deceas'd to make a Settlement contrary to the common Inclinations of Mankind. And if, upon such a Hearing, it was discovered that the Father thus neglected his Issue, either through his own absurd Fanty and Humour, or through the fraudulent Intrusion of others, the Inheritance was by publick Authority avowed to those to whom it would otherwise have descended, had the Father consulted with Reason and Conscience in his last Disposal. And therefore Cicero⁴ well replies upon Eucius, who charg'd his Client R. Scius with a Design to disinherit his own Son, It ought to have been the Business of the Accuser, to lay open all the Sins and Vices of the young Man, which might be suppos'd able to incense the Father to such a height, as that he should once entertain a Resolution of doing Violence to Nature it self, of bumping that Affection which was so deeply rooted in his Mind; and, in a word, of forgetting utterly that he was a Father. 'Tis remarkable under what Colour the disinherited Children, by the same Laws, mov'd for Relief: For it being necessary that they should ground their Complaint on a Supposition that the Cause of their Disinheritance was unjust, they pretended in the Form of the Action, That their Parents at the time of making such a Will had lost the use of their Reason.

Still, as to other matters, a Father ought so to favour his Children, as not to lay aside his just Regard to other Duties. Hence, when he may be judg'd to have made sufficient Provision for his own Family, he is not in the least hindred from imploying his Goods in Acts of Gratitude and Liberality⁵, though to the lessening of his Childrens Fortunes. Thus in case a Man hath either receiv'd extraordinary Kindnesses from another, or is able by a seasonable Beneficence to put some great Genius, now struggling with Poverty, into a way of doing great Service; what reason is there but that he should be allow'd to devise some part of his Goods to such excellent Uses? It's plain, Antiquity highly celebrated the Action of King Attalus, who having been oblig'd by his Brother Eumenes with very

For, as Grotius observes, l. ii. c. 7. n. 3. Natural Right obliges to give a necessary Maintenance to Children, but what is more than that, they have no other Right to than what the Constitutions of the civil Laws give them. But if any desire to know the exact Quota of the Goods that ought to descend to Children, and other things which concern their Legitimacy, let them consult the Interpreters of the Digests quoted in the following Note, and Mr. Dumort's Civil Laws in their Natural Order, Part II. l. iii. t. 3.

VIII. Neither doth a Father lie under any Necessity of dividing his Goods amongst his Children in equal Shares; but he may assign to one or two somewhat above the rest, as an extraordinary Bounty; either on account of singular Merit, or of great and illustrious Hopes, or even of particular Affection ^a. So likewise in distributing Portions, a just regard may be had to the Credit of the Family, that it may hereafter retain its Strength and Splendor. If this Interest cannot be secur'd upon an equal Division of the Patrimony between many Children, the Father may, without any breach of the Law of Nature, devise the chief part of his Goods to one, and command the rest to sit down contented with smaller Portions. Hence the Rights of Primogeniture ¹ obtain'd among many Nations, which according to the most ancient Institution, conferr'd on the eldest Son the regal Government of the Family, the domestical Priesthood ², and double Share of what his Father possessed, Which double Proportion was design'd to defray the charge of Entertainments, and of religious Ceremonies; as Grotius conceives ^{b c}.

On the contrary there have not been wanting Nations, where the younger Brothers succeed to the largest Share of the Inheritance, or at least have their Option, to choose what part they like.

Which Custom is built on this Principle, That the elder Brothers have for a long time enjoy'd the Benefit of Education from their Parents; of which the younger being often depriv'd by too untimely a Loss, they deserve some Consideration to requite and comfort them under their Disadvantage.

Tho' the latter of these Institutions seems more agreeable to low and mean Families, the former to the great and noble.

So again, when Daughters marry into other Families ³, 'tis not necessary that they should receive Fortunes out of their Father's Estate equal to their Brothers Shares. For 'tis a very foolish Argument to imagine, that a Father must needs act contrary to his Duty, in making an unequal distribution of his Goods amongst those whom he hath equally begotten. Therefore Pliny ^d speaking of a Lady who had left Two Thirds of her Estate to a Nephew, and but One Third to a Niece, calls it, Honestissimum Testamentum, A most honest and worthy Testament.

And hence too it may be appointed not only by Statute, but by bare Covenant likewise, That Children born in Concubinage, or in such Marriage ^e as is constituted good and just only in a natural sense, not in the Eye of the Law, shall claim no more than necessary Maintenance, or at least shall be excluded from the main Inheritance ^e.

And here, by the way, we cannot but wonder why St. Austin ^f should pass so severe a Censure on the Voonian Law, by which female Issues were incapacitated to receive an Inheritance above such a certain Sum. It's plain the Spartan Law was far more grievous, which utterly forbad the giving Portions to Virgins; for this Reason, as Plutarch tells us ^g; Lest some should remain unmarried for want of larger Fortunes; and others again be curted for their Riches; but that every Man in seeking out a Partner for himself, should look wholly into the Manners of the Woman, and make Virtue alone the Rule and Standard of his Choice. Nevertheless, this is a Point which requires great Caution and Prudence, lest a Father should sow the Seeds of Envy and Hatred amongst his Children, if, without very weighty Cause, he should seem to have treated with unequal Favour those who were equal in Merit and ^h Degree. And the Divine Law of Deut xxi. 17. is grounded on the strongest Reason; lest the Father, charm'd with the Enticements of his now beloved Wife, should either frame a false Cause for discarding the First-born, the Son of a former hated one; or should catch at every little Failing to his disadvantage. 'Tis indeed altogether the safest Course ⁵,

² It is not certain that Priesthood was a Right of Primogeniture. See Mr. Le Clerc on Gen. xxv. 31.

⁴ Hence it is that Princesses and other Women of Noble Families, when they marry into other Families, sometimes renounce the Succession to a Kingdom, or to the Estates of the Families from whence they are descended; so that neither themselves nor Heirs can put in any Claim to them. See Mr. Budeus's Discourse, De Testamentis Summorum Imperantium, speciatim Caroli II. Hispaniæ Regis, c. i. §. 39, &c. and c. ii. §. 10, &c.

⁵ In general the safest distribution of our Goods when we die is according to the usage of our Country, in my Opinion. The Laws have better contriv'd it than we can, and we had better commit a Mistake by their Direction, than hazard it rashly by our own Choice. They are not properly ours, since a civil Prescription made without us has designed for the good of our Successors. And though we have some liberty allowed by them, yet I take it to be the greatest and most apparent Cause, why many are deprived of those Estates to which their good Fortune entitled them, and common Justice would have given them, and so we abuse our liberty without Reason to follow our idle and private Fanly. — We take too much to heart our Successions by a Male Issue, although we could make our names eternal, and value too much our vain Conjectures of what shall be, which fill us with childish Hopes. — 'Tis meer Folly to make extraordinary Choices upon the account of such Imaginations, in which we are so often deceived. The pleasant Dialogue of Plato between a Lawgiver and his People (De Legibus, l. xi. Tom. 2.) will be a Reputation to this Passage. Is it not then, say they, lawful for us, when we find our End approaching, to dispose of not to recede in this Matter from the Direction and Disposal of the Laws of our Country. Which made my Lord Bacon^a observe, That younger Brothers, tho' otherwise commonly fortunate, are seldom or never so, where the elder are disinherited.

Hence it is, that in case the Father dies intestate, and the Laws of the Land ordain nothing to the contrary, Children succeed to the Inheritance with equal Shares: Because, when the Point is doubtful, those who stand related to the deceas'd in an equal Degree, are presum'd to have been equally beloved. Now those likewise are accounted equal Shares, which, tho' not strictly so, because inferior perhaps in Value to the rest, yet have been taken by any one of the Coheirs, either by his own Choice, with the consent of his Fellows, or by their Assignment, or by the Decision of Lots. Quintilian's Observation (Declam. v. p. 65, 66. Edit. Lugd. Bat.) is not unworthy our Remark. We have the same natural Affection towards all our Children, without any Difference or Degree; yet taking each one of them by themselves, we commonly find some peculiar Reason for our Fondness, and without breaking the Equality of their Endowment to us, there is somewhat again, which by a tacit Instinct of the Mind engageth us to set our Love deeply upon each in particular, as if he were the only Object of it. One is recommended by his Precedency in Birth; another by the Innocence of Infancy; a third by a sweet Aspect, and a Face that invites a Kiss: Some are specially valued for their honest Gravity and severe Planness of Temper: In some we love their very Misfortunes and Calamities, and embrace with a peculiar Pity a maim'd Limb, or a weak and disemper'd Body. But still the general Equality holds good; whilst whatever any of them seems to want to render him amiable in one respect, is made up to him by some other Advantage above the rest.

IX. But we are obliged to add on this Subject, that not only the Laws of particular States, but natural Reason itself allows more Favour to legitimate, than to natural Children; though the latter partake no less of the Father's Blood than the former. For they who owe their Birth to a Man's irregular Lust, without any serious Intention, can on no account enter into comparison with those who were begotten for the Increase and Defense of his Family, and upon the desire of having Heirs to succeed him. But if any Person is inclined to advance a natural Son to the Station and the Rights of legitimate Issue, in a state of Nature, he may fairly do it after he hath once taken care that no Injury shall thereby accrue to his Children who are properly legitimate, or to any who have obtain'd the next Right after them: Under civil Government he must proceed in the Affair as the Laws permit and direct^b. Aristophanes^c reports, it was one of Solon's Laws, That upon failure of legitimate Offspring, the Inheritance shall be shared by the next of Kin: But that a Bastard shall not be deem'd next of Kin, nor any Relation be supersed between him and the proper Sons. On the contrary, amongst the Mahometans, as to the point of sharing the Father's Estate, there is no difference observed between the Sons of the Wife, the Concubine, or the Servant-Maid.

When a Man is desirous to raise Issue rather by a Concubine^d who hath engag'd herself to be true to his Bed, than by a proper Wife, for the Benefit of his Children by a former Marriage, the Sons of the Concubine shall, even without^e any express Will of the Father, be postpon'd; and upon receiving moderate Portions, shall leave the main Inheritance to the others. Yet in case a Man hath therefore taken a Concubine, that he might avoid the Pride or the Expences of a Wife, or will not admit her to his Name and Honour, or for some other political Reasons, or on account of some Covenant or Obligation which he lies under; then the publick Ordinances of the Commonwealth are to determine, whether such Children shall be admitted to an equality with others born in lawful Wedlock; or whether upon failure of these they shall exclude the next of Kin. For if the Man were absolutely free from the Restraint of positive Laws, I see nothing that could be offer'd in prejudice of the concubinary Issue in this Case; since the Cohabiting of their Father and Mother amounted in natural Consideration to a true Marriage: Especially if the Father in the Business of their Education, and in his Actions and Expressions of Affection towards them, hath never made any Distinction. Hence I should be of Opinion, that Jacob's Sons, born of his Handmaids, should have succeeded to equal Shares with the rest, even upon supposition that their Father had made no such express Disposal; because we do not find that he ever treated them in a different manner. But still, if the Father shall particularly declare, that he refuseth to enter into solemn Marriage, for this Reason, That what he hath may descend to the nearest of his collateral Kindred (as some political Considerations may now and then move a Man to do) then even the concubinary Children in the

MR. BARB. NOTES on §. VIII, IX.

“our Goods as we please? O God, what Cruelty is this! May we not, according as we find our Family or Friends have been serviceable to us in our Sickness, old Age, or Business, give them more or less, as we think fit?” To whom the Lawgiver replies in this manner: “My Friends, who must soon die certainly, it is hard for you to know yourselves, and what belongs to you according to the Inscription at Delfos. As for me, who make Laws, I hold, that you know not what is good for yourselves, nor what is fit for you to enjoy. Both yourselves and Goods belong to your Family, as well in present as to come; but both your Family and Goods, belong more to the State. Wherefore, for fear that some Flatterers in your old Age, Sickness, or some other Humour, should draw you to make an unjust Will unbecoming you, I must take care. For having respect both to the publick Interest of the Nation and good of your Family, I will establish Laws, and make you sensible, that no reasonable private Advantage must give place to the publick. Go you on cheerfully, where human Necessity leads you, it belongs to me, who impartially regard things, to take as much Care as I can of the common good, and secure what you neglect.” This long Passage of Montagne, I hope, will not be tiresome to the Reader, l. ii. ³ In the Original Latin the Words are, Etiam expressa voluntate patris, which is kept in all the Editions, the last put out by Mr. Hertius in 1706. not excepted. But there can be no doubt but the Word scilicet after etiam is omitted, and so it ought to be render'd as the English Translator has, without any express Will of the Father: For certainly, if the Father had declared his Will about it, it must have been followed, fairest Case shall be allow'd to claim no more out of the Estate than a bare Maintenance, or whatever the Will of their Father, or the Laws of the Land assign them more ^a.

As the bare Law of Nature knows no difference of Rank and Degree, so according to that 'tis the same thing whether a Man have Issue by a Wife of a more illustrious, or of a more obscure Condition, provided she is honestly betroth'd to him. If therefore in any Place the Children of a less noble Mother are allow'd less Privilege and Favour, this is wholly owing to positive Constitutions. Which likewise, as they may upon account of some Reasons of State postpone the concubinary to the legitimate Race, and not admit them with the ascending Line upon failure of the descending: So they can scarce in Equity utterly exclude them, if there was no original Fault in the Act of Generation. But then these are by all means to be distinguish'd from Children begotten in a way naturally sinful, as in Adultery or Incest: Who, how clear soever they may be of any share in their Parents Guilt ^b, yet shall on account of it be obliged to rest satisfied with Maintenance only, and shall not be admitted with the other Children, who were begotten on the hope and prospect of inheriting their Father's Possessions. But the Parties could entertain no such hope of raising Heirs, when they incur'd in these Impurities; since they wish that their Sin may perpetually lie conceal'd, rather than be the means of producing those who should, as it were, bear publick Testimony to the Shame and the Wickedness of their Parents.

X. Grotius ^c farther remarks, that there are two more Conditions still required in the Succession to intestates, That the Children appear to have been really begotten by him whose Estate they claim, and that there be no Tokens extant of a contrary Will. For no Man shews a fatherly Affection for Children begotten by others; and a presum'd Will must always give place, when contradicted by an express Declaration and Disposal. As to the first of these Conditions, that such a Person was the Father of another, cannot always be either demonstrated by indubitable Arguments, or so clearly made out by Testimony, as in the Mother's Case; especially where Women live under no other Guard or Restraint besides their own Modesty and Conscience: The main Proof therefore in this Point is, the certainty of Marriage; by which Union the Wife both engageth her Faith to be true to her Husband's Bed, and likewise is plac'd, as it were, under his Inspection, he at the same time receiving a Power over her Body. Now all Persons are presum'd both to observe the Faith they have engag'd, and to exercise the Power they have receiv'd, unless there be direct and manifest Evidence of the contrary. So that every one seems to be, as it were, in possession of this Right, that he shall be deem'd the Son of him who appears to be join'd in Marriage with his Mother. ¹. And no Man, unless he is out of his Wits, will disturb himself in this Possession, and accuse his Mother of Adultery for the sake of finding a new Sire. Julius Sabinus with his natural Vanity was strangely exalted by ascribing to himself the Glory of a false Original; pretending that his Great Grandmother had been very nearly acquainted with Julius Caesar in his Gallick Expedition, Tacit. Hist. l. iv. c. 55.

Jupiter aut falsus pater est, aut crimine verus.

Jove's a false Father, or in Sin a true.

If others attempt to bring this Matter into Dispute, it shall be incumbent on them to prove their Charge: As for Instance, That the pretended Father at the time of the Conception was disabled by Sickness, or was absent in a distant Country ². In Xenophon (Hist. Græc. l. iii. p. 289. Edit. H. Steph.) Agessilaus, after the Death of Agis King of Lacedæmon his Brother, endeavours to prove Leotycheides illegitimate upon these Reasons, That his Father had some time disown'd him; that he exceeded his Father in Comeliness of Body; that he was born ten Months after the parting of his Father and Mother; that his Father Agis had expell'd his Mother from the royal Bed.

XI. As to the second Condition, it is judg'd another Exception against a Son's succeeding to an intestate Father, if it appear that his Father hath expressly desired and declared the contrary: As suppose ¹, if he hath either abandon'd (as was usual amongst the ancient Greeks) or dis-inherited him, as 'twas a Custom among the Romans.

We have before intimated, that very great and weighty Causes ² are requir'd to justify either of these Proceedings. Grotius adds, That Sustainance is still to be allow'd to the abandon'd or disinherited Son, unless his Crime deserv'd Death. Tho' I can hardly see how it is possible, that a Son, during these Years of Minority, in which his Father naturally owes him Sustainance, can be guilty of such an Offence, as shall deserve either capital Punishment, or Disinheritance.

XII. On the Proposition which we before advanced, That Parents are oblig'd to afford Sustainance to their Children, not only of the first, but of farther Degrees, in case their proper Parents, who ought to perform this Office, are extinct, is chiefly founded the ² The Words of Agessilaus are so misrepresented by our Author for want of thoroughly understanding the Greek, that I have thought fit to give the Reader a new Translation of them. Agessilaus then alledge, "That Agis never own'd Leotycheides for his Son, and that Leotycheides his Mother, who must needs know better than Agis, had disown'd that she ever bore him (for there is no such thing in Plutarch, as that he exceeded his Father in Comeliness of Body, as our Author translates πολλο καλλιον εκειου which signifies only better than he) "That by an Earthquake caused by Neptra, Agis was toss'd out of his Bed from his Wife in the sight of all the World, which evidently proves, that he was not the Father of Leotycheides, which was better confirm'd by the time of his Conception, which is an insupportable sign in these Matters: For when Leotycheides was born, it was ten Months after Agis had escap'd, and never after lay with his Mother." See also Plutarch in the Life of Alcibiades, p. 203. Edit. Steph. These Reasons are not very concluding. See upon the last Article *Juris. S. Rom. ² Antenor (in Duty. Cræcæ, l. iii. c. 26.) resolv'd to banish his Son Glaucon from his Family, for making one of Paris's Company at the stealing of Helen.

Equity of that Right term'd, The Right of Representation; by virtue of which Children are suppos'd to fill the Place of their deceas'd Father¹, so as to be allow'd the same share in the Family Inheritance, as their Father, were he now living, would receive; and consequently to succeed on the level with those who stand in their Father's Degree². And it would indeed be a lamentable Misfortune, if, besides the untimely Loss of their Father, they should farther be depriv'd of those Possessions, which either the Rule of the Law, or the Design of their Progenitors had given their Parents just hopes of enjoying³. But if in any Place the civil Constitutions will not admit of this representative Right, the Children, who have been so unhappily bereav'd of their Father and of their Hopes, must endeavour to bear the Calamity as an Affliction which Providence hath laid upon them.

XIII. Upon failure of Issue in the first, and the other descending Degrees, Reason suggested that Inheritance ought to turn back into the Line of Ascendents; as well in consideration that, for the most part, either the Possessors themselves, or at least the first Seeds and Principles of them, which the Children afterwards increas'd, proceed from the Parents, as because their extraordinary Benefits give them an especial Title to this Reward: Who since they would much rather have desired, That their Children should inherit their Fortunes, yet when they survived them, contrary to the ordinary course of Nature, 'twas but equitable they should receive, however, this melancholy Comfort, of succeeding to what the Children possess'd. 'Tis a Condition (as Pliny observes) abundantly unhappy, for a Father to be the sole Heir of his own Son⁴. Panegy. c. 38. Vid. l. v. t. 2. l. 15. D. De inoffic. testam. Lib. xxix. t. 4. D. Si quis, omiffa causa, &c. leg. 26. Cod. lib. iii. t. 28. De inoffic. testam. & t. 25. De Institut. &c. leg. 9. & Lib. vi. t. 56. ad Senatusconf. Tertull. & Lib. iii. t. 3. de senatusconf. Tertull.

Philo the Jew⁵, reporting, That Moses establish'd this Order of Inheritance, That the Sons should stand first, the Daughters next, then the Brothers, and in the fourth place the Uncles by the Father's side, useth this as an Argument to prove, that Fathers likewise may inherit what their Sons leave behind; For 'twould be senseless (says he) to imagine, that the Uncle should be allow'd to succeed his Brother's Son, as a near Kinsman to the Father, and yet the Father himself be abridg'd of that Privilege. But inasmuch as the Law of Nature appoints, that Children should be Heirs to their Parents, and not Parents to their Children, Moses pass'd this Case over in Silence, as ominous and unlucky, and contrary to all pious Wishes and Desires: Lest the Father and Mother should seem to be Gainers by the immature Death of their Children, who ought to be afflicted with most inexpressible Grief. Yet by allowing the Right of Inheritance to the Uncles, he obliquely admits the Claim of the Parents, both for the Preservation of Decency and Order, and for the continuing the Estate in the same Family.

Some Parents too have the additional Title of an infirm and indigent old Age; under which sad Condition their Children were otherwise obliged to maintain them: As one of the Attic Laws expressly enjoind⁶. Iseus Orat. vi. The Law commands us to maintain our Parents, under which Name we comprehend not only our Father and Mother, but our Grandfather. For these are the first of our Kinred, and from these descend the Goods and Fortunes which their Posterity enjoy. These therefore we are necessarily bound to support, even tho' they should have nothing to leave us. Add. Grot. d. l. Sect. 5. & Ziegler ad d. l. Yet in case a Father hath without Reason grievously hated and injur'd his Son, without any subsequent Reconciliation, the Son may justly exclude him from the Right of Inheritance⁷. It's the same with him who expos'd his Son, when an Infant, utterly neglecting his Support: For here no doubt the Claim of the Foster-father, who hath undertaken the Care and Burthen of the Child's Education, ought first to be admitted. Nay, farther it seems reasonable, That an adoptive Father should in this point be prefer'd to a natural Parent; that he may recover what he hath expended on bringing up another's Child. We are likewise to observe, that the Lawyers do not admit of Representation in the ascending Line, as they do in the descending; that is, if a Man die without Issue, leaving a Father, and a Grand-father by his Mother's side, the latter of these shall not be allow'd to make Claim in the room of his Daughter. A Rule which seems to be grounded on this Consideration, That naturally the Hopes of Succession do not ascend, but descend: Wherefore, the Son had indeed Hopes of succeeding his Father, and might transmit the same Hopes to his own Issue; but the Mother had never any Hope or Desire of inheriting after her Children; and so could not, contrary to the Order of Nature, convey back any such Hope to her own Parents: And consequently, the nearer Claimant here excludes very justly the more remote⁸.

XIV. When the descending and the ascending Lines both fail, the Succession to intestates devolves on the collateral Kindred. As to the order in which they are to be admitted, where the civil Statutes do not expressly settle it, 'tis to be determin'd by natural Conjecture: Which always favours that Person, whom we presume to have stood fairest in the Affection of the deceas'd; yet so, as that we measure this Affection more by the common Inclination of wise and sober Men, and according as it tends to the Prevention of Quarrels, than by the morose Humour of some few particular Persons. Now, according to the Judgment of wise Men, natural Reason in this Case pays an especial Regard to Nearness of Blood, yet so as at the same time to consider from what Source the respective Possessions seem'd to flow to the deceas'd¹, or who formerly parted with any thing², or suffer'd any Loss upon account of his coming into the World. Thus Aristotle's first Rule³ is, The Affection between Parents and Children; and his next, The Love between Brethren, arising from their Relation to the same common Stock, and improv'd by the likeness of Years and Education. After these follow Brothers Children, and other Relations join'd to us by virtue of that fraternal Union. And then (all these being first consider'd, whom Nature, as it were, necessitates us to love and esteem) in the last Place those are admitted, whom either past Kindnesses or Agreeableness of Temper and Manners, or peculiar Likeness of Inclinations, or known Fidelity, recommends and endears. *Tully*⁴ placeth the Degrees of Kindred in the Order following: The first Society is in Wedlock; the next in Children; it comes then to a Family, and a Community of all things. The Relation of Brothers comes next; and after that, of Brothers and Sisters Children; who, when they are too many for one House, are transplanted into others, as into Colonies. And then follow Matches and Alliances, with increase of Kinred, consequent upon them. Now the Relation of Blood and the Kindness that ariseth from it necessarily endears Men to one another.

XV. But the high Encomiums given to Friendship in Authors may raise a Doubt, whether Friends are not sometimes to be prefer'd to Relations? Of all Societies, says Tully, none hath more of Excellency, or of Strength, than when good Men, alike in Manners, are united by a familiar Acquaintance.

And Euripides;

———— A Stranger to our Line,
If once in Mind and Manners firmly tied,
Is worth a thousand Kinsmen. ———

And indeed it frequently happens, that we take more Satisfaction in the Company and Conversation of an indifferent Person, than of one related to us in Blood, and intrust many things with the Secrecy and Fidelity of the former, which we conceal from the latter. In fine, we address our selves more readily to serve the Friend than the Relation; because he, on the other side, is the more ready of the two to assist us in any Difficulty.

But it cannot hence be concluded, That by virtue of a general Custom, coming up almost to the Force of a Law, a Friend is to take place of Relations, though the deceased Party should chance to have expressed more Tokens of Affection towards him, than towards them. For in the Business of transmitting an Inheritance, we are not guided only by Kindness and Good-will, but we consider farther, on whom 'tis most proper and convenient that our Fortunes should descend. And since Men are carried on by a general Propension to wish the Family in as good a Condition as possible, from which they derive their Original, therefore 'tis commonly most convenient that our Goods should continue in our own Line. Besides, 'tis no necessary Consequence to say, I was highly delighted with this Person's Familiarity and Converse, therefore 'twas my Inclination likewise to transfer my Possessions upon him. For this Friendship between Persons not allied in Race, generally extends no farther, than to a mutual Signification of Good-will, a Communication of Designs, and the ordinary Services and Offices of Life. But before I can be conceiv'd to have join'd Houses, as it were, with a Stranger, by conveying to him my Estate, 'twill be necessary to produce an express and legal Will to this Purpose. Thus, although according to the ancient Manners of the Romans, in the Order of common Duties, After Parents and Children, the first Place was given to Pupils or Wards; the second to Clients or Dependents; the third to Guests; and the last to the Kindred by Blood and Marriage, accord- ing to the Degree of Nearness in which they stood ; yet in transmitting Possessions this Method of proceeding was not in the least regarded. Farther, if Friends, in the case of intestates, were at any time to have the Advantage of Kinmen, this would open a wide Field for Quarrels and Contentions, as well amongst the Friends themselves, if they happen'd to be more than one, as between them and the Relations. For to take more Pleasure in a Man's Company, or to communicate Affairs more freely with him, is not presently to be look'd on as an infallible Token that he stands highest in our Affection. Many times a jocosè or easy Temper, Equality of Years, or Sagacity of Judgment, render the Acquaintance of a Friend more pleasant or more profitable to us, than that of a Relation, who possibly may want the same Advantages. Yet when we are about to dispose of our Goods, we are seldom sway'd by this Consideration to favour the former more than the latter. Hesiod's Advice will here be good,

Let not thy Friend thy Brother's Rights invade 3.

Lastly, The Degrees of Kindred are easily distinguish'd and reckon'd up ; but who will undertake to settle the Degrees of Friendship in so exact an order, as to leave no room for Cavil and Dispute ?

XVI. But still 'tis urg'd with better Pretence, That those Friends at least are to be prefer'd to Relations in the case of Succession to Estates, by whose Bounty, Counsel, or Assistance the respective Estate was acquit'd ; it being but equitable, that the Goods should return to the place whence they originally flow'd. Yet here likewise there will be most plentiful Matter for Contentions ; the cutting off of which ought to be made the chief Aim and Design of all Laws. For a Friend putting in his Claim with such a Plea, might be well answer'd to this Purpose : That either what he takes for Merit was not the conferring, but the returning a Kindness ; or, that if he was the first Benefactor, he hath since receiv'd a sufficient Requital ; or, that he gave without any hope or prospect of Return ; and desired, that his Bounty should reach not to the Person only, but to the Family of his Friend ; or, that what he did was undertaken upon the Principle of Glory, or of present Advantage ; that, in case we had not found his Assistance, we did not want Opportunity of being reliev'd in our Distress by other Means ; that it cannot certainly be determin'd how much his Aid contributed to our acquiring those Goods which he demands to inherit : And then again, that he, who hath been only useful to us in getting a thing, cannot presently require, that we should admit him to hold the thing in common with us. Farther, That the good Offices of Friends would be turn'd into a mercenary Service, or rather into perfect Usury, if they were to be advanced to the Estate of intestates, before the Relations of the deceas'd : For then a Kindness to another could not be suppos'd to be conferr'd with any other Design, than that the Receiver should only for a little time be the Steward and Keeper of what was bestow'd, or should restore it with large Increase at his Death. Therefore, when there is no express Disposal extant in Favour of the Friend, the Right of the Kinmen shall obtain : Yet so as that, together with the Goods of the deceas'd, they shall likewise take upon themselves his Obligation towards this great Benefactor ; and shall endeavour, as far as in them lies, to repay it in a most grateful manner, acknowledging by whose Assistance they arrive at so ample an Inheritance. Nor is it reasonable for any Man obstinately to urge against this Judgment that Saying of Aristotle ¹ : We ought rather to requite a Benefactor, than to oblige a Friend, if both cannot be done together : Or that of Cicero ² , There is no Duty more necessary, than that of repaying Kindnesses. And again ; There being two Kinds of Liberality, one of bestowing, the other of returning a Benefit ; whether or no we will bestow, depends on our own Choice ; but not to return the Favours of a good Man, is absolutely unlawful, provided it may be done without injuring any other Person : Or that of Phocion ³ (in Plutarch's Apophthegms) who being several times called upon to give somewhat towards the Expence of a Sacrifice, whilst all the rest contributed that were about him, answer'd, It would be a Shame to give you, before I pay this honest Man ; pointing to a Creditor of his that stood by. Add. lib. xxxix. t. 5. leg. 12. D. de Donation. Because indeed, the Business of Successions to intestates by no means can be, or ought to be exactly squar'd in all respects according to the Rules observ'd in conferring and in returning Benefits. For the latter are guided by the Virtues of Humanity and Bounty, and, properly speaking, are vouchsafed to those only, who had no ground to expect them from us, but what is owing to the Suggestions of these Virtues in our Mind. Whereas the former are built on other Foundations, on the Obligation we lie under of making Provision for some particular Persons, on nearness of Blood, and on that Propension to advance, improve, and preserve our own Family, enjoin'd by the Dictate of Nature. Isaus Orat. 6. †. All Persons, as they approach near their End, are provident in disposing of what they possess, lest they should bring their Family to Ruin and Desolation. And in this Affair, that which ought to be our principal Care is, That we establish so clear a Method, as shall be expos'd, as little as possible, to Controversy and Doubt. Now, there can be no such Way or Method more ready than this, That in default of an express Disposal by Will, the Inheritance shall pass down according to the different degrees in which the Relations of the deceas'd stood nearer to him one than the other.

Hence Authors have remark'd, That Successions to intestates proceed in a contrary course to the Rule of common Kindness ; it being in the former the more necessary Duty to give, in the latter to repay : As, in the Case before us, our Children have the Preference of our Parents, to whom we are much more indebted and engaged. Lilian Abdicat. 'Tis the Ordinance and Appointment of Nature, that the Affection of Parents towards their Children should exceed that of Children towards their Parents. Comp. Bæcler. ad Gron. d. l. Yet in what hath been here offer'd, we would not be understood to insinuate, as if the Duty of Gratitude were to be allow'd no Place in the last Disposal of our Fortunes; but only that 'twould be inconvenient to go about to settle a general Method for the Estates of ineftates to be guided by, taken barely from the presum'd Will of the Party deceased, touching the Exercise of this Virtue.

XVII. From what hath been laid down, it appears, that of all the collateral Line the Brothers stand nearest to the Inheritance; as well on the account of the most sweet and hearty Affection by which they commonly are engag'd to us, as because they, on the score of raising their Brother's Fortunes, receiv'd smaller Portions out of their Father's Estate. Quintil. 1 Declam. 321. pag. 509. init. Edit. Lugd. B. U. What Friendship can be so happy as that which imitates brotherly Affection? Certainly, when we would complement those whom we take for our Friends, Flattery itself cannot invent a higher Endearment than the Name of Brothers. With whom the Sisters are likewise to be admitted, at least to those Goods which were either brought by the Mother, or lately acquit'd; but they have not the same Title to the Father's Possessions, which are usually design'd to preserve the Splendor of the Family; whereas Women, for the most part, marry out of their own Line. Brothers by the Father's side, in the paternal Inheritance, exclude those by the Mother's side; as again, in the Fortunes left by the Mother, the latter have the Preference of the former. In Goods newly gotten since the time my Father married the Mother of my Half Brother, 'tis convenient that I should carry off the largest Share; since toward the acquiring these Goods the Man usually contributes more than the Woman. Upon Default of Brothers, the Brother's Sons shall come in; tho' it should seem that these ought at the same time to let in the Great-Uncles, because they too had smaller Fortunes, on account of dividing the Estate with the Father of the deceased. The same is to be said of Sister's Sons, and their Great-Uncles by the Mother, with regard to the Mother's Goods. And this Order and Method shall be continued down in all other Instances; but still with this Proviso, That where the paternal Line fails, there the Mother's Kindred shall be admitted to the Father's Estate, and so the Kinsmen by the Father, to the Mother's Goods, upon failure of her own Line.

XVIII. But we ought well to observe, That the Rules which we have propos'd for the determining this Matter are stiled natural, not because they are so exactly preferib'd by any Precept of the Law of Nature, as that they cannot be alter'd; but because they are in the highest Manner agreeable to the Law of Nature, and seem to be the most ready Means of cutting off all Dispute, in cases where either the express Will of the deceased, or the national Laws are silent. Yet indeed in the whole Subject and Compass of the civil Ordinances, there is scarce any thing about which they are found more careful and solicitous, than about the Disposal of Inheritances, not only for the Prevention of Quarrels amongst Relations, but likewise because 'tis the Interest of the Publick to have this Business settled, and moderated according to the Ends and Reasons of particular Governments. Hence in some Places the Power of making Wills is left very free and wide; in others it is more or less abridg'd and restrain'd. Amongst the Romans 'twas one of the Laws of the Twelve Tables¹, That whatever a Master of a Family settled or bequeath'd with regard to his Family, or to his Fortunes, should so stand. Which was borrow'd from the System of Antic Laws composed by Solon: For thus *Plutarch*² reports, That the Ordinances of his, by which he gave free Subjects the liberty of making Wills, which they never enjoy'd before, was most greedily embrac'd, and was esteem'd most just and right. Now the Reason which mov'd Solon to the passing this Act, was not that he intended to defraud the nearest Relations of their Right of Kindred, but that by setting before Mens Eyes this common Advantage, he might engage them all to contend with each other in good Offices, and that Relations might keep the greater Affection and the stricter Ties amongst themselves, considering that they must exceed Strangers in Kindness and Good-will, if they desired to be admitted before them to the Wealth of the Family. *Demosthen. advers. Leptin. p. 374. Edit. Genev. When Solon enacted by Law, That every Man who wanted legitimate Issue, should appoint for his Heir whom he pleas'd: he did not rob the next of Blood or Affinity of their Right of Kindred, but that by proposing this common Advantage, he might engage Men to contend with each other in good Offices*³. Besides, it seems more suitable to Liberty, and to the full Extent of Properties, That no one should be forced to leave his Goods, but to those only whom he loved more than others. To which we may add, That we often conceive more probable Hopes, that a Stranger to our Blood may better employ our Possessions in the Service and Assistance of Virtue, than some near Kinsman, whom the Expectation of a rich Inheritance frequently seduceth to Luxury and Illness⁴. And lastly, That 'tis some Comfort, under the Necessity of a mortal Condition, if a Man may consign over what he hath got by his own Labour, to those whom he looks upon as his dearest Friends⁵. This Exception only there was in Solon's; That those should not be permitted to make Wills, who had legitimate Male Children living, to whom the paternal

Inheritance was beyond all Controversy due. It cannot be denied, but that under this ample Power of disposing of Goods by Testament, there crept in, as well at Athens as at Rome, a prodigious Spawn of Cheats, like a pestilential Infection; such as parasitical Flattery and Inveigling, especially of old and childish Persons, Circumventions, Forgery of Writings, and the like.

Bodin^a chiefly objects against these testamentary Constitutions of Solon, That they allowed Men to bequeath by Will Real as well as Personal Estates. By which means, as he observes, whilst many of those Estates might happen to fall on one Person, there arose a vast Inequality of Wealth between the Subjects, whence the Poor grew envious towards the Rich; the Rich proud and insolent towards the Poor; Mischiefs that have a peculiar Tendency to the disturbing and subverting of Government: Especially since the Proverb is often made good, That the more a Man hath, the more he shall have. But Bodin^a observes, That 'tis the Interest of States, where the supreme Power is lodg'd in the People, to take care that some few Persons do not exceed the rest by too vast a Disproportion. Which likewise was the Reason of that Jewish Law^b, forbidding the perpetual Alienation of Land; and of that other, by which Women who had receiv'd Land in Inheritance, were enjoin'd to marry into their own Tribe, lest otherwise the Land should pass from one Tribe to another^c.

Aristotle^d, amongst his Rules for preserving a democratical Government, gives this as one, That Inheritances should descend not by Testament, but by Kindred, and that no Person shall have more than one Inheritance, because thus the Fortunes of Men will be kept more upon a Level. What Mischiefs were introduced into the Spartan Commonwealth by that Liberty of Testaments, which Epitades the Ephorus set up in opposition to Lycurgus's Laws, may be read at large in Plutarch's Life of Agis^d. Amongst other Nations Men were allow'd no Liberty in this Point; or if they had any such Privilege, it was very much abridg'd, and restrain'd.

Of the Hebrew Laws in this Particular, Selden^e and Grotius^f give a full Account. Of the antient Germans Tacitus^g reports, That they had no such things as Wills or Testaments, but every Man's Children were his Heirs and Successors; and, in default of Children, those of the next Degree, as Brothers and Uncles by both Parents. Which Place of the^h Historian, why we should interpret with some in this manner, that the Germans, who had not yet learnt the Use of Letters, did not make use of formal and written Wills after the Roman Custom, which Tacitus for the most part hath an Eye to in that Description, we cannot yet find sufficient Reason. For amongst the Romans themselves Testaments by Word of Mouthⁱ, and without Writing, were also allow'd. And therefore if Tacitus had design'd to observe, That only written Wills were those with which the Germans were unacquainted; he would have express'd himself more particularly and distinctly.

Besides, That the Rights of Kindred were honour'd with the highest Reverence and most sacred Veneration amongst those People, appears from what the same Historian afterwards remarks. The greater number of Relations any Man hath, whether by Blood or by Marriage, the more Respect is paid him in his Old Age: Nor are any Rewards allow'd to comfort Persons under the Misfortune of being childless. Every one looks on it as his necessary Obligation, to undertake the Quarrels of his Father or of any near Kinsman, as well as their Friendships and Alliances. In many parts of Germany at this Day, if a Man hath a Son born to him, 'tis an usual Expression to say, He hath got an Heir.

Again, It doth not appear why a Nation, such as the old Germans then were, quite ignorant of the ways of heaping up Wealth, content with the poor accommodation of household Conveniences, and scarcely desiring any farther Advantage from their Fields, their Cattle, and their Pains in hunting, than a daily Subsistence; why such a Nation should have any Reason to desire the privilege of Testaments. It being an idle and unnecessary Care, for those who follow this way of Life, to covet to themselves any large Extent of Land. Nor is the making of a Will so necessary a consequence of Property, but that a State or People may introduce some one uniform Method of Inheritance, without any such express Disposal. And this will especially hold good of that People, who, as Tacitus informs us, assigned such a Tract of Land to such a number of People; who afterwards parcel'd it out into private shares, according to the Worth and Esteem of particular Persons. If it be said, That these Men were wont, however, at their Decease, to leave some sort of Orders and Injunctions to their Family, we deny that every Act of this kind comes up to the nature of a Testament^h.

This method of Succession, as 'tis the most plain and simple, and most agreeable to the common Inclinations of Nature, so hath it an especial Tendency to the keeping up an equal Proportion in the Wealth of the Subjects, to the securing a Supply of Natives in a just and proper Number, and to the preserving the Estates and the perpetuity of Familiesⁱ.

It hath likewise been the common Opinion, that this must prove a new Bond of Affection between Relations, and engage them more heartily to promote each other's Good, whilst they consider'd, that they were of necessity to succeed each other in their Possessions. To this Point belongs the Passage of Plutarch, lib. xi. De Legibus, quoted by Grotius, and explained by Bæcker. Also that Pliny in his Panegyric. c. 37. so highly commends, that the twentieth part was released to the Heirs of Families, Quod manifestum erat, quanto cum dolore larum, distringi aliquod, &c. because 'tis plain, that Men would bear it with great Grief, or rather never endure it, to have any defalked and taken from those Goods which they by Blood and Relation merited, and which they looked upon as their own, and to descend to the next akin, as their Inheritance. And *Publius Syrus*⁶ saith, Hæredem scire utilius est, quam querere, i. e. It is better to know than seek an Heir, ver. 255. And yet those Governments seem to have settled the Matter with most Prudence, which left Men the Privilege of disposing by Will those Goods only which they acquired by their proper Industry, ordaining, That whatever they received from their Parents or Ancestors, should pass down again to their nearest Relations. For by this Method all the Reasons produc'd on both sides of the present Question are most happily brought to a Temperament and Union.

⁵ We call these sort of Wills, Testamenta Nuncupativa, or Nuncupative Wills, because the Testator nuncupabat hæredem aut tutelatum suum, i. e. he named his Heir or his Will. By the Roman Laws they were as good as written Wills, provided that the Testator declared his Will by word of Mouth in the presence of seven Witnesses, Inst. l. iii. t. 10. §. 14.

It is altogether strange to the Manners and Customs of us Europeans, what we are told of the People of the Kingdom of Siam, That those who are Men of Substance amongst them, are commonly oblig'd to parcel out their Wealth into three Divisions, one of which goes to the King, another to the Priest (whence likewise the funeral Charges are defray'd) and the third only to the Children. And no less strange is the Practice of the Ethiopians on the Coasts of Guinea; where the Goods of either Parent do not descend to their Children, but to the nearest of their other Kindred.

⁴ On which Reason depends that disposal of the old Roman Law, which we meet with in l. xxix. t. 2. l. 8. Dig. De acquir. vel omit. hæred.

MR. BARB. NOTES on §. XVIII, XIX.

XIX. The Heir by Will, and the Heir at Law, though they succeed in a different manner to their respective Estates, yet have this Obligation common to them both, That they shall discharge the Debts of the deceas'd. And that not so much on account of any tacit Engagement which they have entered into to this purpose^a, as because these Debts are a necessary Barthen affecting the Possessions in the manner of a tacit Mortgage. For, as Quintilian observes¹, Such is the Nature and Condition of Inheritance, that the Creditors must first be satisfied before it can effectually take place. And so much only is to be reckon'd a Man's Estate, as remains when all are paid their own². Whence, likewise, 'tis most highly agreeable to natural Equity, that the Heir be not charged with Debts above the Value of the Inheritance. Nor should we omit what Gabriel the Sionite tells us in his Book of the Manners of the Eastern Nations, That the Mussulmanni, when they make their last Will, are bound to restore all that they have taken by Robbery or Violence, to the proper Owner, from whom they receive a formal Discharge in Writing: And if they know not the Person to whom Restitution should be made, they lay out the Sum in publick Buildings, as Hospitals, Mosques, or Bagnio's, or else bequeath it to the Poor, or to some religious Order.

In Ferdinand Pinto, Cap. 21. the Chinese Hermit adviseth Antony de Faria, who had been guilty of Sacrilege, to do these three things for his Soul's Health; to restore what he had taken away, to beg pardon for his Offences with Tears, and to distribute largely in Charity to the Poor. IT belongs to our present Design to enquire likewise concerning that Method of Acquisition, by which he who hath gotten Possession of what was really another's ¹, by a just Title, and with honest Intentions, and hath also held it for a considerable time without being disturb'd or oppos'd, obtains the full Propriety of the thing thus possess'd, so as to extinguish all the Rights and legal Claim of the former Owner. This the Roman Law terms Usucapio, because the thing is, as it were, taken and acquired by long Use or Possession.

The Word Prescriptio in the Sense of the same Law imports strictly ² that Plea, Demur or Exception, by which the Person thus in Possession invalidates the Claim of the first Proprietor. Though these different Names are frequently taken for the very same Notion: and the latter now prevails in common Use, and is the Term by which we render the former.

It may be worth our while to premise, what the Roman Law appointed or directed in this matter; because we shall hence easily gather how far the Business depends on positive Constitutions, and how far on the Laws of Nature.

II. Prescription, as Modestinus ³ defines it, is the Addition of a Property, by means of long Possession continued to the Term of Years fixed by the Law. Cujacius and others, on the Authority of Ulpian, use the Word ademptio instead of adjectio, Acquisition instead of Addition; but we do not apprehend that

MR. BARB. NOTES on Chap. X. §. i, ii.

² The word Prescription will best express the Latin Usucapio in our Language, and therefore we shall treat of it under that Name, unless some special Reason oblige us to use the Word Usucapion.

³ Besides, Prescription has not only respect to Property, but it destroys other Rights and Actions, when Men are not careful to maintain them, and preserve the use of them during the time limited by the Law. Thus a Creditor, who has not demanded his Debt during that time, discharges the Debtor. And he that has enjoy'd the Rent of certain Lands so long, can't be dispossessed, though he has no other Title but his long Possession. See Mr. Dawson upon this Subject in his Civil Laws in their Natural Order, Part. II. l. iii. t. 7. Sect. 4. and Mr. Titius's Observations on Lauterbach, Obs. 1033. As also, in his Jus Privatum Romano-German. l. ii. c. 9. We shall hereafter explain, how far Prescription is of natural Right, and what Civil adds to it. As to what we have to say about the Prescription of things Incorporeal and their Rights, we are to observe, that by Natural Right alone Prescription does not abolish Debts; so that tho' neither the Creditor, nor his Heirs have demanded any thing for a long time, his Right is not extinguished, nor is the Debtor fully discharged. This Mr. Thomasius proves in his Discourse, De Perpetuitate debitorum pecuniarum. printed at Hall in 1706. "Time, says he, in it self is of no force, either to get or lose one's Right; it must be accompanied with something else, which must give it that Power. For no Man can be deprived against his Will of that Right he has got by the consent of another, but by his own free Release. He does not disengage himself by acting contrary to his Engagements; and in delaying to execute them, he lays no new Obligations upon him to indemnify the Person interest'd; so that the Engagements of a bad Paymaster become greater and stronger every day, and can't be judg'd by Natural Right alone to change their Nature, and come to nothing at a certain Period of Time. It is alledged in vain, that it is the Interest of all Mankind, that Proceedings in Law should not be eternal: For 'tis no less the common Interest of Man, that every one should keep his Word, and that bad Paymasters should not enrich themselves without contradiction at the Expence of the Lender; that Justice be done, and every one obtain his own Right. Moreover, 'tis not the Lender that troubles Mankind in requiring what is due to him, but the Debtor who owes, and will not pay. For if he paid his Dues, there would be no ground for an Action. Nor is that Pretence better grounded, that 'tis the Negligence of the Creditor in not demanding his Debt, that is the Cause of his losing his Right, and authorizes his Prescription. This can only have place among such as live one with another in the independent State of Nature. Suppose the Creditor be very negligent, can his innocent Negligence deserve more to be punish'd than the noxious Malice of the Debtor? Or ought he not rather to be punished for his Injustice? Did he defer the Payment so long a time without any ill design, yet is he not as much to be blamed for his Negligence? Does not the Obligation of keeping Word oblige the Debtor to seek for his Creditor, rather than the Creditor for the Debtor? Why then, if so much Prejudice must come by Negligence, why should it fall rather upon the Creditor than the Debtor? Or rather ought not the Negligence of this last to be punished; and so much the more, because this gets by Prescription, and the other loses? But if we consider things abstractly from the Civil Laws, which require that a Debt shall be demanded within a certain Space of time, the Creditor can't reasonably be accused of Negligence, because he forbears the Debtor; since when he lent the Money, a time was fixed when it was to be paid. And every Man is free to allow more time than he has promised, and 'tis sufficient for the Debtor, that the time is come, when he agreed to pay. Besides, the Creditor may have many commendable Reasons for his Action, viz. Prudence, Necessity, and Charity; for which he deserves rather to be praised, than accused of Negligence, as Mr. Thomasius proves particularly. Lastly, There is no cause to believe that the Lender has renounced his Debt, as a matter subject to Prescription; since the Debtor being not obliged to pay a thing in kind, but the value of what he borrowed, he does not properly possess the Goods of another; and so can't be thought to keep it as his own. On the contrary, he must be esteem'd to be always in possession of his Right, till he has renounced it expressly, and confirmed it under his Hand." After this, Mr. Thomasius explains how a Debt may be lost by Time for want of Proofs, and shews, that without that, Prescription can have no place by the Laws of all People yet known to us, nor by those of the Romans as far as the Emperor Constantinus's Time. This whole Discourse is worth our reading.

this makes the least difference in the thing. For he, that having got Possession of a thing with honest Intention, continues his Possession to that determinate Period which the Law expresseth, may be said to have somewhat added to him, which he hitherto wanted. And again, he, to whom the Law thus adds any new Property, may be said to have acquired or obtained it.

To proceed; as every Man, who is otherwise capable of acquiring Dominion, is likewise capable of prescribing; so by this Right of Prescription we may acquire Dominion over both sorts of things, moveable and immoveable, unless they are particularly excepted by the Laws.

And First, Freemen are thus excepted²: For since Liberty is so sweet a Comfort, as no one can be presum'd to have neglected any Opportunity of recovering, 'tis justly suppos'd that the Party in this Case continued so long under Servitude, and did not put in his Claim to be releas'd, only out of Ignorance of his present Condition, not that by this Continuance he tacitly consented to be a Slave. So that this long Patience under his Misfortune ought rather to make him a more worthy Object of Pity, than to be interpreted to his Disadvantage. Things consecrated or set apart for the Service of Religion are likewise excepted; and so too are the Goods of Minors, during their Non-age: For by reason of their unexperienc'd Years the neglect of challenging what is their own cannot be so far charg'd upon them, as that they ought on this account to lose it; and it would be too hard and severe, if they were to suffer for the carelessness of their Guardians. Further, the Law excepts stolen Goods, runagate Servants, and things gotten by³ Violence, tho' some third Person hath obtain'd the Possession of them by honest Means.

Thus the Laws of the Twelve Tables ordain, Rei furtivæ æterna auctoritas esto, Let the Claim against Things stolen hold good everlastingly. For, as to the Robber himself, his Crime hinders him from prescribing. And the third Person, the honest Possessor, is likewise stopp'd in his Right, by that Fault which is suppos'd to affect and attend the thing arising from the unjust Means by which it was before acquired: For though, properly speaking, there is no Fault or Blemish in the thing considered by itself, yet inasmuch as it was taken from the former Owner in an unjust and villainous manner, it seem'd equitable to enact, That his Right should not hereby cease or be extinct; and at the same time to take effectual Care, that no one should be a Gainer by his Wickedness. For since three Years Prescription is sufficient for moveable things, it had been easy for Thieves so to secure their Booty, by carrying it off, and putting it into other Hands, as that the lawful Owner should not be able in a search of three Years to discover it.

Besides, amongst the Reasons on which the Right of Prescription is founded, one is the Negligence of the Owner, in seeking after them. But now, since stolen Goods are usually concealed with the strictest Caution and Cunning, this Reason cannot take place against the Persons who lost them. Yet notwithstanding all this, since it was by some subsequent Laws enacted, That all Actions, after a constant Silence of thirty or forty Years⁴, should utterly drop, and be extinct, the Prescription likewise of stolen Goods, as well as other Prescriptions, shall be valid, at Civil Law, after so long a Period⁵, and shall overthrow the Claim of the former Proprietor: Which, how unreasonable soever it may appear to some, who look upon it as very absurd that Injury and Impunity should, by length of time, turn into a Foundation for Equity and Right; yet it deserves Excuse on Account of the general Advantage arising from it to the Publick. Because it highly concerns the publick Peace, that Suits and Quarrels should at length be finally quash'd, and not suffer'd to run on for ever, and that the Propriety of things should not hang perpetually in Uncertainty and under Dispute⁶. And because within the Compass of

Our Author has forgotten in his enumeration of things not subject to Prescription, as publick Places, Goods that belong to the Publick, what is due to the Treasury, and the Prince's Demesnes, which are all mention'd in these Laws. Sed aliquando etiam si maxime quis bona fide rem possederit, non tamen illi usucapio ullo tempore procedit, veluti si quis liberum hominem, vel rem sacram, vel religiosam, vel servum fugitivum possideat, Instit. l. ii. t. 6. *De usucapionibus & longi temporis prescrip. §. 1. We may also except such Goods as fall by chance to an Heir, which the Father had alienated before his Son was of Age, Cod. l. vii. t. 40. D. annali except. leg. 1. §. 2. Things which a Testator has forbid to alienate. See Cod. l. vii. t. 26. De usucapione pro emptore, &c. leg. 2. ³ Quæ subreptim erit, ipsa rei æterna auctoritas est, as the Athenian Law speaks, mention'd by Aulus Gellius, l. xvii. c. 7. and taken out of the Twelve Tables, where we may see that Auctoritas signifies a Right of Property, or a Right of claiming Goods again. See Cod. l. vii. t. 26. De usucapione pro empto, leg. 7.

⁵ Prescriptio longissimi temporis, so called to distinguish it from prescriptio longi temporis, the ordinary Term, Cod. l. vii. t. 22. 33. 34. 35. and which was regulated by the Measure mentioned, §. 4. n. 6, 7. following. The Emperor Justinian being overpersuaded by the Clergy of Emessa or Emisa, a City of Syria, who by reason of some feigned Titles contrived to plunder some of the richest Families of the City, made a Law, That the Goods of the Church, City, Hospitals, and other Places set apart for religious and charitable Uses, should not prescribe under the Space of an hundred Years, Cod. l. i. t. 2. De Sacrosanctis Ecclesiis, leg. 23. But the Fraud being discovered, and this new Law causing a great number of Actions, Justinian himself corrected it, and reduced the Privileges to the Term of forty Year, at least in the Eastern Churches, Nov. 9. 111. See Cujacius's Observations, l. v. c. 5. and a good Discourse of Mr. Walter, Professor at Hebraicis, intitled, Vindicte Gratiani Dignitas de prescrip. inter liberas gentes, §. 30. Yet we must not confound Prescription of an hundred Years with Time immemorial, though they often come much to the same. See Grut. l. ii. c. 4. §. 7. and the Discourse above quoted, printed in 1606, §. 13. &c. In fine, it was Theodosius the younger, and not Theodosius the great, that establish'd the Prescription of thirty and forty Years. See the same Discourse, §. 29. and Mr. Thomson, De Perpetuitate Debitor. Pecun. §. 27.

thirty Years Mankind seem to put on a new Face, it was thought very inconvenient that the following Age should be disturb'd upon every slight occasion.

Besides, when a Man had been without such a part of his Goods for thirty Years together, he was justly suppos'd to have sat down quietly under the Loss; so that there was no need of troubling so long a Possession on his account. The same Reason will hold for that ⁷ Prescription which is sometimes allow'd in criminal Cases; it seeming unnecessary to bring to the Bar Offences committed almost an Age since, the ill Effects of which Time itself hath sufficiently purged and effaced; so that the true end of Punishment is superseded.

III. But that Prescription may effectually proceed, 'tis requisite that the Party, receiving the thing at the Hands of a false Proprietor, do obtain this Possession by a just Title ¹, or upon such grounds as are esteem'd sufficient in other Cases for the transferring and the acquiring of Property: And consequently that he acts in this Matter bona fide, with fair and honest Intention; that is, that he be able to alledge a sufficient Reason why he thus possesseth it, and be persuaded in his Mind, that the Property was transferr'd really on him, and himself constituted true Owner ². *Liban. pag. 194. Edit. But the Canon Law requires the same Integrity through the whole Term of Years on which the Prescription is built ⁴; so that if a Man comes in the mean time to know, that the thing was made over to him by one who had no Right to dispose of it, he begins immediately to be obliged to restore it to the lawful Owner, and from thenceforward detains it mala fide, foully and dishonestly; especially in case he go about to hide it from the Owner's Knowledge by Craft and Design. Which Judgment seems to approach nearest to the Strictness and Sanctity of the Law of Nature ⁵; Inasmuch as, upon the introducing of distinct Pro-

⁵ Mr. Thomajus maintains, That by natural Right an honest Intention is not necessary to make a Prescription even in the beginning of Possession, provided so long a time is run out, that it may reasonably be presumed, that the true Proprietor has relinquish'd his Possession of his Goods. "For, says he, in whatever manner we get into the Possession of the Good, that belong to another, from the moment that he to whom they belong, knowing that they are in our Hands, and being able, if he pleases, to claim them, declares either expressly or tacitly, that he will let them rest there, we become the lawful Owners of them as much as if we had a just Title to them originally. Theodosius the younger, who establish'd the Prescription of thirty Years, did not require any good intention in the Possessor; 'twas Justinian, who at the persuasion of his Counsellors added that Condition in certain Cases, and the Canon Law afterward improving, the civil required a perpetual good Intention in all sorts of Prescription. The Clergy of the Roman Church by this means found out a way to recover sooner or later all the ecclesiastical Revenues that had been alienated, altho' the Possessors had peaceably enjoy'd them by an immemorial Custom. Ambitious Princes also made their Advantage of this Hypothesis to usurp the Lands which they pretended to recover to their Estates, under this Excuse, that the Lands of the Crown could not be alienated; and so those, who enjoy'd those Goods which had been alienated, possess'd themselves of them by a bad Design; since they ought to know, that in such Cases no good Purchases can be made. Hence it appears, that the Maxim of the Canon Law, whatever shew of Piety it may seem to carry, is built on a Foundation contrary to natural Right, since it creates many disturbances among Men, whose Quiet requires that there should be an end of all Actions and Differences, and at the end of a certain time Possessors by fair dealing should be secure against all Claims." These are Mr. Thomajus's Notions, which I have collected from divers parts of his Works. See his Discourse concerning the Perpetuity of pecuniary Debts, §. 3. in Not. lit. K. & §. 27. 32. Also his Instit. Jurisprud. Divin. l. ii. c. 10. §. 193, 195, 201. with the Chap. Fundamenta Jur. Nat. & Gent. which answers it, §. 14, &c. As for my self, I own, that if the true Master of a thing bought, or usurped and gotten from him, in a word, by foul Dealing, doth not put in his claim, nor declare any Desire of recovering it for a long Space of time, though he knows very well in whose Hands it is, and there is nothing to hinder him from obtaining his Right; in this Case, I say, the unjust Possessor becomes the lawful Proprietor, provided that he hath some way or other declared that he was ready to restore it, if it had been demanded: For then the ancient Owner acquits him, and manifestly renounces, tho' tacitly, all his Pretensions to it. And thus our Author determines it in his Elegant. Jurisprud. Univerf. p. 76, 77. But if he that takes Possession honestly of the Goods of another comes to discover his Error before the time of Prescription is expired, he is obliged to do the Duty of an honest Possessor. See what is said in the next Chapter. But if, continuing always in his honest Intention, he come to the time of Prescription, whether it agree with the Maxims of the natural Law only, or the civil Laws have reduced it to something less, the Right of the ancient Owner is entirely extinct, as I shall hereafter shew. The whole amounts to this, That as the honest Possessor who prescribes in the Occasion, tho' innocent, that the other is debarred of all his Pretences, he ought to assist him as far as he can to revenge the Wrong done by a third Person, who sold him the Goods which he knew were not his own, and so was the cause of this Prescription. In fine, tho' a good Intention is always necessary to keep the Conscience quiet, yet this is no Impediment but that human Laws may overlook this Condition either wholly or in part, to avoid great numbers of Actions. And to obtain this End, it may be very fit not to require a good intention in Prescriptions, to which they have fix'd so long a time, or to demand it at least in the Beginning of the Possession; and so the Maxim of the Civil Law in my Judgment is better grounded than that of the Canon Law. The Artifice of the Clergy consists not so much in this, that the Determinations of the Popes require a perpetual good intention in him that prescribes, as in this, that they will have the Goods of the Church look'd upon as not capable of being alienated, either absolutely, or under such Conditions as will make all Prescriptions void. As for what Mr. Thomajus speaks of Princes, who affirm that the Demesnes of the Crown cannot be alienated justly, and that Prescription has no place among such who have no dependence one upon another in a state of Nature, see the last Paragraph of this Chapter, and Lib. viii. c. 5. §. 9.

pe ties, all Men were supposed to enter into an Obligation, That they would, to the utmost of their Power, let every Person enjoy his own again, when they should happen to be in Possession of it without his Consent. But the Compilers of the Civil Law were contented with securing the outward Innocence of Mens Actions; and authoriz'd the Possessor quietly to enjoy what he had honestly gotten; leaving to the respective Owners the whole Care of seeking after their Goods, and of challenging them upon a timely Discovery.

IV. Another necessary Condition, in order to Prescription is, That it be founded on constant Possession, such as hath not been interrupted either naturally¹, as if the thing hath remained in the mean while to the former Owner, or hath at any time lain abandon'd or forsaken: Or civilly², as if the Owner hath been actually engaged at Law with the Possessor for the Recovery of what he lost; or, at least, by solemn Protestations hath put in a Salvo to his Right.

Baecher and Ziegler, in their Annotations on Gro-tius³, observe farther on this Subject, That the Space of Time, during which the prime Possessor holds the thing of which we speak, shall be reckon'd to the Benefit of him that succeeds³ in the Possession; provided that both the former and the latter first entred upon it with honest Minds, and upon a just Title: For otherwise the prime Possessor shall not be allow'd to make over his Time to the next Holder; and consequently if the former came to the Possession by dishonest Means, the Time he pass'd in it shall not be computed towards the Prescription of the latter, tho' he, for his own part, obtain'd the Possession fairly and justly.

And this Rule takes place as well in a general Successor, an Heir, as a particular, a Buyer, a Grantee, &c. But then here is the Difference between these two kinds of Successors; the last of 'em, tho' he cannot reckon the time of the dishonest Acquirer to lengthen out his own, yet in case he himself was not privy to the wrongful Dealing, the Fault of the said Acquirer, if it cannot be used for his Advantage, shall not turn to his Prejudice; but he shall be allow'd to compleat the Term of Prescription in his own Person⁴. Whereas 'tis otherwise in the case of a general Successor, or an Heir⁵: For he cannot, by his own Ignorance and honest Intention, atone for the Fault of the deceased whom he represents, and whose Rights he takes in full upon himself.

A longer Space of Time is required for prescribing against one that is absent, than one that is present⁶.

So again, moveable things may pass into Prescription sooner than immoveable^b. The reason of which latter Constitution seems to be, That immoveables are judg'd a much greater Loss than the contrary; that they are not so frequently made the Subject of Commerce between Man and Man; that 'tis not so easy to acquire the Possession of them without knowing whether the Party that conveys them be the true Proprietor, or the false; and consequently, that they are likely to administer much less Occasion to Controversies and Suits. Plato's Rules for the Prescription of moveables are as follow; If a thing of this kind be used openly in the City, let it pass into Prescription in one Year; if in the Country, in five Years; if it be used privately in the City, the Prescription shall not be compleated in less than three Years. If it be thus held with Privacy and Security in the Country, the Person that lost it shall have ten Years allow'd him to put in his Claim^c. As for the Prescription of immoveables, this the Constitution of Plato's Commonwealth was not acquainted with.

V. The chief Reasons, which the Learned in the Roman Law assign for the first introducing of Property, are to this purpose; That in order to the avoiding of Confusion, and the cutting off of Disputes and Quarrels, it is of great Consequence to the publick Welfare, that the Proprieties of things should be fix'd and certain amongst the Subjects. Which would be impossible, should perpetual Indulgence be allow'd to the Negligence of former Owners, and should the new Possessors be left in continual Fear of losing what they held.

Then again, Trade and Commerce could not otherwise subsist in the World: For who would ever contract with another? Who would ever make a Purchase, if he could never be secur'd in the quiet Possession of any thing convey'd to him? Nor would it be a sufficient Remedy in this Case, That if the thing should be thus challeng'd by a third Party, the Person from whom we receive it should be obliged to make it good ¹; for after so long a course of Time thousands of Accidents might render him incapable of giving us this Satisfaction. And what grievous Commotions must shake the Commonwealth, if at so vast a distance of Years, so many Contracts were to be disannulled ², so many Successions to be declared void, and so many Possessors to be ejected? It was therefore judg'd sufficient to allow such a Space, as large as in Reason could be desired, during which the lawful Proprietors might recover their own. But if thro' Sloth and Neglect they suffer'd it to slip ³; the Prætor might fairly reject their too late Impor-tunity. And tho' it might so happen, that now and then a particular ⁴ Person lost his Advantage of recovering his Goods utterly against his Will, and without his Fault, only because he was unable to find out the Possessor; yet the Damage and Inconvenience arising from that general Statute to some few private Men, is compensated by the Benefit it affords to the Publick. But we ought well to observe, That before we can charge the antient Proprietor with Carelessness and Sloth, we must suppose, That he had a convenient Season to exert his Diligence.

⁶ Prescription for moveables is gained in three Years, whereas for immoveable 'tis not gained under ten Years against a Person present, and twenty against a Person absent. Ne Domini maturius suis rebus æsraudentur — cautum est, ut res quidem mobilis per triennium, immobilis vero per longi temporis possessionem (i. e. inter præsentis decennio, inter absentes viginti annis) usucapiantur, Instit. l. ii. t. 6. princ. By such as are present, is meant such as are in the same Country. See Cod. l. vii. t. 33. De præscript. longi temp. &c.

Hence it is highly agreeable to Reason and Equity, That the time during which a Country hath been the Seat of War, shall not avail towards Prescription: As Honorius particularly decreed, Ti ar no one should reckon towards the procuring of Prescription that Space of Time in which the Vandals staid upon the Roman Ground ⁵.

VI. But there's no Necessity, that, in order to assert the Justice of civil Governments, in establishing the Right of Prescription, we should have recourse (with a certain Author ^b) to that Power of executing Punishment on the guilty, with which the chief Magistrate is invested. As if the Law denied an Action to those, who for so long a time forbore to challenge their own, for this Reason only, because the Parties deserve to be put into the List of Criminals, for suffering Prescription to be pleaded against them; whilst by thus neglecting their Property, they not only prejudice the common Good of the Society, but likewise sin against their own Nature, which hath in all Cases an especial Regard to the publick Advantage: And that therefore as Solon ordain'd a Penalty against those who were idle and negligent, so here the Neglect of the Proprietor is punish'd with the Loss of his Property.

But indeed the principal Aim and Design of the Law concerning Prescription is not to punish Mens Defaults in this respect, but to provide, that the State be not disturb'd by uncertain Titles, and by Properties in constant Doubt and Suspence. Though it's true, that by a Person's being denied to sue for Recovery, when he hath long neglected it, he suffers some Loss or Damage as a necessary Consequence.

Besides, to be excluded from some Advantage, lying open to those only who are vigilant and industrious in their own Affairs, doth not come up strictly to the nature of a Punishment. For we certainly use a Figure when we say, That an idle Temper is a sufficient Revenge to itself: Or, That 'tis Punishment enough to the slothful and unactive, that being shut out from all Posts of Honour, they are constrain'd to pass their Days in Obscurity.

Besides, the Assertion is not true, That those who suffer their Goods to be with-held from them by Prescription, are really Offenders against the Commonwealth. They indeed do manifestly injure the Publick, who either abuse and squander away their Substance, or whilst they sit brooding over it, and are Proprietors only in Name, let it grow useless for want of Application. But now a thing that is gain'd by Prescription, is however under the Care and Management of some Person; so as still to be serviceable to the Occasions of the Community. And 'tis altogether the same thing to the State, whether such a Piece of Ground, for Instance, be in the Hands of this Man, or of that, provided it doth not lie quite neglected, without any one to cultivate and improve it.

To these Reasons we may add farther, That when any private Person receives Advantage from another's Punishment, 'tis necessarily supposed, that he was before considerably hurt or endamaged by the Party offending. Whereas he who commenceth a Proprietor by the Right of Prescription, can on no Account be said to have suffer'd Harm from the Neglect of the Party, whom he thus succeeds. Nor doth he rightly apply to the present Purpose those Words of Book xvi. t. 3. D. Deposti, &c. Male meritis publice, &c. "He that hath deserv'd ill of the Publick by em-bezzling what was deliver'd to him in Charge, ought to be left to struggle with Poverty, that

³ The Rom Lawyers hold, That they who suffer their Goods to become subject to Prescription, may be thought to alienate them. Alienationis verbum usucapionem continet. Vix est enim ut non videatur alienare, qui putitur usucapi. Dig. 50. t. 16. De verb. signif. leg. 38. in princip.

⁴ The Ignorance of the antient Owner hinders not the Prescription. The Civil Law orders things so, that he that loseth the Possession of his Goods may claim them again, if he can discover in whose Hands they are: but it doth not suppose it a thing absolutely necessary that he should actually discover them. The Proof of that Condition, says the Emperor Julianus, would run us into new Perplexities. Ut homo in initio possessionem tenentis, & utriusque partis domicilio requisito, sit expedita quaestio pro rebus abicunq; positis, NULLA SCIENTIA VEL IGNORANTIA EXPECTANDA, ne altera dubitationis inevitabilis oritur occasio. Cod. l. vii. t. 33. De præscript. longi temporis, &c. leg. 12. It is sufficient then in general to presume, that he against whom the Possessor prescribes has a competent Knowledge; and it was upon the account of this Presumption, that the same Emperor took himself obliged to prolong the time of Prescription, which according to the Laws of the Twelve Tables was but one Year for Moveables, and two for Immoveables. Sed & si quis res alienas, Italianis tamen, bona fide possidebat per biennium, nulli rerum Domini excludebantur. & nullus eis ad eas referebatur regressus, quæ & inscientibus Dominis præcedebant, quo nihil inhumanius erat. Si Homo ABSSENS & NESCIENS TAM ANGUSTO TEMPORE SUIS CALEAT POSSESSIONIBUS, Ibid. t. 31. De usucap. transform. &c. leg. 1.

“ he may serve for an Example to deter others
“ from Wickedness.

Since then the Law concerning Prescription is not a penal Statute, 'tis idle to dispute, why the Negligence of the Proprietor should be rather punish'd by the Loss of the neglected Goods, than by some pecuniary Mulet. Though it is very evident, that such a Mulet could not procure the true End of the civil Constitutions in this Affair, which was, “ To cut off all those Suits and Quarrels that “ would for ever have been springing up, and to “ ensure, at least, a quiet Enjoyment to long Possessors, whose Case entitles them to more than “ ordinary Favour.

For in the first Place the Matter must have been brought into Court by the Claim of the former Proprietor, where the Cause would have been the more difficult and perplex'd, by reason of the things continuing so long in other Hands; and then the present Possessor was to be ejected, whence a new Hardship would arise. For if the Fine were to go to the Magistrate, then the Possessor's just Title and honest Intentions were likely to stand him in no stead. Nor if the Possessor himself were to receive the Fine for a Comfort and Recompence, would all the Doubts be hereby resolv'd. Because, should the Fine be less in Value than what the Possessor loseth by quitting his Hold, he must still be, in part, a Sufferer: But were it as much, or more, then the ancient Claimant would get little by his Suit. Therefore there cannot be, in the Point before us, a more ready way to Peace and Quietness, than to declare, that after the Term of Years appointed for Prescription, the Right of the former Owner shall cease and be extinct.

VII. By what Law Prescription was first set on Foot, the learned are not well agreed: Most ascribe its Original to civil or positive Law, and oppose it to these Methods of Acquisition, which are commonly said to proceed from the Law of Nations. Nay, Cujacius^a goes so far as to affirm, That Prescription doth really contravert the Law of Nations, in that it takes a Man's Property from him, without his Consent: That it interferes likewise with natural Equity, tho' only for the Sake of publick Good; whilst it endamageth private Owners, but turns to the Benefit and Advantage of the Community. To which De Roy answers, ^b*That each particular Proprietor, in* subjecting himself to those Laws which establish Prescription^c, doth at least implicitly consent to that Translation of his Right. Another Reason urg'd by Cujacius, to prove this Establishment to be contrary to the Law of Nations, is as follows: That, according to the said Law, no Man can constitute another as the true Proprietor of a thing, unless he were himself so before: Whereas, by the civil Law, he who receives a thing from one who was not the Proprietor, may yet obtain the Property of it himself, if he can prescribe for it in the usual manner. To which De Roy^c again replies, That in the Business of Prescription the Seller, or any other Non-proprietor, conveys nothing more than the Title and honest Possession; but that the Property is wholly added either by the standing Law, or by the publick Magistrate, who even according to the Law of Nations is invested with just Power to make new Ordinances, and to transfer Properties from one Person to another, out of a fair and reasonable Regard to the publick Good; the Party who thus suffers for his own Neglect, really consenting to this Conveyance of his Property, or at least being presump'd to consent by his long Silence.

Some maintain Prescription to proceed from civil and positive Law, upon the Strength of this Argument; that in case a Man hath not originally obtain'd a Right on some other Bottom, the bare Length of Time can give none, as being destitute of all Power to produce any Effect. For tho' every Thing, say they, is done in Time, yet Time itself can do nothing.

Now as to the Reason here proposed, thus much indeed is certain, That it depends wholly on the Determination of positive Law, why Prescription should be rather compleated at the Tenth or Twentieth Year (for Instance) than at the Ninth, or the Sixteenth: Yet no one can deny but that the Consent of all Nations, to which they were moved by the Care of the common Peace, might be able to assign some moral Efficacy to the Course of Years; at least so far, as that in Proceess of Time some certain Presumptions and Favours, on the side of Persons in Possession, should be granted to defend and confirm their Right, though attributed to other Causes than the bare Time it self. For tho' pure natural Reason, and the Agreement of all the World, do not fix any one Point of Time as the necessary Condition of obtaining a future Right, yet they might allow this Effect to a space of very considerable Extent and Latitude.

MR. BARB. NOTES on §. VII.

¹ This is a very good Reason. For the Laws may limit the Right of Property many ways, and make them pass from one to another without express Consent, nay, sometimes against the Will of the ancient Proprietor. So that though Prescription had no Foundation besides natural Right, yet 'tis not unjust, that the Laws give it an Authority among Members of the same Kingdom. For, as I shall shew hereafter, 'tis so far from being contrary to natural Equity, that it is very conformable to it, and answers the End and Design of Property itself. Upon the whole, a good Design is necessary to prescribe with a good Conscience, as I have said §. 3. n. 5. whether the civil Laws require it, or no. I also suppose, that Prescription is fixed at a time long enough, as we ordinarily reckon it. For, in my Judgment, an honest Man could less help himself among the Romans, when the Prescription for moveable Goods was made in one Year, and immoveable in two, in which the Emperor Justinian did acknowledge there was some Injustice, as I have shewed above, §. 5. n. 4. Upon this ground Prescription is not an odious Right, nor conformable to natural Right, although Mr. Puffendorf say 'tis, and in his Treatise of Restitution, l. v. c. 6. compares it to an unjust Arrest, which yet does not free from the Obligation to Restitution. He asserts, “ That the Law of God does not admit of this Right, and that “ the Jubile always restored the ancient Proprietors to the Possession of their Goods, though voluntarily alienated. ” But this has no relation to the Right of Prescription. God, for Reasons arising from the Constitution of the Jerusalemitic Republick, forbade the perpetual Alienation of their immoveable Estates; and not of their Goods in general, as Mr. La Placcette expresses it. See l. v. c. 5. §. 4. following. In fine, there is nothing in the Law of Moses that condemns Prescription as an unjust Establishment, and we can no more infer it from the Example he brings, than we may conclude that the perpetual Alienation of Lands is odious, and not conformable to natural Right. The other Example which this Author adds, is not better apply'd. Although the Jebusites had maintain'd themselves several Years in the possession of the City of Jerusalem, after God had given the Children of Israel all the Land of Canaan, yet David drove them from thence. This is a special Case, from which no Consequence can fairly be deducted; and Mr. La Placcette ought to remember, that when the Ammonites claimed certain Lands, which they affirmed to be theirs, Jephtha opposed them with this Argument, That the Israelites had enjoyed the peaceable Possession of them three hundred Year, which was enough to secure the Property to them. See Judges xi. 25.

Others have chose to exprefs themselves doubtfully and timorously in the matter; being sensible of the vast Advantage which the Law for Prescription brings to the Publick; they thought it probable, that from the very Nature of the thing, and its antecedency to any positive Ordinance, Prescription is of Force to transfer Property; since natural Reason in the strictest manner commands the doing of those things which conduce to the common Benefit and Peace. But then they qualify this Assertion, by adding, That though the Light of Reason suggests, that the Thing is highly fitting, and that 'tis expedient it should be enacted by a positive Constitution, yet 'tis not altogether so necessary, as to be immediately establish'd by the meer Law of Nature.

Again, many do not stick to acknowledge, that Prescription is not repugnant to the Law of Nature, and consequently, that it may be pleaded as a fair Title amongst those who are wholly govern'd by the said Law, in relation to each other, and lay the Foundation of it in the tacit Dereliction of the former Proprietor: For the Proof of which¹, they suppose before-hand, "That Nature allows every Man to renounce and abdicate his Right, when he thinks fit to hold it no longer. Now, that this Desire of abdicating should be able to produce any Effect, in relation to others, 'tis necessary that it discover itself by some certain Tokens; it being incongruous to human Nature to derive any outward Efficacy from the bare internal Acts of the Mind. These Tokens are either Words, or Deeds. If the Will be express'd by Words, then there is no need of waiting for the Term of Prescription, since the Right is immediately transferr'd on the other Party. And it is the same when a Man declares his Resolution concerning a thing by some positive Deed; as suppose, if he either cast it from him, or abandon it; unless the Circumstances be such, as that we ought to conclude, that he either rejected, or relinquish'd it only for a time, with Intention to demand and resume it again hereafter². Thus if the right Owner of a thing shall knowingly deal and bargain about the same thing, with another who hath the actual Possession of it, he shall justly be deem'd to have given up his own Right, so that it shall fall and be extinct upon the very Moment of compleating any such Bargain and Transaction. Prescription therefore can take place in those things alone, which the former Owner hath not renounced either by Words, or by any express Deed, or overt Act; but in which we presume his Inclination to leave them, from his neglecting to enquire after them, and to challenge them again. For even Non-performances or Omissions, consider'd with their due Circumstances, do, in moral Account, pass for actual Deeds, and may prejudice the Non-performer³. Put before we can presume upon a Man's Intention from such an Omission, 'tis necessary that the Omission did arise from pure inculpable Ignorance. Wherefore those, who are in Possession of other Mens Goods, do then only gain the Property of them by the tacit Consent of the former Owner, when he knows them to be thus possess'd, and yet forbears to challenge them upon a convenient Opportunity. For there can no other Reason be assign'd, why a Person who thus knows the Matter, and hath his free Choice to determine accordingly, should yet be utterly negligent and silent in it, but this, that he hath no longer any Care or Concern for the thing detain'd, nor will reckon it his own for the future⁴.

Farther, As to the raising this Presumption of a Man's voluntary Neglect to demand his Property, length of time affords a very reasonable Conjecture: For 'tis hardly possible, but that in a course of many Years we should gain Intelligence that our Goods are in other Hands, and have Opportunity of recovering them, or at least of interrupting the Possessor's Title, by declaring and protesting against it.

Again, If we were at first hinder'd from putting in our Claim thro' Fear, this Fear too will in time vanish, and we shall be likewise able to provide so well for our own Security, as to be in no Danger of suffering from the unjust Detainer.

As to the Objection⁵, That no one can easily be presum'd to throw away his own; 'Tis answer'd by affirming on the other Hand, that no one can be thought willing, that a thing which for so vast a while he hath not at all regarded, nor given any one Indication of Care about it, should any more appertain to him.

Tho' all this be very plausibly alledg'd, yet 'tis certain that a long continued Silence doth not always give us sufficient Ground to suppose a tacit Dereliction. For, as it may happen, that a Man, for the longest Space we can fix, might either have been ignorant of his Right, or hinder'd from asserting it thro' want of Power and Apprehension of Danger; ⁶ so again, if he claims his Goods, tho' after never so long a Season, 'tis manifest that he did not before absolutely abandon and give them over. And consequently this Foundation for Prescription will not be such, as shall hold universally, or extend to all Cases.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on §. VIII.

² Grotius comes at length to the Conclusion, and having answer'd directly in opposing the Reason which our Author himself confutes afterwards, he infers, that we ought to suppose every Man honest 'till the contrary appears.

As to that other Reason offer'd by Grotius ³, to prove that a Dereliction may be presum'd from long Silence, Because we must not believe that Men are so uncl-witably dispos'd towards each other, as that they would suffer any Person to continue in a perpetual Course of Sin, for the sake of a perishable Enjoyment; this doth not at all affect the present Question. For, besides that it seems a little too simple to flatter ourselves with so large Promises of Mens Consciences and Piety; ^a he that comes to a Possession by honest Means, and with Innocency of Intention (and him only we have pronounced capable of commencing Proprietor by Prescription) is really in no Sin; because the manner of his obtaining the Possession fully persuades him, that he obtain'd the Property together with it. And it doth not appear that any Man is oblig'd voluntarily to call in question his own Right, established upon a lawful and probable Title. But if the detaining of another's Goods after this manner were indeed in it self sinful, the Guilt were to be taken off, not by the Silence of the Owner, but by his express Confession, and the Renunciation of his Right, did he resolve to give full Relief and Satisfaction to the Conscience of the Possessor. But in this Case the Possessor's Right would not be owing to Prescription, but to the solemn Act of the former Proprietor.

IX. Amongst these different Opinions this seems to be clear and evident, That as the Propriety of things was introduced out of a regard to the common Peace, so it flows as a Consequence from the same Principle, that they who have been let in to the Possession of any thing upon a fair and honest Presumption, should at length be secured in the Enjoyment of it; and that others should not be allowed to raise perpetual Suits and Quarrels about their Title. But the particular Space of time within which such an innocent Possession grows up to the Force and Strength of Property, we do not find precisely determined, either by natural Reason, or the universal Consent of Nations; but it is to be adjudg'd by the Opinion of good and true Men upon the Case, not without some considerable degree of Latitude. Yet so as that this Latitude shall not be cavill'd and pick'd at, with the like Sophistry as Ilræce hath used on another Occasion:

MR. BARB. NOTES on §. VIII.

³ In truth the Silence of the Proprietor proceeds commonly from these things only, viz. either he knows not who hath his Goods, or he is ignorant of his own Right to them, or he hath some Reason, more or less strong, why he doth not put in his Claim. So that we can't lay it down for a Principle in general, that there is a tacit forsaking of Goods properly so called. 'Tis almost always against a Man's Will that he is deprived of his Possessions; and if the civil Laws suppose the voluntary Negligence of the antient Owner, they suppose no less the Possibility, which I have observed above, §. 5. n. 4. Men are not commonly so careless as not to know their Interests, nor if they appear, to maintain them, especially when the thing they are about is any thing considerable. And the Prescription is made most commonly not only against the Proprietor of the thing himself, but against his Heirs, who are subject to be ignorant of their Right, or are unable to preserve it by a simple Contest, which has place at least in a Prescription of time immemorial. We must find out some other Principle which supposes rather the Sentiments that the antient Owner ought to be of, than what he really is. And this, in my Opinion, will not be hard to find, if we attend to the Nature and Design of Property itself. I say then, that the natural use and effect of the settling of Property of Goods is not to assure every one of a perpetual Right of what once belonged to him for so long a time as he shall be dispossessed against his Will. In reality the Duration of the Right of Property depends not absolutely on the Right of Possession, as I have shewed above, c. 6. §. 1. n. 1. This would reduce Right to nothing, and destroy the End for which it was establish'd. But yet it is not less contrary to that End, that the long Possession of another should destroy his Claim, who has not voluntarily renounced his Right to such Goods as are not in his Power. All our Goods, which we enjoy are of that nature, that a thousand Accidents can deprive us of them against our Will, and make them pass innocently into another's Hands. They are designed to circulate in Commerce in the World, and so to remain no longer in the Patrimony or Family of the Proprietor, to whom they are often of little use in themselves, than he can part with them for something he wants. Moreover, if the End of Property requires that the Proprietors should enjoy what they have peaceably, and not be in danger of losing their Right from the Moment that they are in Possession of a thing, it is no less requisite, in my Judgment, that he who believes, and has Reason to believe himself the lawful Proprietor, should never be subject to be deprived of what he has honestly got, and to which he has a just Title. It may be every one's Case, and no Man can be certain that there is no secret Fault in the Acquisition he is possessed of. Besides, in things of a moral Nature we must judge according to appearance, and according to the common Proverb, Not to be, and Not to appear, are all one. So that when a putative Property, if I may so speak, produces the same effect as a more real and more incontestable one, because the Right of the true Owner does not appear, these two sorts of Property may well pass for one and the same in time, and the Right of the putative Proprietor may quite exclude the Claim of him who might receive one. This is the more just, because the contrary would produce a thousand Troubles in Society; and the more honest the Possessor are, through whose Hands the things have pass'd successively, the greater Right will the last Possessor be thought to have, how small a time soever the others may have kept it. From whence I conclude, that the antient Owner, and much more his Heirs, ought at the end of such a considerable time to renounce freely all their Pretensions, and that if they do not, the Right of the honest Possessor is not a whit the less well founded. There is nothing to be perceived, as we suppose it, neither in the Nature of the thing itself, nor in the Quality of the Person of whom he held it, that can give him occasion to suspect that there is any defect in his Title; and 'tis not his Fault if he, to whom it appertains, without knowing it, has not discover'd, or not been earned in searching into it. In a Word, it is a great Misfortune for the antient Proprietor, for which he has Reason to comfort himself: And if the Possessor becomes afterwards the true Owner, he is sometimes oblig'd to restore the thing, not by the Rigour and Rule of Justice properly so called, but by a free Motion of some of those Virtues that require us to release his Right, as if a rich Man should prescribe against a poor Man, or one in mean Circumstances, &c.

But in fixing the particular Period, a Regard shall be had both to the antient Owner, and to the new Possessor. To the former, lest he should be too soon excluded from the Privilege of following and finding out what he hath lost. In which point natural Equity requires that Prescription should not be completed in so little time between absent Parties, as between those who are both on the Spot. To the latter, lest he should undeservedly suffer Damage, when 'tis too late for him to gain Redress by convicting the first injurious Detainer², from whom the thing was honestly receiv'd; or when the thing is so riveted to his Fortunes and Estates, as to make the chief Bottom upon which they depend. Hence, inasmuch as moveable things pass in Commerce to others more frequently than immoveables, so that having gone thro' so many Hands, 'tis more difficult to find out the Person by whom they were first convey'd, 'tis but reasonable to allow a longer Space for the recovering the former than the latter; especially, since those likewise do much sooner suffer and decay by Use than these: For it would little avail the former Proprietor to receive his Goods when impair'd, and wasted, and render'd unfit for his Service. And tho' a Man at his first gaining such a thing of another's, may have made a very advantageous Bargain, or tho' his Title cost him little; yet it seems hard, and an obvious matter of Complaint, that any one should be forced to part with a thing that hath now a long time grown, as it were, into his Patrimony and Inheritance: And the rather, because on the other hand we have reason to believe, that he who hath contentedly wanted a thing during a great part of his Life, within which he hath been able to make sufficient Provision for himself by other means, will not think it an Injury or Hardship that he be oblig'd to want it for ever. To which may be apply'd that of Tully, Off. ii. c. 22. *Where's the Equity, that an Estate, possess'd many Years before, should be got by him that had it not, and be lost by him that had it?*³ See the Story of Aratus the Sicyonian in the next Chapter. So that upon taking in all these Considerations, it will be no difficult Task for a fair and honest Arbitrator to find out such a Term for Prescription in particular Cases, as shall be agreeable to natural Equity. Tho' 'tis the better way in civil States, that all the points of Controversy may be brought within a narrow Compass, to fix in general some certain and necessary Bounds, at which Prescription shall commence valid, according to the Nature of the Subject. We are therefore altogether of Opinion, that Prescription, as it abstracts from the points of Time establish'd by civil Ordinances, is, as it were, the Corollary or Appendix of Property. And by Consequence, that when the Property was first introduc'd⁴, it was likewise agreed upon by general Consent, for the sake of the publick Peace, that he who possessed a thing in his own Name, neither by violent Detention, nor by fraudulent Concealment, nor by a precarious Title, should be presum'd the true Proprietor of it, 'till any one was able to prove the contrary: And that he who had held a thing honestly obtain'd, a very long Season, during which any Man of ordinary diligence would have enquired after his own, should defend his Hold against the tardy Claimant, who so long neglected to make his Challenge.

X. Upon these Principles, and if we place the Reason of Prescription not barely in the Dereliction of the former Owner, we may with the more Ease resolve this very intricate Question, Whether or no, or after what manner, Children, not come into the World, can lose their Right by the tacit Dereliction of their Parents and Ancestors? Which we may understand two ways; either of such Prescription as was completed before the Children were born, or of such as only commenced in their Father's Time, and was completed at his Death. In the former Sense, if we take the negative side, we are encounter'd with this Difficulty, that Prescription, thus understood, will not in the least contribute to the Peace of Empires and Dominions; most Goods being in their Nature capable of descending by Inheritance to Posterity; and therefore 'twould be in vain for the Prescriber to overthrow the Claim of the Father, if the Son might afterwards renew the Suit. But if we incline to the affirmative Part, it will seem strange, how Silence or Negligence should prejudice those who were unable to prefer an Action, or so much as to speak a Word, and indeed, who were not yet in Being; or how the Default of one Person should thus turn to the Damage of another. Which Doubt *Grotius*⁵ hath taken off by the following Remark: *That a thing not yet existent can have no Accidents, so a Person, who is as yet no part of Nature, can have no Right, and consequently nothing can be said to be taken from him*⁶. By him, who is as yet no part of Nature, we mean him who is not conceiv'd, not he who is conceiv'd, but not born: Because the latter, in many Instances of Right⁷, is already suppos'd to be a Member of human Society⁸. It may be added in Confirmation of this Judgment, That the Goods of Parents do only then begin to belong to their Children, when the Parents themselves hold and enjoy them, 'till the very time at which the Children ought to inherit them. Which Rule may be thus extended to a larger Compass: He that is not yet in Being can acquire no Right, unless by the Intervention of another already in Being, from whom the Right shall be deriv'd to him upon his coming into the World, yet so as that it shall obtain no Effect in relation to him, 'till after he is actually born. And this happens when any thing is acquir'd or deliver'd to another, to be held in such a manner as

⁴ There needs no Argument to be suppos'd. See what is said upon the former Paragraph, Note 3. The Author argues upon the false Notion he has formed to himself of the Original of Property, which we have contuted in its Place that he shall be able to transmit it to his Successors. Yet here there is an observable Difference; for some things are so conferr'd on another, as that the Interest of the Giver is not at all affected, whether the thing descend to the Heir, or not; though, so far as he is concerned, he grants the Receiver free leave thus to transmit it. But other things are conferr'd after such a sort, as that the Donor retains a Right over the manner of holding, which he himself appointed, so that it cannot be altered without his Consent. Now which soever of these ways we suppose a thing possessed by any Man, with the power of transmitting it to his unborn Posterity, if it happen by any means to be intercepted or alienated before the Birth of the Heir, he is not the least injured thereby; unless the Title or Pretension to it (if not the thing itself) were expressly left him in the manner of an Inheritance. For in the former case, since both the thing holden, and the way of holding it are fully in the Possessor's Disposal, if he convey it away from himself; or if, by any change whatsoever, it cease to be his, all the Right he had to it is immediately extinguished; and consequently cannot be derived upon his Heir as yet unborn, who can claim no Right to Goods of this Nature held by his Ancestors²; but what they deliver to him, as it were, from hand to hand, after he is actually in Being. But in the latter Case, inasmuch as the prime Donor still reserved to himself a Power over the Tenure³, if his Consent be obtained, the Possessor doth not at all damnify those that come after him, should he either alienate the thing, or give it over for lost, by whatever Accident it was convey'd from him. Tho' all this be true, yet Pijstratus was of another Opinion, as appears from his Epistle to Solon, where he gives the following Reason amongst others for his seizing on the Government; *I have not usurped what belong'd to others; I only claim that by my own just Right and Title, which the Athenians, having first confirmed by Oath to Codrus and his Family, afterwards took away*⁴.

The Question taken in the latter of the two Senses, which we observed it to be capable of, is denied by the Civilians; for they say, That Prescription heretofore begun, stops during the Years of *Minority*⁵, and upon their Expiration runs on effectually again. Yet I am of Opinion, there may be a Case, in which the Favour of Possession shall over-balance the Favour of Minority: As for Instance, suppose it should so happen, that when I want only a Month or two of completing my Prescription, and it is morally certain that the ancient Proprietor will not within that Space give me any Trouble about the Title, and if he should then decease, leaving an Infant Heir, it would be unreasonably hard, if after five and twenty Years Possession I should be thrust out of my hold for want of those two Months: Especially, if it be now impossible for me to recover Damages of him, from whom I received what is thus challenged; as I might have done, had the Dispute been started before the Goods devolv'd upon the Minor. Here certainly, if the Business be refer'd to the Arbitration of an honest Man, and one who knows that the Grounds and Reasons of Prescription are not to be drawn barely from the Neglect of the former Owner, he will give Judgment for me rather than for the other Party. Nor doth it seem so very grievous, that a Right which under the Father was, as we may say, at its last Gasps, should utterly expire under the minor Son: And especially, because Men esteem it a much greater Hardship to let go a thing which they have held a considerable time, than to be debarr'd of what is not yet come to their Hands.

XI. From hence it appears, that they too⁶, who are subject to no common Law besides that of Nature and of Nations, may alledge against each other's Claim, a long, uninterrupted, and honestly obtained Possession: And so much the rather, as publick Possessions cannot be disturbed without far greater Confusion and Danger than private. Though it must be confessed, that in Controversies between Princes and States it is frequently not altogether so necessary to appeal to Prescription, since the Right of the Possessor⁷ may, or at least should be deduced more solidly from other Foundations. And *Bæcker*⁸ hath observ'd before us, That those who in this Business of Prescription mention only the Point of Time, often intend to sum up their whole Claim in this short Expression: Under which are

⁶ But it is true also, that most times the other Titles are not sufficient, because in passing from one Possessor to another, and by different Titles, we shall find at last some of them dishonest and faulty, which will destroy and render useless all that depend on it, how good soever they be in themselves, if the length of time, which has passed ever since, will not purge the foulness of the Original.

likewise to be understood the Adjuncts of Time, as the quitting the thing which is now the matter of Dispute, or the Intention of quitting it, or any Tokens of renouncing the Right and Title. And since the Plea of Time is in the main plausible, especially with vulgar Hearers as (if it gave an Advantage to other Proofs) it is a politick Stratagem to urge this Notion in general, and in gross, wilfully avoiding all Explications or Additions which might be able to give Strength to such a thing as Time, which of itself can produce no Effect; and, instead of them, to heap up Instances and Examples of former Disputes, that the Discourse may seem more full, and may carry a fairer Colour as to the main Point.

Tacitus^a calls it by no better Name than Vani-loquentia, Impertinence or idle Talk, in Antibannus, when he laid claim to the ancient Bounds of the Persian and Macedonian Empires.

Sapores, as Ammianus Marcellinus^b informs us, renewed the same Claim many Ages after; to whom Constantinus gave this Answer in his own way; But 'twas strange he should forget how the Persians were enslaved by the Macedonians; the latter of which Nations being subdued by the Roman Power, their Bondsmen could not but fall under the same Dominion^c.

Thus likewise Solyman, the great Turk, would often say, That he had a Right to the City of Rome, and to all the Western Empire, as being the lawful Successor of Constantine, who had remov'd the imperial Seat to Byzantium. Yet in the most noble Ex-amples upon Record, you will find, that besides the Argument of long continued Possession, some Title or other capable of producing Sovereignty hath been at the same time alludg'd.

Thus Isocrates^d, under the Person of Archidamus, having shewn in the first Place that the Lacedemonians became Masters of Messene by the Title of a just War, afterwards brings in the length of Possession, as a kind of secondary and inferior Proof: Nor are you ignorant, says he, that all the World agree, Possessions, whether publick or private, shuld after a long Period of Time be fix'd and confirm'd, and pass as lawful Inheritance. To which he subjoins, that the Title of his Country to Messen was not controverted heretofore, when a fair Opportunity was offer'd to that Purpose^e. And indeed, in Causes of this Nature, 'tis always a fair Presumption in favour of the Possessor's Right, that, during so long a Space, no Person else hath put in his Pretensions. For these Matters are usually of so very great Importance, and are transacted so openly and in broad Day, that if a third Party hath any Right in the Case, he can neither be long ignorant of it, nor want occasion of preserving it, at least by declaring and protesting against the Usurper.

Therefore there can happen very few Cases, in which Dominion and Sovereignty shall not be the Consequences of Prescription, when a State or People have possess'd themselves of any thing upon a peaceful Title. And as for what they gain in War, it is hardly necessary to plead Prescription on that Account. For so long as the Hostility continues, the Possession of all that hath been won from the Enemy is supported only by Force and Violence; and at the same time the Enemy hath a Right of recovering his Losses by any means he can use; Especially if, having given any unjust Occasion of the Quarrel, he is ready to make Satisfaction. Hence, inasmuch as a War may be protracted for more than Fifty Years, they, who lost any Place at the first breaking out of the Difference, may regain it by Force at any time before the Business is adjusted by a Peace.

The Numidians, in Livy^e, pleading Prescription against the Carthaginians for a Tract of Land (which bore the Name of Emporia) talk to this Purpose; That the Right was sometimes held by the State of Carthage, and sometimes by the Kings of Numidia, as either had Opportunity to seize upon it; and that the Possession was always in the Hands of those who appear'd strongest in the Field.

When a Peace is concluded, 'tis easy to see what both sides are to hold for the future; and then what is yielded up by one Party, the other immediately acquires with full Right, and hath no need to wait for the Title of Prescription. If any third Person lays claim to the same thing, he will be sure to declare his Pretensions in good time; and if possible, whilst the Treaty is in agitation: For afterwards Warriors will not easily be prevail'd upon to restore what they have won by the Sword, to those who were idle Spectators of the Quarrel^f.

HAVING enquired into the Nature and Origin of Property, as likewise into the several ways by which it is establish'd, it follows that we consider those Obligations, which, upon the introducing of Property, affect Mankind immediately¹ and on their own Account, without the Intervention of other Duties. Of these the first is, That every Man shall suffer another, who is not engaged in Hostility against him, to dispose of his own Possessions, and likewise quietly to hold and enjoy them; nor shall, either by Force or Fraud, impair, divert, or draw them to himself. Whence it appears, that Theft², Rapine, removing of Boundaries, and the like Crimes are forbidden by the bare Law of Nature. Euripides³ speaks excellently to this Purpose;

*God hates the violent, commanding all³
To live on what their honest Pains procure;
And not to feed their Wants with mutual Spoils.
Oppressors sh^uld be banish'd human Race,
Unworthy of the Name. One common Heaven
Gives Light and Air to Man; one Earth a Seat,
A Scene of Industry, where all may strive
To raise their Stock, and spread their Fortunes wide;
But not to rob, or force their Neighbour's store.*

² Vid. D. Lib. x. t. 4. l. 1. c. 3. De fugitivis. We speak here all along of the innocent and well-meaning Possessor; for the Obligations which lie on the dishonest Possessor are open'd in another Place. See the next Paragraph towards the End.

MR. BARB. NOTES on Chap. XIII. §. 1.

² The Roman Lawyers say positively, that Theft and Robbery are contrary to natural Right. Furtum est contrahatio rei fraudulosa, lucri faciendi gratia, vel ipsius rei, vel etiam usus ejus, possessionisque, quod lege naturali prohibetur: est admittere, Dig. lib. xlvii. tit. 2. De furtis, l. 1. §. 3. See also lib. 1. tit. 16. De verb. signif. l. 42. Salmassius in his Treatise De Usuris, c. ix. raises great Difficulties about it, but in Mr. Hertius's Judgment not worth repeating.

Κτάσθαι κελύει πάντας, ἢ ἐς ἀρχαγὰς
Ἐατίος ὁ πλῆθος ἀδικίης τις ὄν
Κοινός γὰρ ἐστὶν ἕρανός τ᾽ αἰ βροτοῖς
Καὶ γὰρ, ἐν ἧ χρῆ δώματ' ἀνακληρημάτους
Τ' ἄλλοτρια μὴ χεῖν, μηδ' ἀφαιρετῶσαι βίαι.

We have also two fine Fragments of Menander upon this Subject, both of them recited by Clement of Alexandria, Stromat. lib. v. p. 605, 606. and by Eusebius, Præp. Evang. l. xiii. c. 13. and which are also found in Mr. Le Clerc's Collection lately publish'd. They are the more remarkable, because they confirm what I have proved at large, l. ii. c. 4. §. 3. note 4. before going. For we may see by the common Notions of the Heathens deliver'd in their Plays on the Theatre, that, to please the Gods, we must not covet other Men's Goods, nor debauch our Neighbour's Daughter, or Wife, but be kind, servicable, charitable, &c.

by others sine pactione, without some Bargain in order to give the Finder Satisfaction ^a; whilst they affirm at the same time, That he who takes up any thing of another's with a Design of converting it to his own Use, is guilty of Theft, whether he knows the particular Owner, or not ^{b c}. Yet if I become Master of a thing upon a just Title, and with an honest Intention, I am not bound to call my own Right into dispute, and to give publick notice that such a thing is in my Custody, to the end that it may be challeng'd, if it should happen to belong to another. For when the manner of my getting the Possession was in no respect faulty ^d, my Innocence and Integrity clear me from all Imputation of Guilt in detaining another's Goods.

This farther Restriction is likewise to be understood in the present Duty; If he who was before the true Owner, hath still any probable means left of his recovering what he lost; that the Obligation we are now asserting, may not be thought to overthrow the Right of Prescription ^d.

III. Now that this Obligation is sufficiently founded in the bare Notion of Property, appears evident. For since a Person may happen, by many Accidents, to lose his hold, and be thrown out of the Possession of what is really his own; our Goods, and especially those which are moveable, would be in a very slippery and uncertain Condition, if, when they stray into another Man's hands, he might intercept or conceal them from us; much more, if he might detain such a thing openly, and repulse us with Violence, when we attempted to make good our Claim. And therefore, as in a State of Communion 'tis a matter of Right that each Person shall be allow'd to use the common Store as fully and freely as the rest; so upon the first appropriation of things, when all other Persons did, as it were, renounce their Right to what any one had received as his private Share, the distinct Proprietors are supposed to have made this Agreement amongst themselves ^e, That he who chanced to be in possession of another's Goods, after he knew it to be another's, should cause it to return to its Owner. For the Power and Virtue of Property would be too weak, and the keeping of things would require too much Expence, as well as too much Care and Trouble, if these stray'd Goods were only then to be restor'd, when the Owner made a formal Challenge of them; because he must very frequently be ignorant which way they are gone, or where they are lodg'd.

As to a Man's being bound to restore a thing, when claim'd by the Owner, 'tis altogether the same Case, whether he got Possession by honest, or by dishonest Means: For this Obligation doth not arise from any Default, or any Fact of ours, or

MR. BARB. NOTES on §. II, III.

² There is no need of supposing such a general Agreement, as we have proved upon c. 4. 6. The Obligation of restoring the Goods of another is as natural a Consequence of Property, as it is not to take them. But this Obligation ought to be understood in such a Manner as not to destroy the Rights of an honest Possession, or a putative Property, which, as I have before observed, §. 8. Note 3. produces the same Effect as a Property more real and incontestable, so long as the real Owner appears not. This neither Grotius, nor our Author, nor any other that I know of, were aware of, and therefore have been puzzled very much to determine several Cases which have fallen in upon this Subject, and so many times their Solutions were inconsistent one with another, which proves sufficiently, that their Principle upon which they argued, was not found. I say then, that one of the principal Uses of our Goods being to trade withal, and that Use requiring that the honest Possessor should be reputed in all respects the lawful Proprietor, such a Possessor can be obliged to restore only what is in Being, i. e. what he has not parted with, nor is in any manner perished; for he then has nothing, and so can restore nothing, as our Author himself acknowledges, in respect to what is given away, or sold again, as it was acquired, and to what is spent or lost. Moreover, all that the honest Possessor hath done, or performed, as such, upon the account of the Goods of another, which he believed his own, is as valid, as to him, as if he had disposed of a thing to him, of whom no other Person can claim any thing, and the Profit, which might redound to him by such Goods, while he was in the Possession of them, or when he parted with them, belongs to him by Consequence. For as he was, and ought to be supposed the true Proprietor, the Rights and Profits of the Property did absolutely accrue to him, so long as he had no Reason to suppose otherwise. And then if the ancient Owner recovers his Good, he begins again, as we may say, all new Expence, to follow his Business. The peaceable Enjoyment of the honest Possessor is as a kind of Interregnum, which has interrupted the Power of the true Proprietor, but insures to the putative Proprietor the Effects of his Management, while he was in full Authority. This being agreed on, we may see in my Judgment how far the natural Obligation of restoring the Goods of another extend, when Men have had an honest Possession with a just Title. If he hath disposed of them by any good and irreversible Act to a third Person, who has honestly received them, he is only obliged to assist, as much as he can, the old Owner to make him, who has wrongfully taken and retain'd his Goods, to give him Satisfaction, and to declare to the new Possessor the Right of the true Proprietor, that he may do what he ought in the Case. But if the thing is yet in the hands of the honest Possessor, or he has got the Possession of it without Charge, or it has cost him something. In the first Case, as when a Person has obtained a thing by Free-gift, or has found a thing, he ought to return it fairly and readily without any Demand, at least if it has occasioned no greater Expence to him than is made up by the keeping of it. In the other Case, if one has bought it, or taken it by purchase, 'tis just that the true Owner, who would recover his Good, should repay the honest Possessor what he has given, otherwise he may keep the thing; and if the other do not redeem it before the time of Prescription is come, it then entirely changes the Owner, so that the first can have no Title to it. By these Principles it is easy to determine clearly all the Questions, which can concern this Matter, as we shall see in the Notes upon the following Paragraph, where I shall rectify our Author's Notions. Although he is not of the true Sentiments with Grotius, yet he reasons in general according to the Notions of the great Man, whose Authority seems to overshadow him here. This I mention not by mere Conjecture; for in his Elements of Jurisprudence, which was the first Work that I attempted to comment on, he took notice of the Weakness of Grotius's Opinions, and delivered them in such a Manner, as can't be well grounded but by supposing the Principles that I have distinctly established; for he says, "That as yet the civil Laws of several People permit any one to take Goods where he finds them; nevertheless, if we could find out a Right, the true Proprietor may not take it immediately from the honest Possessor, though he may from the Person who deprived him of his Good; for, quid he, why should the honest Possessor lose it, or be prevented more than the true Owner, being it is not his Fault? Lib. i. Dof. 5. §. 25. p. 77, 78.

from any particular Covenant made with the Claimant, but from the thing itself; or rather from that general Covenant to this Purpose, which we suppose to be the necessary attendant of Property. He then, who obtain'd the thing honestly, is barely oblig'd to make Restitution; but he who procur'd it dishonestly, besides the necessity of Restitution, hath likewise contracted a Guilt, and is on that account liable to Punishment. Good Faith, or honest Intention, doth then cease, at least, in the Court of Conscience, when a Man hath full Assurance, that what he holds belongs to another^a. Though it is enough to secure him from human Punishment, if he were thus well-meaning and sincere only at his first entering on the Possession.

IV. This is confirm'd and illustrated by the Divine Law itself, Deut. xxii. 1, 2, 3. And lest any should imagine that the Duty there enjoined is to be paid to Friendship only, 'tis expressly added, Exod. xxiii. 4. that the same ought to be perform'd to an Enemy.

Josephus^b hath given us this Gloss on the Law which we are now mentioning: If any Man, says he, find Gold or Silver in his way, let him seek out the Party who lost it, and restore it by the Hands of the publick Coyer, in the very place where he took it up, judging with himself, that no Advantage can be good, which ariseth from another's Damage. The same he must do with regard to the stray Sheep and Cattle he meets with in the Desert. If he cannot presently find out the Owner, let him retain the things in his own Custody, calling God to witness, that he intended not to make a Gain of what belonged to his Neighbour. Yet the mortal Hatred which the Jewish Nation profess'd against all others, afterwards turn'd this natural into a civil Law, to be put in practice only towards their own Country-men^c.

One of the most remarkable Instances of Restitution, which History affords, is that of the Emperor Theophilus, who, when a Woman cry'd after him in his Progress, and claim'd the Horse on which he rode, finding upon Enquiry that the Governor of a certain Province had taken it away, and presented it to him in his own Name, he immediately gave back the Horse to the poor Woman; and having no others at hand from his own Stable, was content to make use of the next he could borrow. Which, they tell us, was the Rise of that Custom, which afterwards obtain'd, for the Emperors to carry in their Train a great Number of Horses, for Supplies, in case of any such Accident^d.

The Example of the Spartans, which Grotius mentions^e, who condemn'd their General Phabidas for seizing on the Cadmean Fort, and yet still kept the Place in their Hands^f, doth not come up to our Point: For they were, no doubt, injurious and dishonest Possessors, and therefore were bound to Restitution by another Principle. Nor is the Story of M. Crassus, and Q. Hortensius, more proper in the present Question, as Tully^g gives the Report: Some Persons, says he, brought out of Greece to Rome a forged Will of L. Minutius Basilus, a very wealthy Man; and the more easily to carry their Point, put down M. Crassus, and Q. Hortensius, two who had the greatest Power and Interest in the City, as Joint Heirs with themselves. The two Gentlemen, though they suspected the Deed to be counterfeited, yet relying upon their own Innocence in the Matter, did not refuse to make this small Advantage of the others Wickedness. What then? Is it enough that they appear to have had no Hand in the Fact? I am not of that Opinion: For he certainly is to be censur'd as unjust, who not only forbears to drive off an Injury from another, but aids and encourages it. Here the Gentlemen had as great a share in the Crime of Forgery, as Receivers are said to have in that of Theft; inasmuch as they apprehended themselves to have been put into the Will for no other Reason, but that their Name and Authority might protect the Authors of the Cheat.

From the same Head we may discover the Custom of awarding Wrecks to the Prince^h, or to the State, to be disagreeable to Equityⁱ. As we may

MR. BARB. NOTES on §. IV.

¹ See Mr. Hortius's Note on that Place, and his Discourse, De Superioritate Territoriali, §. 56. in Tom. ii. of his Comment. de Op. p. b. There are some places in Germany, where the Preachers scruple not to pray to God in the Pulpit, that he would make many Shipwrecks upon their Coasts. And Mr. Thomasius maintains, that neither these Prayers, nor the Custom itself are absolutely unreasonable, or disagreeable to the Rules of Charity or Justice: for though, as he say, in the time of the Wreck there is no Delight to abandon utterly what is cast away, yet there is no hopes ordinarily of recovering it, and we know that there is as much Reason to fear that the Goods are utterly lost, as if they had been cast into the main Ocean: Besides, the Owner of the Coasts may, at the place where he has a Right to demand Customs of Strangers, use all means to repay himself for the Expences he is at in maintaining the Port and Shore. We may add to this, that it is often very hard to know whose Goods and Merchandizes those are, that the Sea throws upon the Shore. So that they are a kind of Alluvions, which, by the Right of Nations, is a lawful way of getting. The publick Prayers, made on this Subject, ought not to be understood as if they begged of God that he would make a great number of Shipwrecks, but only that he would cause that the Sea should not retain the Goods cast into it, but discharge itself of them by casting them upon their Coasts rather than any other; for what Reason is there for us to suppose, that such holy Church-men should every Day beg God's Help for a thing contrary to all natural Right; or, at least, that some of their Brethren should not charitably advise them of such a detestable Sin, which they had been guilty of so long a time? These are the Reasons of the Author of whom he speaks, which he delivers in his Discourse, De Statum Imperii potestate Legislatoria contra Jus commune; printed at Hall in 1703. §. 42. The manner in which he justifies the Prayers is manifestly absurd (to speak no worse of them) would make us believe that he is not in earnest, and that he diverts himself with want of Conscience in the Clergy. As for the Confiscation of the Goods belonging to such as have suffered Shipwreck, the Proprietors who cast them away, do not look upon them altogether lost, but that they reserve to themselves a Right of claiming them, if ever they happen to be cast upon the Shore, as they know it often comes to pass. See above, c. 6. §. 12. And 'tis not by these Misfortunes, that the maintenance of Ports and Shore ought to be upheld: The Toll would be too exorbitant and odious; such as lose their Goods would at this Rate pay for those that have the good Luck to save them, and get to the End of their Voyage. That it is no less a Shipwreck, than if it happened in the main Sea, as Mr. Thomasius says, shews plain enough how frivolous the Pretence of making may likewise gather the Absurdity of that Practice in some Countries, by which the stolen Goods, when discover'd ², are not restor'd to the Owner, but are claim'd by the publick Treasury ^a.

V. Inasmuch as this Engagement to restore the Goods of others ariseth from a general Agreement amongst all Mankind, a Bar is hereby put to all particular Contracts made about a thing which is any way kept from the true Owner; the Effect of which is, that when the thing is known to be another's, any Bargain about the conveying it to a third Party becomes null and void ¹. And this too is the ground of Diogenes's Jest on two Thieves, one of which had plunder'd the other; One, he said, had stolen something, but the other had lost nothing ^b.

As to that Law of the Digest ², produced by Ziegler ^c, to prove that a Contract made after such a Discovery is not always evacuated or hindered by the Force of Property, it is really no prejudice to what we now assert: For in the Case there alledg'd the Interest of the Creditor is more concern'd that the Pledge should remain safe, than the Interest of the Debtor who owns it; and the Debtor cannot challenge the Pledge, unless upon Payment ^d.

The Judgment of Tryphoninus, in the same place of the Digest, upon the other Case which he there proposeth, doth not to me appear satisfactory. A Man cast for a capital Crime, says he, hath deposited an hundred Pounds in your Hands; the Man is afterwards transported, and his Goods confiscated; the Question is, Whether you shall restore the hundred Pounds to him who gave it you in Charge, or whether you shall pay it into the Treasury? If we regard only the Law of Nature and of Nations ³, the Money is to be given back ⁴ to the Party who committed it to your Trust; if we consider the End of civil Government, and the Rule and Method of positive Laws, you ought rather to throw it into the publick Stock. For he, who hath deserv'd ill of the whole State, should be left to struggle with Poverty too amongst his other Inconveniences, that his Example may deter others from offending.

But, indeed, since sovereign Rulers have even by the Law of Nations a Power to punish Criminals in their Fortunes and Estates; when such a Penalty is justly agreed against a Malefactor, 'tis agreeable to the very Law of Nature, that all his Goods should be forfeited to the Government: Yet that the Confiscation of Goods should attend any one particular Crime rather than others, is purely owing to the Appointment of positive Constitutions. The consideration of that Benefit which accrues to the Publick from Penalties duly inflicted (the Reason urged by Tryphoninus) did indeed shew that such a penal Sanction ought to be approved of; but it was not properly the Cause, why the ⁵ Treasury should have the advantage of the Criminal, as to challenging the Sum which he had lodg'd in other Hands. For by the Sentence of the Court all the Right and Property of the condemn'd Criminal over his Goods was taken from him, and conferr'd on the Government; and consequently what he formerly gave in Trust is to be deliver'd back, not to him, but to the publick making Satisfaction is, and the Difficulty of knowing the true Owners of the Merchandizes, which the Sea casts up, proves only, that they ought to be adjudged to the first Comer, without examining if there be Reason to demand them; and if the Owner can't be found, they belong to the Lord of the Country as first Occupant: In a Word, the Custom, of which we are speaking, can't be justify'd, but by supposing that Property is lost with actual Possession; an Hypothesis, which I have sufficiently confuted above, Chap. vi. §. 1. Note 1.

Nam malè meritis publicæ, ut exempla aliis ad deterrenda maleficia sit, etiam egestate laborare debet. Ibid. princip.*

⁵ See Mr. Noat's Probabilia Juris, l. iii. c. 2. As to the thing itself, there ought, as I think, some Distinction to be made; if we speak of a truly wicked Person, who is guilty of enormous Crimes, and who appears to be hardened in Sin, 'twill be a means to make him go on in his evil Courses to restore what he has intrusted us with. But if the Criminal be condemn'd for things which are not evil, but only as they are forbidden by the Laws; or if some violent Passion, Temptation or Habit, assist'd by his Temper, has hurried him into the Commission of an Action heinous in its Nature; we may not only, but we ought, in my Judgment, to restore our Trust faithfully to the unhappy Person. And in this he doth nothing contrary to the Duty of a good Citizen. For the End and Design of the Laws, which punish with a general Confiscation of Good, requires that all that appears, or can be discovered, should be confiscated; but it doth not require that every one should go and declare what he has in his Hands, belonging to the Criminal. This were to enlarge the Severity of the Law, whereas it ought to be mitigated as far as possible; and if it expressly command, that none shall conceal any thing that is his, it ought to be interpreted in such a manner, as to imply, that he shall be guiltless if he undergo the Punishment to be inflict'd on such as have the Courage to run the Hazard of serving an unhappy Person. The Ties of Relation and Friendship, which it is the Interest of the publick to favour and cherish, make this Interpretation reasonable, since it is common to trust a thing with a Relation or Friend; and if he had, that by putting the thing intrusted to him into the Treasury deprives Children or other innocent Persons of a thing that ought to defend to them, how great a Criminal soever the Offender may be whose Goods are confiscated, and how horrid never the Crimes which have brought this Punishment on him, there is no human Law can be so understood as to oblige him in Conscience to discover the Secrets, or betray the Interest of them who ought to inherit the thing intrusted to us, and have done nothing to deserve to be disappointed of it.

Receivers.

Receivers. Because all kind of Property, whether it ariseth from positive Ordinances, or from the Law of Nations, hath this effect amongst others, That he, who is in possession of any thing over which the said Property extends, shall be bound to restore it to the Party who at present appears to be the true Owner⁶. What Demurs and Exceptions the Law of restoring things given in charge admits in other Cases upon account of particular Circumstances, is frequently shewn by Authors. Vid. Cic. Off. iii. c. 25. Seneca De Benef. l. iv. c. 10. Ambr. De Off. l. i. c. ult. To which may be added what Polybius (in excerpt. Peirisc. p. 172.) reports of Ariarathes King of Cappadocia, who having recover'd the Kingdom from Oropernes, demanded of the Prieniens the forty Talents which Oropernes had put into their Hands; and upon their refusing to deliver them to him, fell upon their City with Fire and Sword, in Polybius's Opinion very unjustly. Tho' this Action of Ariarathes may be commended, if we first suppose that Oropernes had injuriously depriv'd him of his Crown.

Upon this natural Obligation to Restitution, the Compilers of the civil Law have built a great number of additional Rules⁷. And this too is the Ground of claiming by judicial Process⁸, what is detain'd from us, together with all the Actions which border on that Claim; and in some sort, the Action of false Debt⁹; the Action for Recovery of what we have given¹⁰, either upon some Reason, which Reason hath not been made good, or else upon no Reason at all¹¹. Though these Actions are said likewise to depend upon a kind of imaginary Contract¹². For when we deliver a thing without intending it for a matter of pure Bounty, it is suppos'd to be given by the one Party, and receiv'd by the other on this Condition, That it shall be delivered back, in case there appear no Reason why it was given.

What hath been said about the Restitution of the main Thing or Substance, extends likewise to the Fruits or Profits of it, such as are now remaining;

so much still being deducted as amounts to the Charges of producing, gathering, or preserving them.

VI. But if what we have honestly gotten, tho' really belonging to another, hath been as honestly spent, then it seems most agreeable to natural Equity, that we should not pay the whole Value of it to the Owner, but only the Advantage they brought us, or so much as we were made the richer by it; provided still that the Owner hath not been requir'd for what he lost, some other way. For if I honestly acquire and consume what was stolen from you, when you have already received full Satisfaction from the Thief, you can then demand nothing of me, how much soever I have been a Gainer by my Bargain. The Ground and Reason of this Assertion is not so much to be taken from the End of Property^b (which was establish'd that every Man might, according to Proportion, enjoy his own: whereas he, who gains by what is mine, hath more than his Proportion, as I on the contrary have less) as from the following Consideration; That a thing in which I have not lost my Property, either by my own free Consent, or by Default, or by the Right of War, still belongs to me; as doth likewise all the Fruit and Product of it. When such a thing therefore hath fallen into another Man's Hands, who hath made an Advantage by spending it; his Honesty and good Intention secure him indeed from all Guilt and Censure; yet he can on no Pretence withhold the Profits, when I lay claim to them^c, because they are to be look'd on as the Residue, or the surviving part of the thing, at least they are the proper and necessary Fruit proceeding from it. Hence it is one of the most common and proverbial Sayings^d, That no Man ought to gain by another's Loss; that is, by such a Loss as he did not himself procure, either by his Consent or Default, so as to be the Cause of the Damage, or to have it any way imputed to him. For it can be no Sin in me to take an Occasion of Advantage from the Loss or Damage of another^e, when it was not

⁶ There are, adds our Author here, other Cases, in which the Law, which commands to restore our Trust, admits of Exceptions; as when a Man who has put his Sword into our keeping becomes delirious, and then comes to demand it; or when he, that hath put a Sum of Money into our Hands, raises War against the State.

¹⁰ Cic. Off. l. iii. c. 25. is, when we promise or give a thing for a Cause which is superseded, or upon a Condition which was never performed; as if one receive a Portion in order to a Marriage, which was never accomplished, but was dissolved.

¹² He may very well dispute with it, since, as I have shew'd above, §. 3. Note 1. all the time that he was the honest Possessor, he had a full Right, and so was really; so that the Profit he had from it was a Part or Revenue which came from the Goods of another, but was an Acquisition made by virtue of his Right of Possession, and it ought to remain his with so much the greater Reason, because it is almost always one way or other the Fruit of his Industry.

of my own procuring^a. It is observable, that in the Books of the Roman Laws many Cases are determin'd according to the Equity of this general Rule⁺, with some difference from the ordinary Tenure and Strictness of the Letter. Vid. Instit. lib. iv. tit. 7. Upon the same Foundation the Action which they term⁵ de in rem verso seems to depend. Vid. D. lib. xv. tit. 3.

VII. From the Rules already proposed may be drawn a satisfactory Decision of many Points usually controverted as well by Lawyers as Divines; which we think it may be proper to transcribe out of Grotius: First, He that honestly and innocently gains Possession of what is another's (for of him only we would here be all along understood; inasmuch as the dishonest Possessor doth not only stand obliged on account of the thing us'd, but is farther obnoxious by his own Crime) so long as he continues in this Integrity^b, is bound to no Restitution, in case the thing perish or be lost; because he neither enjoys the Substance, nor any Fruit or Advantage of it^c. We add, That he doth not stand bound, though it should have happened to perish by his Default: For his honest Intention was to him in the Place of Property¹. Now a Proprietor, tho' he lose his Goods through his own Neglect², yet is thought to sustain sufficient Damage by the Loss, and is liable to no farther Punishment: But we are to pronounce otherwise, if the Person in Possession, understanding the thing to be another's, voluntarily made away with it to avoid Restitution.

VIII. Secondly, Such a Possessor through honest Mistake is bound to restore, not only the thing it self, but likewise such Fruits or Products of it as are still remaining; because, in natural Estimation, he that is Owner of the thing, is Owner too of the Fruits^d. Yet here they do distinguish between the Fruits of the thing, and the Fruits of the Man's own Labour. Grotius is of Opinion, that the former only ought to be given up, and not the latter; because these are not due to the thing itself, tho' perhaps they could not have been procured without it. Others think, that even the latter Fruits should be restored, and alledge a Law of the Code^e in favour of their Assertion^f. And indeed this Judgment seems to come nearest to the Rule of Kindness and Humanity; provided this Clause be subjoyned, That the honest Possessor may in this Case deduct, as well the Expence which the thing hath put him to, as a due Reward for his Labour¹: As likewise that, to prevent troublesome Suits, the Proprietor upon claiming his own should not be too raking and greedy, should not (as we say) sweep Dust and all: For after the Business hath been quality'd by these two Alleviations, it will seldom happen that the honest Possessor shall have much to give up out of the Advantage he made by his own Industry.

IX. Thirdly, Such a Possessor is bound not only to restore the thing, but likewise to satisfy for the Fruits which he hath spent¹, if it appear that he would have spent as much otherwise²: For he is judged to be so much the richer, whilst by spending another's Goods he one would search themselves, he'd find that our Wishes inwardly are for the most part raised and supported by the Expence of another; which being consider'd, it comes into my Mind, that Nature does not in this siverve at all from her general Course; for Physicians hold, that the original Growth and Increase of every thing is the Alteration and Corruption of another; for as Lucretius says, lib. ii. ver. 752, 753.

*Nam quodcumque factis mutatum finibus exit,
Continuò hoc mors est illius, quod fuit arte.*

This Chapter of Montaigne's Essays, to which the Author refers us, and which is the twenty first of the first Book, was so short, that I thought that the Reader would no more grudge to read it, than I have done to copy it out. See Seneca De Benef. l. vi. c. 58. from whence 'tis almost all taken.

¹ This Approbation of the Author is remarkable, but he saw not the Consequences of it, and it follows from all the other Principles of his Decision of the following Cases.

hath saved his own^a. Yet here we are of Opinion, That besides the Limitation above added, it should be likewise considered, whether the well-meaning Possessor be able to recover of the Party, who sold him the thing, so much as he loseth upon it's being claim'd by the true Owner². If this is impossible to be done, the Possessor is ne'er the richer by the Bargain, when he is forced to restore what he bought, and yet cannot make himself whole by recovering the Price he gave. As to the Example of Caligula produced from^b Sueton, who tells us, That when he restor'd any exil'd Princes to their Dominions, he gave them up likewise the Revenues, which had been brought in the mean time into the Roman Treasury. We may observe, that he believed their Kingdoms to have been unjustly taken from them, and consequently himself to be in dishonest Possession. Or if he did not condemn his Predecessor's Act in this Matter, yet it may still be questioned, whether he restored these Fruits and Profits out of supposed Duty and Conscience, or out of meer Generosity. So that we take it to be the truer Judgment to affirm, that the innocent Possessor is obliged to restore the Value of what he hath spent, when he cannot recover Damages of the Person who cheated him with this false Title. For in that Case he cannot be supposed to have enriched himself by the Purchase. And it seems a greater Hardship to pay the Value of a thing that is spent and gone, than to restore the thing itself, were it forth coming.

X. Fourthly, Such a Possessor is not bound to make good those Fruits or Profits which he neglected to take; because he neither hath them, nor any thing else in their Room. And his Negligence about what was his own, or in all Respects the same as if it had been his own, is adjudg'd to be a sufficient Prejudice to him^c.

XI. Fifthly, If such a Possessor, having receiv'd the thing as a free Gift, shall have afterwards bestow'd it on another, he is not obliged to make Satisfaction to the Owner, unless it appear that he would have given as much some other way^d; for then the sparing his own Stock will be reckon'd a matter of Gain and Advantage to him. This Account seems to suppose a Distinction between Donations out of Duty, and Donations out of meer Bounty; as that the former only are to be made good in the Case before us, and not the latter. Because, ordinarily speaking, no Man is presum'd to give in this gratuitous manner, unless he thinks himself to have somewhat superfluous; and consequently his Inclination to give is judged to have proceeded from his Opinion, that the thing which he thus disposed of, and which proved to be another's, was more than he wanted for his own Use. And as to that Obligation which ariseth from such a Bounty in the Receiver, it is by no means reckon'd amongst those things which are capable of being rated at a set Price; and therefore he, who only expects an uncertain Return for what he hath actually bestow'd, doth not in the least appear to have been made richer by what he parted with on this Prospect^e. But it is to be considered likewise farther, whether the Present be still remaining in the last Receiver's Hands or not: If it be, the Proprietor shall claim it directly of him, and not trouble the intermediate Receiver: If not, the main Burthen shall still fall on the Person who either now possesseth the thing, or hath been made richer by it. But the intermediate Possessor shall only come in for a small Share in the Burthen, inasmuch as he too perhaps had an Opportunity of making some Advantage^f.

XII. Sixthly, If such a Possessor, having first bought the thing, shall afterwards have alienated it, he shall not be bound to give the Owner any more than the Overplus of the prime Cost^g; or so much as he hath gain'd by his Bargain. But if it first cost him nothing, and yet he hath sold it, he shall then be obliged to give up the Price received^h, in case the Owner cannot recover the thing itself of the present Possessor; and unless the former Party hath squander'd away the Price he took, which, if not so easily gotten, had not been so prodigally spent. But he, who puts a thing off for just so much as it cost him, is no Gainer, being supposed only to recover his own. Nor can it be said in this Case, that the Price supplies the room of the thing; unless he parted with it out of a knavish Design: Because otherwise the Owner is to challenge his Goods from the hands of him who is now in Possession.

There is a Law of the *Digests*ⁱ urged in the present Case, which runs thus; If after a Thief hath sold the Goods he stole, the Owner of them shall by violent means get the Price out of his Hands, he seems to be guilty of Robbery as much as the other Party was before, and to be equally obnoxious to the Law. For all agree, that the Advantage of a stolen thing, or the Money into which it is turn'd, is not itself likewise stolen. But this Law properly respects civil Governments. For those who live

Mr. BARB. NOTES on §. X, XI, XII.

² Either this Exception is ill grounded, or it may be extended to other Cases, which the Author does not. From whence it appears that these Determinations are not very coherent.

¹ It is true, 'tis of some Advantage, but then 'tis as true, that as he might receive the Present, and make it his own, so he had also Right to alienate it in what manner he pleased. And so what he spared of his own Goods is lawfully gotten by him, and consequently all the Distinctions, which our Author hereafter makes, are needless.

¹ From what has been said in the foregoing Notes it follows, that the honest Possessor is not obliged to restore the Value of the thing, nor the Gain he has made by parting with it, whether he bought it, or it was given him. So that the Author's Distinctions here are also superfluous.

² 'Tis for this Reason that Mr. La Placette maintains, and upon this Supposition says, "That as it is agreed that we must restore a thing if it be in Being, he is persuaded, that we can't keep the Price that arose from it." Treat. of Restitution, l. iv. c. 5. Observe whither unground Principles will carry Men, when they are once engaged in them!

in a State of natural Liberty, may as fairly seize by Violence the Price of what hath been stolen from them, as the thing itself.

XIII. Seventhly, Such a Possessor, though he purchas'd the thing at a considerable Expence, yet is bound to restore it, and cannot require his Charges of the Owner, but of the Seller. For, otherwise, the Right of challenging would turn to no Account¹, if the Challenger were to refund the Price. And he who buys a thing of another, whom he might suspect not to be the true Proprietor, ought to have provided particularly for his own Security, in case the thing should afterwards happen to be claim'd: Though this Condition of securing the Buyer's Title is indeed impl'd in all Contracts of Sale, according to natural Equity².

To the Rule above-mention'd the following Exception ought to be added; Unless in a case where the true Proprietor could not in all Probability have recovered Possession of his own, without some Expence: As suppose the Goods were detain'd in the hands of Thieves or Pirates, and from them purchas'd. For here the honest Man, who delivers the Goods, may fairly deduct so much as the Proprietor would have gladly spent to regain them: Because the actual Possession, especially when not to be recovered without difficulty, is capable of being rated at a certain Value, and the Proprietor, when re-inflated in it, is adjudg'd to be, on this account, so much the richer³. Whence arose the Custom for Persons who have lost any thing, to promise Μίσυτρον, a Reward and Encouragement to the Finder.⁴ For the same Reason, though the buying of what's already our own be void, according to the ordinary course of the civil Law, yet Paulus affirms it to be good and valid⁵, if it be first agreed upon, that the Possession of what's our own may be purchas'd, when remaining with another.

'Tis propos'd as a farther Question on this point, Whether a Man who buys a thing thus detain'd, purely with Design to convey it to the Owner, may demand the Price to be refunded? Some take the negative part; because, say they, *The Right accruing to the Proprietor cannot be taken off by this Allegation of the Buyer.*⁶ But indeed, if such a Purchaser foresaw with fair probability, that the true Owner would hardly recover his Goods by other means, and if the Price which he gave do not rise above what the actual Possession which he restores may be valu'd at, then 'tis absolutely requisite that what he expended should be repaid him. But whether he who redeems the thing in this Case shall be allow'd an Action⁷ against the Proprietor, such as they term Negotiorum gestorum, or to recover the Charges he hath been at in the Proprietor's Business, it is the Province of the Civilians more nicely to state and enquire.⁸ The Reason, which Gratius offers for his omitting to determine that Matter, is, Because the aforesaid Action ariseth purely from the Civil Law, having none of those Foundations to rest upon, from which bare Nature introduceth an Obligation in the Case. But tho' 'tis not indeed the Concern of the Law of Nature to examine, or determine, to what particular Action at civil Law the present Case may be, or ought to be reduced; yet it cannot be deny'd but that the very Action above specify'd, of recovering Charges on account of Business manag'd for another, hath a Foundation in natural Equity, and in tacit Compact. For it cannot on any pretence be requir'd of me, that I should by my kind and generous Assistance preserve or improve another Man's Goods altogether gratuitously, and without receiving what I am out of Pocket in his Service⁹. It seems therefore the most plain and natural way of resolving such Cases, that the Party who redeems a thing after this manner, as likewise he who transacts any Business on another's Behalf, be suppos'd to hold the thing which he hath redeemed, or about which he hath employ'd his Money or his Pains, as a Pledge or Mortgage, till such time as he receives Satisfaction. Yet if there be no Fruits of his Labour remaining, which he might take hold on for his own Security, and if the other barbarously deny to pay him for his so useful and profitable Assistance, I am not of opinion that he may apply the same means towards asserting his Right as are used in that other kind of Right which ariseth from express Contract; but all he can do shall be to expose the ungrateful Wretch to publick Hatred and Detestation, as one who doth not deserve the least Instance of good Will

MR. BARB. NOTES on §. XIII.

¹ It is sufficient, that the Proprietor can always recover the same thing in Specie from whomsoever is in Possession of it by an honest Intention. We are sometimes glad to recover our Goods at any Expence, either because the things are rare, or we have great need of them, or because we take singular Pleasure in the Possession. Further, Either we know not that the thing belongs to us, and in this Case we do or ought to count that 'tis all Profit, if we obtain Restitution; or we know not what's become of it, and in that Case we ought to look upon it either intirely lost, or very hard to be recovered, so that we ought to be satisfied in paying the honest Possessor that which he has given. But if we believe that it is bought very dear at the Price, and so had rather leave it in the hands of the honest Possessor, 'tis not the Fault of this latter; and there is no Reason why he ought to lose his Money rather than the other his Goods. You'll say perhaps, he should have taken better Security. But we suppose he hath taken all the Care he ought, or could. The Necessity and Nature of Commerce in this Life permits us often to have no certainty, that the Person of whom we buy, for Example, or take a thing to pawn, is the lawful Proprietor of it, or can make a valid Contract with us about it, much less require personal Securities, and make them in force in case of Ejection. See above, § 3. not. 1.

XIV. Eighthly, In the Opinion of Grotius, He who buys another Man's Goods cannot return them upon the Hands of the Seller, and demand back his Money in their stead. Because so soon as ever they came under his Power, there commeth in him an Obligation of restoring them to their true Owner. In which Case we are of a different Judgment: For certainly I am not bound to purchase a thing which I know to be another's, only that the true Master may recover his Goods, and that I may lose my Money^c. When therefore I find the thing which I bought to belong to another Owner, and am unwilling the Claim should be directed against me, either to avoid the trouble of the Dispute, or because I despair of getting my Money again of the Seller, I should think that I might fairly recede from such a Bargain (provided it were not too late) to avoid the drawing upon my self an unnecessary and unprofitable Contention; yet so as that I should be at the same time obliged to discover to the Owner, upon his Demand, where his Goods are lodg'd, that he may have an Opportunity of regaining them^e.

SINCE Things that are the Subject of Property are of different Natures, and administer differently to human Necessities; and since it often happens, that either the same Thing belongs to many (the Parts of which are not in all respects alike) or that ¹ Things of a different Nature are to be exchanged for one another: Hence it becomes necessary for Men to agree upon some common Measure, by which Things of a different Nature may be compared together, and made equal to one another. Now Things are thus compared, and found to be equal, or unequal, in respect of their Quantities; for Equality is nothing else but an agreement of Quantities: And therefore we must consider the Quantity of Things and Actions, as far as they are useful to human Life, together with the Foundation and common Measure of that Quantity.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on Chap. I. §. 1.

¹ Commerce is a Consequence of Property of Goods, and Price is the Consequence of Commerce, or a Thing necessary to accommodate each other by way of Exchange, to which all Commerce in general is to be reduced. So that the Roman Lawyers have Reason to refer the Settlement of Commerce to the Law of Nations, understood in the manner that I have explain'd it elsewhere, Lib. ii. cap. 3. §. 23. note 3. Ex hoc jure gentium ——— Dominia distincta, agris termini positi, ædificia collocata: commercium, emptio, venditio, locatio, conductio, obligationes institutæ, exceptis quibusdam, quæ [a] jure civili introductæ sunt. Digest. lib. i. tit. 1. De Justitiâ & Jure, leg. 5. Mr. Thomasius nevertheless maintains, that Commerce is not the Law of Nations farther, than by assuming that Right from such general Custom as have proceeded from the corrupted Manners of Mankind, and which are settled by corrupted Reason; seeing that the Necessity, Diversity, and great Increase of Commerce is the Effect of Vice, and the Growth of it. See the Discourse, De Jure Statuum Imperii dandæ Civitatis, §. 14. and that, De Pretio æstimationis in res fungibiles non cadente, Chap. i. §. 5. both printed at Hall in Saxony. But this respects another Question, which rather relates to Divinity, than the Civil Law. (See lib. i. cap. 1. §. 11. foregoing.) It is sufficient, that in the State that Things now are, Commerce, as well as Propriety of Goods, is necessary among Men in the Condition they are; so that we may say, that the Settlement of Commerce in general is very conformable to the most pure Reason, and the Law of Nations, so called in the most agreeable Sense. Lastly, As Commerce is a Consequence, and one of the chief Uses of Property, we must be careful not to extend the Rights of Property

II. We find then, that Things are said to be equal, not only as they agree in three Dimensurs, but in some other respect. Thus Honour, Labour, and Wages are said to be equal, or unequal, not by reason of their agreeing or disagreeing in Dimension, but upon some other account. And therefore there must be some other Quantity, besides that which is term'd Physical and Mathematical, tho' Philosophers have hitherto talk'd of no other. Which is evident, if we consider, that the Nature of Quantity in general does not consist in the Extension of Substance, but in Things being capable of having a Value put upon them, and consequently of being compared together. But since things receive a Value, not only from their natural Substance, but also in respect of some moral Consideration; it follows, that besides the natural there must be also a moral Quantity^a. However, Things of the same Nature and Goodness receive a Value even from their natural Quantity, as a great Diamond, ceteris paribus, is more valuable than a small one; which yet we have not always a regard to in the Valuation of Things of a different Species, or Goodness; for a great Dog is not always more valuable than a little one, or a great Mass of Lead than a small Piece of Gold.

How Persons are morally valued according to Opinion^b; and their Actions, according as they are productive of Merit or Demerit, has already been discours'd of in its proper Place^c. My Design here is only to treat of the moral quantity of Things and Actions, as they are conceiv'd to have some use in the common Affairs of Life, and as they are capable of being compared together in order to Commerce. This we call Price, which is the moral Quantity or Value of Things or Actions, by which they are usually compared together in order to Traffick.

III. Price may be divided into ¹ proper and eminent; the first is placed in Things and Actions, so far as they are capable of procuring either the Necessaries, or Conveniences, or Pleasures of Life: the other is placed in Money, which is supposed to contain virtually the Prices of all Things else, and to be the common Measure and Standard of them.

IV. For the right understanding the Nature of the proper Price, it is necessary to consider distinctly, first, upon what it is founded; secondly, what it is that raises or sinks it. The Foundation of the Price or Value of any Action or Thing is, ¹ Fitness to procure either mediately, or immediately, the Necessaries, or Conveniences, or Pleasures of human Life. Hence, in common Discourse we call those Things that are useless, Things of no Value; and those Men too we say are of no Value, that are unprofitable Burthens of the Earth. Thus the Cock, in the Fable, set no Value upon the Jewel, because of no use to him. Grotius, l. ii. c. 12. § 14. is of Opinion, That Want is the most natural measure of the Price of Things. Where if he means, that Want, in its own nature, is the Foundation of Price, or that therefore Men only value a thing, because they want it, it will not universally hold true. For, if so, those things that are subservient to our superfluous Pleasures would bear no Price, which yet the Luxury of Man has set a great Rate upon. For we do not really want any thing, but what we cannot, unless with great Inconvenience, be without, Mat. ix. 12. But if his meaning be, that the Want of the Buyer raises the Price, I own it is commonly so; but that it is the natural measure of Price, that the more a Man's Necessities press him, the more may be justly exacted of him, no honest Man will admit: Nor does that ² Place of Aristotle, cited by Grotius, make for the purpose; for the χρησι, or ³ Want, he speaks of there, which in a manner preserves and holds together all Commerce, is not the Foundation of Price, but of Bartering only. For if Men wanted nothing but what they could supply themselves with, there would be no bartering, or exchanging Commodities, but every one would keep and enjoy his own⁴.

V. Yet it is observable, that some of the most useful things of human Life have no Price set upon them; either because they are and ought to be free from Property, or because they are excluded from Commerce, or lastly, because they come within the reach of it, no otherwise than as Appendages of some other thing; besides, the Law has remov'd some Actions from Commerce, and thereby exempted them from Price. Thus the Air, the Sky, the heavenly Bodies, and the vast Ocean not being appropriated, can bear no Price, how serviceable so-so far as to do a considerable Hurt to Commerce. We have seen the Use of this Remark in the two last Chapters of the preceding Book; and 'tis probable that it may serve elsewhere to decide several Cases better than they usually are.

² It is one of the general Reasons; for that which is of no Use, passes commonly for a Thing of no Value. But whence comes it then, that Water, and some other things very useful for Life, are not rated at any Price? as our Author speaks a little lower. We must therefore add another Reason here, I mean, That things that are capable of Price ought to be not only of some Use, if not truly, yet at least in the Opinion and Affections of Men; but also of such a Nature, as not to be sufficient for the Needs of all the World. And so the more useful and rare a thing is in this last Sense, the higher or lower the proper and intrinsic Price will be. If the Fashion of a thing passes away, or few Men esteem it, then it becomes a good Bargain, how dear soever it was before. On the contrary, if a thing that is common, and costs little or nothing, becomes rare, nothing more needs to set a Price on it, and sometimes to make it very dear; as appears, for Example, by Water in dry Places, and at certain times, as in a Siege, &c. By this Principle we must explain and rectify all that our Author hath said concerning the Foundation of Price in general. See Titius's Observations on Puffendorf, CCCXXI, and on Waterbach's Objere. DIII. as also Mr. Thomasius's Jurisprud. Divin. Lib. ii. c. 11. §. 33. &c. and his Discourse De Preti. Aff. Finib., c. 1. §. 10, &c.

² Aristotle's Words are, Δεῑ ἄρα ἐν τιμῇ πάντα μετρεῖσθαι. — τὸ δ' ἐστὶ τῆ μὲν ἀληθείας ἢ χρείας ἢ πάντα συνέχει.

ever they may be to human Life. And the Law having forbid¹ things sacred to be brought into Commerce², has thereby exempted them from Price, although some of them have nothing in their own Nature to render them incapable of it. Nor can any Price be assign'd for a Freeman's Head; it being a Contradiction to be free, and at the same time expos'd to Sale; for he is no sooner expos'd to Sale, but he ceases to be free: And therefore, even upon this Account, Liberty is said to be an invaluable Thing, because the Advantages of it are so great, as to exceed all Value. Here 'tis worth observing what Philo Judæus, De Spec. Leg. p. 597. Edit. Genev. delivers, Prices were set upon those who had devoted not only their Goods, but themselves; not according to their Beauty, or Stature, or such like, but according to their Age and Sex: for the Law fixes two hundred Silver Pieces as a Price for a Man, from the twentieth to the sixtieth Year of his Age, and one hundred and twenty upon a Woman; from the fifth to the twentieth Year eighty for a Man, and forty for a Woman; from Infancy to the fifth Year twenty for a Man, and twelve for a Woman; if past the sixtieth Year for a Man sixty, for a Woman forty. All of the same Age and Sex are rated at the same Price, for three good Reasons; first, because the Dignity of the Vow is the same, whether great or mean Persons make it. Secondly, in the case of a Vow Persons ought not to be rated upon the same Terms with Slaves expos'd to Sale; for those are more or less esteem'd, according to the Beauty and Vigour of their Bodies. Thirdly and chiefly, because with God there is no respect of Persons, as there is with Men. See Levit. chap. xxvii.

Many things also have no Price, because they are not capable of being possessed separately by themselves, which yet very much enhance the Price of the thing they appertain to; as the want of them takes from it not a little³. Thus the lying open to the Sun, a clear and wholesome Air, a pleasant Prospect, the Winds, Shades, &c. consider'd separately in themselves, bear no Price, because they cannot be enjoy'd without the Land they belong to; but yet of what Moment they are in the Purchase of Lands and Tenements, no Man is ignorant.

Pliny, Nat. Hist. lib. xii. cap. 1. says of the Plane-Tree, That the People pay Taxes for the very shade of it. Thus in Holland, those that have Windmills pay a yearly Tribute for the publick Wind, as is pretended. And hence, by the way, it appears how the Cause that⁴ Demosthenes pleaded before the Judges, about the shadow of the Afs, ought to be decided: For he that hired the Afs could not hinder the Owner from lying down where the shadow of the Beast fell, but might immediately have taken it away, by driving the Afs to some other Place. Lastly, whatsoever Actions either divine or human Laws command to be done gratis, or forbid to be done at all, and so exclude from Commerce, cannot be brought under any Price. Of which nature are those several Actions which have some supernatural Effect assign'd to them by divine Institution; as Remission of Sin, by the Absolution of the Priest; the Application of spiritual Benefits, by means of the Sacraments; and such like: Which whoever conters upon another for any valuable Consideration, is guilty of Simony; and to measure such things with Money, is look'd upon as Impiety and Irreverence towards the divine Author⁵. Unlawful too it is to bestow ecclesiastical Preferments for Money, upon unworthy Persons, which ought to be given to deserving Men *gratis*⁶. Neither ought the rewards and testimonials of Virtue and Learning to be sold to those that don't deserve them; not only because by this means they grow cheap, but because such Men are often by a pompous Title recommend'd to publick Employments, to the great prejudice of the Commonwealth⁷. And indeed 'tis a shame to the Men of Letters, that some should take such Liberty, as *Fabius of Bentiveglio*⁸ express'd in Jest, who, going to make a certain Person a Doctor, met by chance an Afs, that yawning with an open Mouth, look'd as if he were laughing: To whom, Why laugh you, says he, *you silly Creature? A Scholar ought not to debase his Style and Learning in writing Scandal; nor ought any Man to prostitute his Credit, by maintaining an unjust Cause, or ruining a just one by Perjury; and many more of the same Stamp.

VI. There are several Reasons why the Prices of things should rise, or fall; why one thing should be prefer'd before another of as great, or greater Use. For here the necessity of the thing, and the eminency of its Use does not always take place. Nay, we generally find the most necessary things are cheapest; because, by the peculiar Providence of God, Nature affords a greater Increase of them. "Whatsoever is necessary for Mankind, the divine Providence has contriv'd that it should not be dear, or hard to be got, as are Pearls, Gold, Silver, and other Things, which neither our Body, nor Nature requires; but as for those things we cannot safely be without, she has plentifully dispers'd them throughout the World^b." That which chiefly raises the Price, is Scarcity. Those things that are scarce, says Sextus Empiricus^c, are valued: those that grow amongst us, and are every where to be had, are quite otherwise. If Water were difficult to be met with, how much more valuable would it be than the things we most value now? Or, if Gold lay in the Streets as common as Stones, who do you think would value it, or lock it up? And therefore some have thought it a Master-piece in Trade to procure a Scarcity. As the Dutch, in many Parts of the Indies, root up the Cloves and Nutmegs to prevent too great a Plenty of those Spices. "The Egyptians do not permit their Paper-reed to grow in many Places; by which they procure a Scarcity, and consequently raise the Price, but hinder the common Use and Advantage of it, Strabo, lib. xvii. p. 799. Edit. Par. That which is scarce is valuable: Water is not valued, altho' the most useful thing in the World, Plato Euthyphemo, p. 211. C. Ed. Wech. Curious Dainties are not valued for their Taste, but for their being hard to be gotten, Mamertin. Paneg. Julian. c. xi. n. 3. Ed. Cellar. Besides, a thing is still more valuable, when 'tis not only scarce, but also comes from remote Places. Pliny^d tells us of two Boys, the one born in Asia, the other in France, who were wonderfully alike, and whom therefore the Merchant set a prodigious Rate upon, and the Purchaser look'd upon nothing in his whole Estate to be more valuable. For the Ambition of Mortals esteems those things most, which few Men have in common with them; and on the other side thinks meanly of those which are seen in the hands of every one. Nay, so perverse we often are, as to esteem a thing the more, because it is forbidden; its being forbidden whets our Curiosity. And therefore Lucian^e with Reason ridicul'd those, who in Winter load themselves with Ruffs, and are pleas'd with them when scarce and out of Season; but nauseate and despise what is in Season, and agreeable to Nature.

But generally we set a great Value upon nothing but what raises us, in some measure, above the rank and Condition of others; and for this Reason Honours particularly are more valuable for being scarce. "The Rewards of Virtue ought to be chaste and sacred, not to be communicated to wicked or mean Persons; for things that are scarce and difficult, are recommended to Men by the Rewards that attend them^f." Tho' indeed it proceeds from the Corruption and Pravity of human Nature, that we value real Goods more or less, according as few or many possess them in common with us. For my Goods are never the worse, because others possess the like; nor the better, because others want them. Thus my Health is not the less valuable to me, because others also enjoy theirs; nor the more, because others are sick. Nor is my Knowledge less worth, because others are knowing too; nor would the Value of my Wisdom rise, should other People prove Fools. He therefore that prides himself in seeing others want the good things which he is Master of, seems indeed to take pleasure in other Mens Misfortunes: And, on the other side, he that thinks his own Goods the worse, because others possess them in common with him, seems to be moved with Envy^g.

But indeed, as in many things, so in this, the general Course of Mens Lives deviates from right Reason. Hence it is, that the Luxury of Man has set most unreasonable Rates upon many things, which human Nature could easily be without: Which some think were contrived on purpose, that there might be some Use in vast prodigious Riches.

Consol. ad Hely. c. xi. Janus Nicius Erithraus ³ tells us of Tulips, that thirty Years ago (when he writ this) they lay upon the Top of the Alps, without any Care or Notice taken of them: Yet, when they were brought to Town, the People fond of them for their Rarity, set such a Price upon them, as that every Root fold for above a hundred Crowns. But after they had increased and grew common, their Price sunk so low, that hardly any thing was cheaper. As our Desires are, so are our Esteem of things; and there's no End of raising the Prices of things, unless we first set Bounds to our Extravagancies, Cicero in Verrem, l. iv. c. 7. China and Earthen Wares are the dearer for being brittle: For 'tis an Argument of Riches, and a glorious piece of Extravagancy to have a thing that shall immediately be wholly destroyed, Plin. l. xxxiii. The Brittleness makes Crystal the dearer: For among unskilful People the Danger, which ought to sink the Price, raises it, Sen. is so whimsical and silly, as to think those happy who possess Superfluities, rather than those who abound in all the Necessaries and Conveniencies of Life. And therefore it ought to be rank'd among the senseless Opinions of the commo. People to value things either for their being new, or scarce, or hard to be gotten, or brought from far, unless their Goodness also and their Usefulness recommend 'em. Charron de la Sageſſe, l. i. c. 39. num. 11. and l. ii. c. 9. num. 2. Agatharchis de mari rubro, c. xlix. speaking of the Alitai and Cassandini, whose Country abounded in Gold, says, They barter'd Gold for a triple quantity of Brass, but gave double for Iron. For they proportion'd their Rates according to the Plenty or Scarcity of the Commodities, in which we have not so much Regard to the Nature of the Thing, as the Necessity of its Use. But those things that are of daily Use, and especially such as relate to Provision, Apparel, and Arms, rise in their Price, when they become necessary as well as scarce; as in a Dearth of Corn, or in a Siege, or in slow Voyage, where Hunger and Thirst are craving to be satisfied, and Life must be preserv'd upon any Terms. Plin. Nat. Hist. l. viii. c. 57. Quinctil. Declam. xii. p. 176. Ed. Lugd. Bat. In a very great scarcity any thing that can be bought is cheap. When Hannibal besieged Capsicum, a Mouse was sold for two hundred Pieces of Gold; and he that sold it died of Hunger, whereas he that bought it was preserv'd. The Prices of artificial things, besides the Scarcity of them, are much raised by the ³ Neatness of the Art. "In which L. Mummius was so ignorant, that when he had taken Corinth, and thereby got possession of the Statues and Pictures drawn by the ablest Masters, he proclaimed to those whom he had hired to transport them into Italy, that if they lost them, they should find him new ones, Ull. Par. l. i. c. 13. The Reputation of the Artificer adds Credit to some, and others are the more valuable for the Character of their former Possessor. As Lucian ^b mentions one, who had bought Epictetus's earthen Lamp at three hundred Denarii, hoping, no doubt, to get Epictetus's Wisdom, by studying by that Light. Thus the City Cusco in Peru was in so great Request, that even the Seed that grew near it, tho' really no better than any other, was yet of more Value than that which grew elsewhere ^c; In short, the Difficulty, the Elegancy, the Usefulness, and Necessity of the Work, the Scarcity of Workmen, their being ^d Masters in the Art, their not being under a Necessity of Working, all contribute to the raising of the Price. That sort of Work is most artificial, which depends least upon

In these Things the Value of them is according to Mens Desires. 'Tis hard to set Bounds to the Price 'till you have limited your Desires after them. Cicero in Verrem. lib. iv. chap. 7.

² Hence it was, that by the Roman Law an Eunuch-slave, which was above ten Years old, and understood some Art, was valued at more than a Slave that pretended to Physick. See Cod. lib. vi. tit. 43. Commun. de Leg. 1. & l. 3. princip. and Mr. Thomassin's Discourse, De Pretio Affectionis, Sec. chap. ii. §. 15.

Fortune; that the most sordid, which most defiles the Body; that the most servile, which is of most Labour to the Body; that the most ignoble, which requires the least Virtue, Arist. Polit. l. i. c. 7. (11.) And again, That Exercise, Art, or Discipline is to be reputed mean, that renders either the Body or the Soul unfit for the Practice of Virtue, Polit. l. viii. c. 2. (4) As for the more noble Arts, some are more worth than they cost: you purchase of a Physician Life and Health, Things invaluable; of a learned Tutor the liberal Sciences, and the Adornment of the Mind: And therefore, in such Cases, we do not pay for things they teach us, but for their Labour, Sen. De Ben. l. vi. c. 15.

VII. But sometimes it happens, that some certain things are valued at an high Rate by some particular People only, which may be call'd The Price of Fantasy. It was a Saying of a certain Arabian, Whatssoever is dear, altho' it be dear, yet if I have a Fantasy for it, it is not dear; nor can any thing that pleases be said to cost too much, Leo Afric. l. iii. All Gifts are valued, as they are acceptable to the Receiver, Liban. Declam. xli. p. 870. D. Edit. Paris. And this, where Animals are the Object, proceeds from a sort of Acquaintance with them¹; or, because they know how to suit themselves with our Humour; or because we have escaped some imminent Danger by their Assistance; or perhaps they are the Remembrancers of some signal Event. Besides, some things are recommended by the Friend that gives them, so that we would not part with them for several others of the same Goodness.

Many also put a Value on things, because some great Man, whom they are willing to compliment, has express'd an Esteem for them. Thus, this or that Provision or Apparel rises in its Price, when the King is pleas'd to be taken with it. But here some observe, that the Fancy of the Buyer ought not to raise the Price of the Commodity, unless some other Causes concur. The² Roman Laws make no allowance for the Fancy of the Party in the Restitution of Damage done by Chance³: And yet Merchants frequently raise the Price, when they see the Buyer fond of the Commodity. Dionorus Siculus^b observes what an advantage the Italian Factors made of the Drunkenness of the Gauls: They brought them Wine, and sold it at most unconscionable Rates; for they had a Boy for a Hoghead, and so exchange'd their Wine for a Butler.

However the Affection of the Seller may fairly raise the Price, if so be he signifies it to the Buyer; for to part with a beloved thing, for the sake of the Buyer, deserves some Consideration^c. Lastly, The Price of things is somerimes enhanced by some vitious Habit of Mind, as Vain-glory, Cruelty, and the like^d.

VIII. And these always raise the Prices of things, as their Contraries always lower them. But, in order to regulate the Prices of particular things, pro hic & nunc, and to reduce them to a just Standard, we must remember, that in the state of Nature every one has Power to put what Price he pleases upon his own Goods, as being, in that state, the sole and supreme Matter of them. For, in this Case, should another prize my Goods, it would still be in my Power to accept or reject it; and thus I should, in the end, put the Price upon them my self: and tho' I lay never so extravagant a Rate upon them, no Man can have any Cause to complain; for no one ought to be concern'd how much I magnify my Riches in my own Fantasy; and they who think the Price too great, may let it alone. And therefore, if any one has a mind to my Goods, 'tis fit I should put what Price upon them I please; as, on the other side, should I force my Commodity upon another, I must take what the Buyer, who is indifferent, will be pleas'd to give me. Indeed, if any one thro' ill Nature, or Hatred, or Envy, refuses a Man in want, either to sell at all, or at least sells upon hard¹ unreasonable terms, then, and only then there is Cause to complain. From whence it follows, that in a state of Nature, the ² The Words are, Si servum ricum occidisti, non affectum nec astimandus esse putas (velati si filium suum naturalem quis occiderit, quem tu magno captum velles) sed quanti omnibus valeret. Sextus quoque Pedius ait, Pretia rerum non ex affectione, nec utilitate singulorum, sed communiter fungi. Digest. lib. ix. tit. 2. Ad Leg. Aquil. leg. 35. See also lib. xxxv. tit. 2. Ad Leg. Falcid. leg. 62, 63. and Mr. Thomassius's Discourse De Pretii Affectione, &c. c. iii. §. 12, 13.

³ Mr. Thomassius, in his Jurisprud. Divin. l. ii. c. 11. §. 13. distinguishes between a thing of the same kind, and a thing which is capable of an Equivalent; for only the first can be valued as high as we please. As for the other, if in a Loan, or Exchange, for Example, one pretends to value his Wine or Corn at a higher Rate, altho' in reality they are of the same Nature and Goodness as that of the other Bargainer, Mr. Thomassius says, "That he offends against the natural Equality of Men, which doth not allow us to weigh our own and other Mens Goods in an uneven Balance, and judge differently of them, or of what appertains to them, without a just Cause." We may also add, That the Nature of Commerce, by which Prices are settled, requires Equality; for there is a visible Inequality, when things of the same Kind and Goodness are estimated at a different Rate: Whereas, when we are treating about Things of a different Nature, besides that they can't be so exactly equalled, the Esteem which the Proprietor hath for it may be respected in the Valuation as a part of the Price, and to reduce the Exchange to a just Equality.

Price of every thing is to be determined by the Agreement of the Contractors ; nor can any one be said to have offended against the Law of Commerce for making the best of his Market, provided he has not been inhuman towards the necessitous ^a.

But in a regular Government the Prices of things are determined, either by an Order from the Magistrate, or some Laws, or else by the common Judgment and Estimate of Men, together with the Consent of the Parties : The former may be call'd the legal, the other the natural Price ^b. The legal is always presu'd to be consonant to Justice and Equity, unless the contrary does evidently appear : for sometimes gross Ignorance, and more frequently Hatred or Favour towards the Buyer or Seller, or some other Corruption, or private Interest, interposes. The legal Price is fix'd, as it were, in a Point, and admits of no Latitude, but the least Excess becomes Injustice. And when 'tis fix'd (as most commonly it is) in Favour of the Buyer, the Seller cannot in Justice demand more ; but the Buyer may, with the Consent of the Seller, sink below it, provided he does not fall short of the lowest Degree in the natural Price : and the Seller may lawfully take less, provided it does not tend to the Prejudice of others of the same Trade. But if the Price be fix'd in Favour of the Seller, then the Buyer cannot lawfully press the Seller to take less, who yet, if he thinks fit, may take it ² ; for any Man may recede from his own Right : However, in this Case, the Seller may take more, provided it does not exceed the ³ highest Degree in the natural Price. On Labour, the Price is generally fix'd in Favour of the Labourer ; on Commodities, in Favour of the Buyer. In some Places, a more subtil Method is taken to prevent unreasonable Prices ; as in Greece, the Fishmongers were not permitted to sit, but obliged to sell their Fish standing, that so, by the tediousness and tiresomeness of the Posture, they might be forced to sell them while they were sweet, and at a moderate Rate.

IX. But the natural Price, which is not fix'd by Law ^c, admits of some Latitude, within which more or less may be demanded and given. Of this Price Seneca is to be understood, when he says, ² What matters how much it is, since the Buyer and Seller agree upon it ? The Value of things is according to the Market ; when you have commended them, they are worth so much as they can sell for, and no more. De Benef. lib. vi. c. 15. And Law 63. of Book xxv. 1, 2. of the Digest. ad L. F. d. The Prices of things are not fix'd according to the Fancy, or Use of particular People, but as they are valuable to every body. See also Law 33. of Book ix. r. 2. of the Digest. ad L. Aquilia. In some Places (says Aristotle. Nicom. ix. 1. towards the End) the Latins are so Averse to voluntary Commerce : thinking it reasonable that the Creditor should entirely depend upon the Honesty of the Debtor : For they thought the Debtor fitter to judge how much ought to be paid, than the other. For many things are differently rated by those that are in Possession, and those that desire to be in Possession of them ; every one setting a great Rate upon his own. But a Return ought to be made according to the Opinion of him that is to make it, which perhaps ought to be adjusted, not according to the Value he puts upon the things, when in Possession of them, but according to the Value he put upon them before he had them ^c. By reason of this Latitude they generally divide the natural Price into three Degrees ; the lowest or favourable, the middle or reasonable, the highest or rigorous : within which Degrees any thing may be bought or sold dearer, or cheaper. But of what Extent this Latitude may be, it is not easy to give a Rule that will reach all Cases : But that may be said to be the just Price, which is generally agreed upon by those who sufficiently understand the Market and the Commodities. Hither may be referred that of *Varro de Ling. Lat. lib. iv. * Pretium est, quod aestimatis emptionisque causis constituitur : dictum a peritis, quod si soli possunt facere recte id.* Yet Salmasius, De Usuris, ridicules this Derivation, and that with Reason.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on §. VIII, IX.

² It is not always allowed to give a Price lower than what is set by the Law ; and 'tis taken place chiefly when the Taxation is fixed, not for the Interest of private Persons only, but for the publick Good, and as a sumptuary Law. Nor may we always content ourselves with less ; which ought principally to be observed, when the Magistrate, by fixing a Price, endeavours to hinder Monopolies, or to encourage Merchandise and Commerce in general, as Mr. Thomasius has very well observed in his Jurisp. Dico. ubi supra, §. 56, 57.

³ He treats here of the Value of a Damage, and not of what may be given or required in Buying and Selling, or making any other Contract. See the Discourse quoted c. ii. §. 31.

* A Price, in Latin Pretium, is that which is appointed upon the Account of the Value and Buying of a thing ; 'tis so called from Peritis, i. e. such as are skilful, because they only are able to fix it.

X. In regulating this natural Price, Regard is to be had to the Labour and Expence^a of the Merchant, in importing and taking Care of his Goods; for upon this ground it is that a Merchant can justify his selling so much dearer than he bought: But this Regard is only to be had to those Expences which they are usually put to; extraordinary Chances have nothing to do here. And therefore it can be no reason for a Merchant to raise his Rates, because he happen'd to break his Leg, or to fall sick, or because part of his Goods were cast away, or stolen; unless such Accidents contribute to the Scarcity of the Commodity; much less can he bring in his own extravagant and superfluous Expences. But his Time, his Study, his Care, in getting, preserving, and sorting his Commodities, as also his Servants Wages, may fairly be rated by him. And it would be inhuman, and tend to the Discouragement of Industry, to allow a Tradesman, or a Man of any other Calling, no more Gain than just enough to supply him poorly and sparingly with the Necessities of Life. The Difficulty also, and Length and Danger of the Voyage, may be brought into the Account, as also the different Value of Monies and Commodities in different Countries. Besides, the way of Sale may alter the Case; for they who sell by Retail may demand somewhat more than those who sell by Wholesale; their Trouble being greater, and it being more advantageous to have a good round Sum paid down at once, than to receive the same by little and little. But what sudden and frequent Alterations the Markets admit of by reason of the Plenty or Scarcity of Buyers, Money, or Commodities, is well known. For the Scarcity of Money and Buyers proceeding from some particular Cause, meeting with a Glut of Commodities, sinks the Price^b. As, on the other side, the Plenty of Buyers and Money, or the Scarcity of the Commodity, raises it^c. Besides, it helps to lower the Price, when the Seller forces his Commodities upon us of his own Accord, as if they lay upon his Hands^d, for that proceeds from a Scarcity of Buyers; and besides, in this Case, the Purchaser has often no Occasion for the thing, nor would buy it, but that he thinks it a good Bargain: And indeed, in such a Case we often buy, not so much for our own, as for the Seller's sake. And therefore, when things are sold by Auction, or Inch of Candle, they often go off for less than otherwise they would sell for; it being the Condition of that sort of Sale, that the Ware should go to the highest Bidder: And yet, sometimes, the Warmth and Emulation of the Company rises above the ordinary Price; which is indeed, at all times, rais'd by the Plenty of the Buyers. Again, the Seller ought to have Allowance made him for the Loss ensuing, or the Gain he foregoes, by selling at that time when the Buyer is importunate: For it would be unreasonable to expect me to part with my Goods, but upon such Terms as to be no Loser by them. Besides, the Loss or Gain, by reason of slow or prompt Payment, may be, and indeed always is, brought into the Account: For + a Day is part of the Price; which is more if paid down upon the Nail, than if paid some time after; for in the mean time I might perhaps turn and apply it another way to my Advantage^e. And therefore^f Polybius commends the Generosity of the younger Sipio, for paying his Sisters their Portions forthwith, which he was not obliged to do 'till two or three Years after, and that too at Rome, a City where no Man gives away any thing at all, or pays a Penny before it be due; so diligent is every Body in getting Money, and so much Advantage do they make of the Time.

^g Lastly, We may add what Themistocles, when he was going to sell his Farm, gave a publick Advertisement of^h, That he had a good Neighbour. A House, says Sallust, that has got such a Neighbour as you (speaking to a rascally Jew) may possibly sell for ten Drachmæ of bad Money; but there is hopes, that when you are gone, it may be worth an hundred. A good Neighbour therefore raises the Price of a Farm; especially in a Country where the good old way of the Spartans obtainsⁱ, who made free with their Neighbours Servants, Dogs, and Horses, as if they were their own: And when a Man wanted any thing that his Neighbour was Master of, he need but to open his Store-house, and to furnish himself from thence with what he had occasion for. The Cause of raising the Price of Slaves, in Justin, was very unusual, and not a little owing to Cruelty: The Price of the Theban Captives was rais'd, says he, not for their being serviceable to the Buyer, but out of Hatred to the Enemy^j.

XI. But, when most Nations had degenerated from their primitive Simplicity, 'tis easy to imagine that this proper Price could not suffice for the Dispatch of Business and Commerce, which daily increased: For Commerce consisted in Bartering only; and Work was paid in Work, or else in Commodities. But after our Luxury had increased our Necessities, and we, not content with the Produce of our own Soil, had a mind to the Delicacies of other Nations, it was hard for any one to possess such Goods, for which any other would be

¹ I have added this Period taken out of our Author's Abridgment De Officiis II in & Civ. B. l. i. c. 14. f. 6. where 'tis said, a high Price is set upon a thing, when 'tis sold only to please one importunate to have it, and without which Intreaty it would not have been sold. Any one may see that this ought not to have been omitted.

⁵ In all this Paragraph the Author treats only of the outward Circumstances, which help to raise or lessen the Price of things. But we ought always to suppose that the natural and internal Qualities of the things themselves do very much alter the Value, because these intrinsic Qualities or Circumstances increase or lessen the Benefit we may have by it. To this the Example of Themistocles, alludg'd by this Author, is to be referred, &c.

ney to have it new coined ; and, when he had coin'd it, he order'd every Piece to go for double ; and so gain'd half of the Money, without doing Wrong to his People. Indeed, such a thing as this may admit of some Excuse, in case of Necessity, if remedied when that is over. But what Zonaras and others tell of Nac. Phraas, cannot be palliated : For he having coin'd a Quantity of light Money, besides the weighty that was current, would receive none but the weighty into his Treasury, but made all his Payments in the light ^a. Some Legislators indeed have taken this Course, to extirpate Covetousness, Luxury, and such Vices, by introducing base Money. Lycurgus ord' d down all the Gold and Silver of Sparta, and allowed nothing to pass but Iron, having assign'd a small Price to a just Weight and Bulk of it ; so that 10 l. would take up a large Room, and require a Team of Oxen to bring it home. By this Means he utterly rooted out several sorts of Villany. For who would steal, or cheat, or receive a Bribe which could not be concealed, and which no Man was the better for having in his Possession, since it could not be apply'd to any other Use ? For, they say, he made all the Iron red hot, and quenched it in Vinegar, which, by that means, became brittle, and good for nothing. By the same Methods were all idle superfluous Arts rooted out, when nothing could be got by them : For the Iron Money not passing in Greece, none of the foreign Delicacies could be imported from thence into Sparta, which cut the very Nerves and Sinews of Luxury. Lysander ^c brought back Gold and Silver into Sparta, and with them Avarice. Indeed, among other Nations too, Covetousness crept in with the Use of Money. For as long as their Riches consisted in Corn, Cattle, and such like, the Cumberfomeness of their Goods, together with the Difficulty of managing and preserving that which was so liable to Corruption, was sure at length to put a stop to their boundless Desire of increasing their Store. But now, since the Use of Gold and Silver has been found out, a covetous Man may embrace his Millions. Plato ^d in his Commonwealth, to take off his Subjects from too great a Thirst after Lucre, commanded, That no private Man should have any Gold or Silver : That the Money which the Subjects make use of, should be such as passes no where else. But yet that the Publick should have in Possession some of the current Money of Greece, in case they should have an Occasion of waging War, of Travelling, or of sending an Embassy : That Travellers, at their Return home, should pay into the Publick all the foreign Money they bring with them, and receive that of their own Country for it. The Great Cham at Cambala put his royal Stamp upon a vast Sum of Money made of the Bark of Mulberry-Trees, which no Man in his Dominions, upon pain of Death, dared to refuse, or to coin and use other ^e. The Foreigners too, who traded into those Parts for the Gold, Silver, and the Jewels which they imported, were forced to take that Money, which they converted into the Commodities of the Country, and so exported again. By which means that Prince heaped up a prodigious Quantity of Gold and Silver. The Persians call the Leather-Money, which an unjust King had imposed upon them, Shaherun, i. e. Money imposed on the Subject at the Pleasure of the Prince. The Memory of which has made such an Impression upon them, that when they would denote the Injustice of any King, they express it by saying, He imposes Leather-Money upon his People ^f. On the other hand, the Care that the Roman Senate took of their Subjects is much to be commended : For when the small Money had been debas'd, and a vast Quantity of it crept in among them, that Calamity not being removeable any other way, the Senate made a Decree, That whosoever within such a time should bring in their bad Money, should have it exchang'd for good. Upon which account, above five hundred thousand Crowns were disburs'd out of the Treasury ^g.

XV. But since Money is the common Measure of the Value of other things, its Value ought by no means to be altered, but where the Interest of the Publick does evidently require it. And then too, ^h the more moderate the Alteration is, the less will the Peoples Accounts be confounded. And therefore such a sort of Matter was chosen for the carrying on of Commerce, the publick and unalterable Value of which, constantly applied to the same Quantity, might be able to relieve and supply all the Inconveniences that were found in simple Barter ⁱ. But yet, as to the unchangeable Value of the Money, we must observe what Grotius ^j asserts, That the Currency of Money is not naturally derived from the Matter only, nor yet from this or that particular Form and Denomination ; but from its Capacity of being compar'd with all other things, or at least all those that are most necessary. The Meaning of which Place is, that it does not proceed from ^k the Matter ^l of the Money only, e. g. its being Gold or Silver, that a certain Piece goes pro hic & nunc, for so much, and is equivalent to such a Commodity (for the Currency of Money does not only depend upon one Piece's being equivalent to another of the same Quantity and Quality, for all consumable Commodities are such) but upon its containing virtually the Prices of any thing else ; nor from any particular Denomination, as that it is call'd a Ducat, Crown, Dollar, or Florin ; nor from its having such a certain Stamp⁴ ; but from its Capacity of being compared, in respect of Plenty or Scarcity, with other things, especially those that afford the more necessary Supports of human Life. Now Land does this ; for from it, mediately or immediately, proceed most things that human Life subsists on. And the Product of it being one Year with another pretty equal, it may be presum'd to have its natural Value fix'd and certain, to which the Prices of other things, at least of such as have not received their Value from the Luxury or Folly of Man, are refer'd, as to a Standard. For 'tis very reasonable, that the Prices of such things as are the Product of Land, or are maintain'd by it, should be regulated by the Price of the Land itself. Since therefore the Land every where is in private Hands (most Mens Estates being now in Land) the Value of Money must needs rise or fall, according as it is scarce or plentiful, in proportion to Land. For every civiliz'd Nation consisting chiefly of two sorts of Men, the Farmer, and the Tradesman or Labourer, if, in a great Plenty of Money, Land and its Product should sell cheap, it must needs break the Farmer ; and on the other hand should Money be scarce, and Land and its Product dear, it must needs beggar the Tradesman. Which in Fact we find true ; for when a plentiful Harvest makes Corn cheap, if the Work of the Tradesman, and those that earn their Living by their Labour, stand at the same rate as in fruitful Years, the Farmer is found to get little by his plentiful Crop. And the same Inconvenience presses the Tradesman and Labourer when Corn is dear, if still their Labour keeps its old Price. Since therefore, in indifferent Years, the Commerce between the Labourer and the Farmer is best adjust'd, and there is then least Complaint between them ; it is evident, that in fixing the Price of Money the greatest Regard ought to be had to Land, especially where the Country does not subsist upon Merchandise only, but chiefly upon its own Produce.

² This is not the Sense of Grotius; but this great Man mean, as Grotius explains him, and as will appear easily by attending to his Words, and the Sequel of his Discourse, That if Money be capable of an Equivalent, it may only be so because we may give Dollars, for Example, for Pittoles, or Pieces of fifteen or thirty Shillings for Dollars, but because we may give Money for Corn, Wine, &c. for, says he, we must pay, unless we have otherwise agreed, for Things as much as they are worth at the Time and Place of Payment. Quæ æstimatio, si alia non conveniat, justiora erit temporis & loci pretium. The another thing to say, that if we must have regard in exchange to the intrinsic or extrinsic Value of the Species, it happens at the Beginning of the Debt: This Question shall be handied a little lower, ch. vii. §. 6, 7. The Author does not speak here, at least directly, of the Value of Money, with respect to the Rareness or Abundance of other things. He speaks only of it in that part of the End of the Paragraph, when he explains the Words of Michael of Ephesus, a Commentator on Leviticus.

XVI. From what has been said, we may judge, whether a Farm, that was rated at a hundred Pounds two hundred Years ago, ought not, ceteris paribus, to be rated more now ; and whether the Wages, that were large enough then, are not in all Reason a little too scanty now. For it will not suffice to say, that the Pieces of Money have the same Weight, Goodness, Name, and Shape, which they had formerly ; but we must consider, that within this two hundred Years such a vast quantity of Gold and Silver has been imported into Europe from America and the Indies, not to mention the many Silver Mines of Europe itself, that the Value of Money has, by degrees, sunk very much ;

inasmuch that (as Bodin^b observes) Commodities bear ten times the Price they did formerly¹, by reason of the Plenty of Gold and Silver. And therefore the old Price of Land and Wages ought to rise, ceteris paribus, in the same Proportion². For suppose Commerce to be carried on by pure Barter in any Country which affords very little Wine, but Abundance of Corn ; here, for a small Parcel of Wine, we shall receive a great deal of Corn ; but if, by good Management, the Vineyards should happen to produce a larger Vintage, without doubt, for the same Quantity of Corn, we must give a greater Proportion of Wine than formerly. In like manner, when Money is scarce in Comparison of other things, a great many things will be purchas'd with a little Money ; but Money, on the other hand, increasing, more of it must be given for the same things. For since the Metal, as to its natural Price, may be, and often is brought into Commerce as well as other Commodities, its Value must rise and fall according to the Scarcity or Plenty of it. And the eminent Price of Money must necessarily follow the natural Price of the Metal : For it is unreasonable, that a Quantity of Silver, consider'd as a Commodity, should bear a very different Price from what it does when consider'd as Money. For so the same thing, consider'd as its own Measure, would be greater or less than itself, consider'd as the thing measured. And this is the Reason why, when the Prices of almost every thing else have been altered by reason of the Plenty of Money, Gold and Silver have still kept their old Price, an Ounce of Silver being worth a Crown now, as well as formerly. For if the Price of Bullion, like the Prices of other things, had been v. g. quadrupled, an Ounce of Silver now would cost four Crowns, so that little would be got by coining Money.

When therefore the Price of a thing happens to be changed, we must carefully distinguish, whether that Change be made in the Value of the thing, or in the Value of Money. The former happens, when the Plenty of Money standing as it was, the Commodity begins to be more plentiful, or scarce, than usual ; the latter, when the Commodity remaining as usual, the Plenty of Money has increas'd, or decreas'd. Thus, when in a plentiful Season I can buy a Bushel of Wheat for one Crown, which in a Dearth I cannot have under three ; the Reason is, because the Value of Wheat, and not of Money is changed ; but when a Farm now lets for two hundred Pounds, which an Age ago let but for an hundred ; the Value, not of the Farm, but of the Money, is altered³. But altho' Money admits of vast Changes, and a common Measure ought to be fixed and unalterable, Money nevertheless is capable of being made a common Measure. For this Change in Money is never

Of Contracts in general, that presuppose the Price of Things.

- I. The Difference between Bargains and Contracts, according to Mr. Hobbes.
- II. According to the Interpreters of the Roman Law.
- III. Some Advice about what they have delivered.
- IV. Our Opinion about the Difference.
- V. Contracts are divided into such as oblige; 1. One Party only; and 2. Such as oblige both Parties.

- VI. And into real, of bare Consent, verbal, and in Writing.
- VII. In some particular Name, and without a Name.
- VIII. Beneficial and chargeable.
- IX. How many sorts of chargeable Contracts.
- X. Of mix'd Contracts.

WE come now to treat of such Contracts as presuppose Property and Price. And first, We will enquire into the Difference between simple Pacts, and Contracts. Hobbes^a defines a Contract to be the Action of two, or more, making over their Right to one another. But since in every Contract either both Parties perform their Bargain upon the Spot, so as neither trusts the other; or one performs, and the other is trusted; or neither performs, but each trusts the other: To the first of these only he gives the general Name of Contract. The other two sorts, where either one or both Parties are trusted, he calls Pacts. But this Difference does not concern the intrinsic Nature of Contracts and Pacts, but regards the Execution of them only: And 'tis against common Sense, that a Sale, v. g. where the Goods are deliver'd for ready Money, should be call'd only a Pact.

II. The Roman Lawyers almost all agree in making Pact the general Term which comprehends all the Affairs, wherein Men are concern'd with one another, and they define it in general to be¹, The Agreement of two or more in the same thing. Then they divide Pact into Pact properly so call'd, and Contract: The former is, when the Object is some Matter of no Consequence, and, in its own Nature, incapable of bearing an Action in the civil Court. This they again divide into simple Pact, and not simple; which latter they again subdivide into legal and additional. They say farther, That an Agreement may become more than a simple Pact, either by its own intrinsic Nature, or by the external Confirmation of the Law; for it is that that properly renders Agreements legal Pacts. Moreover, they tell us, that this intrinsic Nature may be of two sorts, for some do not retain the general Name of Agreements, but are call'd by some particular Name of Contract; others, altho' of no particular Denomination or Form, yet exceed the Limits of simple Pact, by having a Matter of Consequence for the Object of them, as the Performance of a Promise, the Delivery of Goods, or

Hands, or comb their Head, or change their Linen for such a time (as some Slovens have done) what need would there be to trouble a Magistrate upon the Breach of such Agreements? Which indeed are scarce allowable by the Law of Nature.

IV. In my Opinion, the Difference between Pact and Contract may be best taken from the Object, so as to call that Contract, which concerns those Things and Actions that are the Subject of Traffick, and so presuppose Property and Price; and that Pact, by which we covenant about other things. By this means Pacts, strictly speaking, will take in all negative Agreements, by which we covenant not to do, or not to demand, what otherwise we might do or demand: As also those Agreements that have for their Object the Exercise of our natural Faculties, so far as they barely tend to the promoting mutual Profit and Advantage, consider'd merely by themselves, without any regard to Price, or any valuable Consideration; in a Word, when we agree to do some Work that is not mercenary: Tho' some Agreements there are, which not being conversant about things, may indifferently be called either Pacts, or Contracts, as that of Matrimony.

V. All Contracts may be divided into three Sorts, First, Those that lay an Obligation upon one Party * only, which Condition cannot be † changed by any thing ex post facto; as in the Loan of a consumable Commodity, and ‡ Stipulation. Secondly, Those that equally oblige both Parties †, as in buying and selling, letting and renting, Partnership, &c. Thirdly, Those of a middle Nature, as the Loan of a thing not consumable, a Trust, a Pledge, &c. which naturally, as appears from the principal End of the Contract, oblige me only that am the Receiver; nor can they originally affect the Giver. But Accidents may fall out so as to lay an Obligation upon him also; as if I should be at necessary Expences for the thing, or suffer Damage by it, for which the Owner ought to be answerable. In this Case the Expences are to be repair'd, and the Damage made good.

VI. Again, the Roman Lawyers frequently divide Contract ¹ ⁴ into real, consensual, literal, and verbal. The real is so call'd, not because it is conversant about some real thing, for all Contracts are so; but because ² a Pre-delivery of some real Commodity is necessary to intitle us to a Demand of that, which gives this Contract its Denomination ^b. Thus I must have received something of my Creditor, before I can stand oblig'd as a Debtor ^c: Nor can a Trust, or Loan be demanded, before it has been deliver'd to me. But, by the way, the Contract of lending is one thing; a Pact, or Promise to lend, another. A Trust, one thing; a Promise to take in Charge, another.

Consensual are so call'd ³ ^d (not because they alone require the Parties Consent) but because they immediately oblige, upon each Party's declaring his Consent, by proper Signs. Nor is it necessary, that one thing should be first delivered, or some Work first done.

A verbal Contract, or Stipulation, ⁴ ^e as it consists in usual Forms of asking and answering Questions, is unknown to the Law of Nature.

Nor is it more agreeable to that Law, that a Man who has not received a thing, should be ob-

Vinnius upon the Institutes, lib. iii. t. 14. §. 2. 'Tis in this Sense, almost, that the Word Causa ought to be taken, when we speak of a person's Action, for a thing given, and the Cause follows not: Constitutio causa data, causâ non secuta. In fine, 'tis certain, that in the Roman Law, when we say, for Example, that we ought to restore the Goods of another, with the Fruits and Revenues that the Proprietor hath received from them, we make use of the Word Causa: Nec enim sufficit, corpus ipsum restitui, sed opus est, ut & causa rei restituatur, Digest. l. vi. t. 1. De Rei vindicatione, l. 20. And so we must understand it in t. 1. l. 22. De usuris, & fructibus, & causis, &c.

² Every Man is at liberty to distinguish and range his Notions, as he thinks good. But, in truth, there is no Difference in the main between Contracts and simple Agreements, according to the Law of Nature alone.

⁹ Such are the Contracts of Selling, Hiring, Society, and Commission. Consensu sunt obligationes in emptionibus, venditionibus, conductionibus, societatibus, mandatis. Ideo autem istis modis obligatio dicitur consensu contrahi, quia neque scriptura, neque præsentia omnimodo opus est. At nec dari quicquam necesse est, ut substantiam capiat obligatus, sed sufficit esse, qui negotia gerens, consentire. Institut. l. iii. t. 23. De Obligationibus ex consensu.

¹⁰ See Note 3. upon the §. foregoing.

liged by bare Writings⁵ as much as if he had. But yet, there is good Reason why this should obtain in the Roman Law: For since the Magistrate cannot be satisfied of the Truth of a Debt, but by Instruments and other Proofs, when Writings appear owning the Debt, he must presume upon it, till the contrary be prov'd. Indeed there are no Contracts, but what may be express'd in Writing; and this may be done two ways: For either the Contract may be made, and the Consent of the Parties declared in Writing; and, in this case, the Contract is then finished, when the Writings are in all respects perfected; which obtains chiefly in consensual, and such sort of Contracts: or else the Writing is only an Evidence of a Contract already finished. Which last is to be presumed, if the case be doubtful^b.

VII. Again, Contracts are divided into named and nameless. The former sort are those, which by reason of their daily Use have a particular proper Name assigned them, expressive of the Form and Contents of the Business; and which being mentioned, immediately signifies what was done (for altho' Bartering, which is reckoned amongst the nameless Contracts, seems to have a Name, yet 'tis a general one, and does not express, whether it be the Contract of Goods for Goods, Buying, Selling, or any other.) And therefore in the Roman Law these had certain fixed Forms of proceeding; whereas others of less frequent Use, containing no more than what was expressly mentioned, had no proper Form of their own, but one accommodated to the Thing; and therefore an Action, upon Account of these was always express'd in a certain Form of Words^c.

VIII. The Division of Contracts into gainful and chargeable makes most for our Purpose, whereof the first brings some Advantage to one Party gratis, as in the Case of a Loan, Commission, or Charge. The latter binds both to an equal Share of the Burthen; for here we act, or give, in order to receive an Equivalent. Upon this seems to be founded the Distinction of Contracts into those that admit of Equity, and those that are tied up to the Rigour of the Law. In the former the Magistrate has Liberty to weigh and estimate the thing, according to Equity and Conscience; in the latter he is oblig'd right or wrong³ to proceed according to the stated Forms of Law. Now Reason tells us, that chargeable Contracts are of the former sort, and admit of a more loose Interpretation in the Courts of Equity; for since the Obligation is mutual, neither Party ought to be over-burthened. But gainful Contracts belong to the latter, and do not allow of such a loose Interpretation, or that any one should be bound to do more than he has expressly declared; for else a Man's Generosity might prove too great a Burthen to him^d.

MR. BARR. NOTES ON §. VI, VII, VIII.

¹ Before Justinian, Men might, for 5 Years after the Date of a Note Obligatory, plead and maintain, that he had not received the Money or Good mentioned; but that Emperor confined it to two Years. See Instit. l. iii. t. 22. De Literarum Obligationibus. The Protestation or Declaration of not receiving, (t) which the Owner of the Note has recourse, is called Querela, or, Exceptio non operatio Pecunie; and it belongs to him, or whom it is said to be received, to prove that he did really receive it. The Reason for it was, as it is express'd in the Code, because the Denial of a Fact is not capable of a Proof. Quum inter eum, qui factum a se accepit, non habet probationem, & negationem numerationem (cujus naturalis ratio probati nulla est) & ab hoc ad Petitorem ejus rei non statim transit actio, in rem sit differentia, l. iv. t. 30. De non numerata Pecunia, leg. 10. May we not say, that 'tis managed as a Debate in the Philosophy School? And if we examine the Thing well, is it not really the Author of the Note that affirms and maintains the Falsity of the Fact, of which the other is furnished with a Proof, reputed valid, till the contrary appears? and by virtue of which this last ought to be supposed to hold to the Negative, and consequently is exempted from Proof, according to the Maxim treated on? Further, as Mr. Hartley observes, 'Tis very rare that any Man puts a Note into the Hand of him to whom it is made, before he has received the Money or Thing which is acknowledged due by it; and if he is so ill-advised, 'tis his own Fault. It may also happen that the Money may be lent without Witnesses, and so the false Debtor may thereupon think to keep the Goods of the Creditor; and so much the more, because the Space allow'd to the first to maintain that he has not received, and to oblige the other to prove it, is too long. Upon the whole, it appears, that our Author represents the Idea's and Maxims of the Roman Law very imperfectly.

² As for Example, if we give a Thing to a certain Person to sell for us, upon Condition that he shall keep to himself all that he gets above a certain Price let him. This is a Contract without Name, which yields an Action in a Form prescribed. Cum desolent vendidit, ut per aliam ad eum nomina, praescriptis verbis agendum est, in quam necesse est conficere, quotiens contractus existant, quorum appellatio non valde fore debet praestata sent. Natura enim rerum constituta est, ut plura sint negotia, quam vocabula --- Si tibi rem vendendam certi pretii desolent, ut quo pluris vendidisset, tibi haberes, placet, neque mandat, neque pro loco esse utilitatem, sed in factum, quali alia negotia, l. i. Digest. l. xix. t. 5. De praescriptis Verbis, Sec. leg. 2, 3, 4, 13. princip. Lastly, As to what concerns the Nature of Contracts without Name, see Mr. Titus on Lauterbach, Obi. 620.

⁶ This goes so far, that if we require, for Example, one Dollar more than appears to be due, we lose our Cause. Hic tu si omnia. His nummos petisti, quam tibi debitum est, consilium perdidisti, propterea, quod aliud est J. Civium, aliud Arbitrium, Cicero. Orat. pro Q. R. Cicero, c. 4. Si quis agens, intentione sua plus complexus fuerit, quam ad eum pertineat, causa valetat, i. e. Rem amittit, nec fide in integrum restituitur à Praetore, nisi minus erit viginti quinque annis, Instit. l. iv. t. 6. De Actionibus, §. 33. See Plin. l. vi. c. 1. Plin. A. l. iii. Sen. l. §. 123. Sueton. Claud. c. 14. Sueton. ep. xlviii. init. Moreover, this nice Exactness was enjoy'd, because those who had the Cognizance of Civil Affairs were commonly inferior Judges, whose Power was limited by the Praetor. See Mr. Barbeyrac's Treatise De Jurisdictione & Imperio, lib. i. c. 13.

IX. All chargeable Contracts are reducible to four Heads; First, † Goods for Goods; Secondly, * Work for Work; Thirdly, ‖ Goods for Work; Fourthly, * † Work for Goods. Where the Word Work is taken in a large Sense, so as to comprehend even the Deed of another Man. Grotius^a admits of but three, leaving out Goods for Work; for that, he thinks, falls in with Work for Goods; and indeed there is no real Difference between them, for both express that Goods and Work are barter'd for one another: But in one, the Contract in a manner begins upon the Delivery of the Goods; in the other, upon doing the Work. So that in the one the Doer seems the Author of the Contract; in the other, the Giver: For in some Contracts, tho' both sides are equally oblig'd, yet they take their Rise from one only; as in buying, the Buyer begins the Contract; in letting, the Tenant, &c.

To the first Head belong all those Contracts, where one thing is exchanged for another, as in Bartering strictly so call'd. Where we may observe a Distinction nice enough, which some make between the general Contract of Goods for Goods, and Bartering. The former is, when the things exchanged are indefinite, as an Ox for a Mule; or where, at least, one Part is so; as a Horse for this particular Ox; Oil for Corn in general. But when the Goods in Contract are determined, v. g. this Ox for this Horse, it becomes Bartering^b. Hither may be referred the giving Money for other Money of different Species, or in a different Place; which is now call'd Exchange^c. Sometimes indeed Money is given for Money, so as to make it perfectly Buying and Selling; as the Money stamp'd with Victory, which Pliny^d tells us, before it had received that Stamp^e, was accounted a Commodity. If Goods are given for Money, the Contract is call'd Buying and Selling. Sometimes the Use of a Commodity is given for a Commodity, as if I lend my Horse for a Book. Sometimes the Use of one thing for the Use of another, as if I let you live in my House, upon condition that you let me enjoy your Land. Sometimes the Use of a thing for Money, which is properly call'd Letting and Renting. Some things too we give, in order to receive as much of the same sort some time after.

Of the second Head, Work for Work, there are innumerable sorts, according to the infinite Variety of useful or pleasant Actions, which may, in a manner, be exchange'd and perform'd for one another. In Anm. Marcellinus, l. xvi. c. 15. this sort of Contract is call'd Pactum reddende vicissitudinis And in Apuleius in Apolog. *Mutuaris operas cum vicinis cambire*³.

To the third sort, Goods for Work, belong the letting-out, or hiring Work, or Day-labour for Money, as also that sort of Contract, by which Goods are secur'd and freed from Danger for Money, which is call'd Insuring. As also, when any Commodity, consumable or not consumable, is given for the Performance of any Work.

To the fourth Head, Work for Goods, belong those Contracts, by which any Work is done for any thing, or for the Use of any thing, or such like⁴. Besides, there may be Contracts not reducible to any of these Heads, as implying Disjunction⁵. Such as were the nuptial Donatives among the Muscovites, of which Sigismund Baron of Herberstein gives this Account: Those that are invited to the Wedding, present the Bride; all the Presents the Bridegroom marks, and lays up carefully; when the Wedding is over, he reviews them, and those that he likes, he sends to the Market to be priz'd; as the rest he returns back with Thanks. Those that he keeps, he makes awards for, at the End of the Year, according to the Value of them, either in Money, or something equivalent. If any one puts a greater Value upon his Gifts, the Bridegroom appeals to the sworn Appraisers, and forces him to stand to their Valuation. But if, in a Year's time, he does not make a Return, or send back the Gift, he is fined double. And if he forgets to have it valued by the sworn Appraisers, he is forced to repay it at the Value of the Giver. And this Custom the common People observe in all sorts of Donatives. The same thing is related of the Presents the Persians give liberally to Strangers⁶; for which, if they do not receive a greater Return, they not only complain, but often revoke what they had given, or the Value of it.

All these sorts of Contracts have this in common, that when they are perform'd on both sides, the Parties have no longer any thing to do with one another upon this Score. And therefore⁶ Grotius^h calls them Dimentorii, and opposes them to ² See Mr. Nood's Probabilia Juris, l. iv. c. 4. where he recites a Law of the D. P. lib. xii. t. 4. D. De conditione cuius dati, causâ non sequenti, leg. ult. which being corrected by an happy Conjecture, which he proposes, shews, for Example, that the Lawyers looked upon it as an Exchange, and not a Sale, to give foreign Money for a Slave. See also Bern. Broxon. lib. 2. Atropit. lib. i. c. 8.

⁶ Grotius's Division is into Dimentorii and Communicatorii, and not Commutatorii, as our Author has it, which he makes the two kinds of Contracts, which he calls Permutatorii. Moreover, there is another considerable Mistake in the Original: for we may observe that our Author understands Grotius's Words, Actus permutatorii aut dimentorii partes, ut commutatio non est permutatio, as if dimentorii partes signified to divide the Parties or Contractors, and cause them to have no Dealings one with another. But Grotius was too nice to use such a barbarous Expression; for if we examine his Word, we shall find his Notion to be this, that these sorts of Acts either regulate the Part that each Contractor ought to have, or make the things about which they treat common.

those Contracts which he calls Commutatorii, the Completion of which consists in having Dealings continued between the Parties, as in that of Partnership, where, for one another's Advantage, two or more join, either Work or Goods, or Work on one side, with Goods on the other. And these, together with those which we call gainful, are generally simple Contracts.

X. But some Contracts are mixt, and, as it were, compounded of two sorts: as if I designedly buy a thing for more than the Value, and so give the Overplus of the Price to the Seller; or ¹ sell a thing for less than the Value, and so give what is wanting of the Price to the Buyer: This is partly giving, partly buying and selling. Thus Cæsar sold vast Farms to Servillia for a Trifle ². If I give greater Wages than the Work is worth, it will be partly Gift, partly Hire: which great Men sometimes do out of Grandeur, thinking it for their Honour to reward any Man's Work more than it deserves; and this is partly Liberality, partly Contract ^b. And on the other side, a Man may accept of Part of his Wages, and forgive the rest ^c. If I bargain with a Goldsmith to make me Rings out of his own Gold, it will be partly buying, partly hiring ^d. Tho' some look upon it to be only buying; since in buying, we not only pay for the Materials, but for the Workmanship too. And there is little Difference whether the thing is already made, or to be made ^e. Nor can I be properly said to hire, where the Person of the Workman remains at his own Disposal ^f. When Land is let out for Rent, it is a mixt Contract of selling and hiring, tho' the Law of Zeno makes it a Species of itself. A Grant by Fee is so far a gainful Contract, as being much greater than the military Service that is due for it. Indeed, as far as this military Service may be exacted for the Protection that the Lord gives his Vassal, it partakes something of the second sort of Contract, Work for Work; yet that which is the Principal in the Contract, belongs to the third sort, Goods for Goods. But if this Fee be charged with the Incumbrance of a certain Quit-Rent, so far it partakes of Land-renting. Lastly, nautick Interest, or what we call Bottomry, which vastly exceeds all other common Usury, is mixt of borrowing and insuring. But in Partnership, tho' one contributes Money and Work, another only Money, yet it does not seem to be a mixt Contract. For it does not become mixt from the different Performances (for if I hire a Man to dig in my Vineyard, to sow my Ground, and plant my Orchard, it is all but the simple Contract of Hiring) but from our Agreements in Matters of a different Nature, by one and the same Covenant.

Grotius ¹ is of Opinion, that a Contract becomes mixt by the Accession of one Act to another, as in Suretiships and Pledges. But in this he seems not so very accurate; for a third Species must result from a Mixture properly so call'd: Whereas in Suretiship the Security is not mix'd with the principal Contract, but is only added to it, as an extrinick Confirmation. For the giving Security makes no Alteration in the Debt; but only makes Provision for the Creditor, in case the principal Debtor should prove insolvent. However, to speak more accurately, there are in Suretiship two Contracts, which seem to be but one, because the same Surety hath to do with both Creditor and Debtor; for there pass'es but a bare Promise between the Surety and the Creditor; and yet, strictly speaking; that Promise only shews that he is obliged to make good the Debt, and is not that which obliges him; for that which obliges him is the principal Contract, whereby the Surety by his Promise has brought an Obligation upon himself to supply the Failure of the Debtor: So that his Promise partakes of the Nature of the Contract itself. Now this Suretiship is no Gain to the Creditor; for he gets nothing by it, but a proper means of recovering his own. And altho' his Security is hereby provided for, yet not the Creditor, but the Debtor is beholden to the Surety; for without this Security the Creditor had never enter'd into Contract.

But when the Surety pays the Debt, then there arises an Account between him and the Debtor. For in this Case ² he is supposed to have lent the Debtor the Money, or, which is all one, to have paid it by his Order and Commission. Now this Act of Suretiship cannot be reckon'd an Act of Liberality; either in respect of the Debtor or Creditor; for the Debtor gets nothing by it, and the Creditor without it had not entred into any Engagement.

MR. BARB. NOTES on §. X.

¹ That is to say, if the Sum be inconsiderable, in comparison of the real Value of the thing, altho' it be much below the true Price. For if one gives, for Example, as much for a Dollar as is worth thirty or forty, then the Gift so much exceeds, that it swallows the Sale; and if the Disproportion be yet greater, it can't be call'd a Sale but in Jest. This was the pretended Sale practis'd among the Romans, when, whatever Price the Goods were of, which one was said to buy, he gave to the Seller, with certain Formalities, a final Price of current Money, which was call'd, Nemmo iudicare. Altho' Ulpian says in the Law quoted by Mr. Hertius, that a Sale, such as is last mentioned, is not good and valid in such Cases, as there ought to be a true Sale; whereas, when a Man sells a thing at a very low Price, the Sale is valid, and is only look'd upon as a kind of Gift at least, if it be not between such Men as are forbidden to give any thing to each other. *Si quis donationis causâ minoris vendat, venditio valet. - IX. How Inequality not foreseen is to be corrected.
- X. Whether over-reaching in Buying be lawful.

IN all ¹ Contracts that are purely chargeable, and have nothing of the gainful mixt with them, where the Law, or the Market has fix'd the Prices of things, an Equality ought to be observed; or, one Party ought to receive as much as the other; and if one happens to receive less, he has a Right to demand the rest ². And this is plain from the End of such Contracts; for therefore a Man enters into them, that for his Goods or Work he may receive an Equivalent; which, for certain Reasons, he prefers to his own Goods or Work.

But yet this admits of a more accurate Demonstration; for since Contracts are necessary for my obtaining those things which I had no Right to claim; and since it is presumed that a Man gives nothing gratis, which he parts with upon Contract: We cannot therefore think, that any one designs to give away, by Contract, more than he supposes he receives; and consequently a Contract can give a Right to another Man's Goods, no farther than as they are equivalent to something which that other Man receives ³.

II. Now to find out and adjust this Equality, it is necessary that the Parties contracting be each of them alike acquainted with the Commodity and the *Qualities of it ⁴.

† Consule de geminis, de tincta murice lana, Consule de facie corporibusque diem. Ovid. De Arte amandi, l. i. ver. 250, 251.

And therefore he that is going to make over the Property of a thing, ought to expose, not only the good Qualities, but also, to the best of his ² Knowledge, the Defects and Faults of it; for otherwise a just Price cannot be assigned ³. To this Place belongs B. xix. t. 1. l. 1. f. 1. D. De A. empt. & vend. L. xviii. t. 1. l. 43. f. 2. D. De contrab. empt. As also the whole first Title De adilit. edict. B. xix. Where the Faults are reckon'd up one by one, which ought to be told in Sale of Cattle and Slaves; and which, if concealed, makes void the Bargain: So that the Seller must either take his Goods again, which is call'd Redhibition, or abate in the Price; but the first was not observ'd, if the Fault or Ail was inconsiderable. Res bona fide vendita, propter minimam causam inempta fieri non debet, Dig. l. xviii. t. 1. De contrab. empt. l. 54. So Mr. Noodt explains this Law very well in his Observat. l. ii. c. 11. Add. Gell. l. iv. c. 2. ⁴ Cicer. Off. l. iii. c. 16. MR. BARB. NOTES on Chap. III. §. 1, II.

¹ Here is a plain Reverse of the Order; for our Author does not treat of gainful or free Contracts till the next Chapter; and so he ought to have treated of chargeable Contracts, and the Equality to be observed in them. He is guilty of the same Carelessness in his Abridgment of the Duties of a Man and Citizen, l. i. c. 5. but I easily helped that, by only changing the third and fourth Paragraph for the sixth and seventh; but since I must change two Chapter here to do it, I dare not use that Liberty, and so have thought it enough to advertise the Reader of it.

* That are of any Consequence.

¹ In Euripides's Cyclops, when Silenus came to sell Ulysses Cheese and Mill. Ulysses bid him bring it out of his Cave; because Contracts ought to be made in the open Day; Ἐμφέρτετε Φῆς γὰρ ἐμπράγματι πρῆπει. ver. 137.

† This Passage of Ovid's concerns the Prudence of the Buyer, and the Caution he ought to use, that he be not cheated, rather than any Obligation the Seller is under to discover the Faults of his Goods.

² The Roman Law requires that it be done plainly, and without any Equivocation. Dolum malum à se abesse præstare venditor debet, qui non tantum in eo est, qui fallendi causa obnoxe loquitur, sed etiam qui insidiose loquitur, alioquin asseruatur. There is also another Law to this Purpose, which treats of the Services of Inheritances; Venditor, si cum sciret debet servitutem, vel aliam rem evales ex empto alii nom; si modo cum rem emptor ignoravit. Omnia enim, quæ contra bonam fidem fiunt, evadunt inempta, vel non, sed scire venditorem & celare, sic accipimus, non solare si non admittit, sed & si negavit servitutem quam debere, cum esset et ei præstitum. About this whole Matter consult Mr. Dumoulin's Civil Laws in their natural Order, l. i. t. 2. §. 11. Part I.

³ It had better have been said, Otherwise the Buyer will not give so much. Our Author seems to suppose a Price, below which nothing is to be sold. But of this see what is said §. 9.

for it being sufficiently provided by the twelve Tables, that every Man should make good what he promises, or declares by Word of Mouth, upon Penalty of double Damages for denying it; the Civilians have set a Punishment upon Concealments too, by enacting, that if the Seller of an Estate knew any Fault or Error, without expressly acquainting the Purchaser with it, he should be obliged to make it good. Add the Example that follows in Cicero. Ambros. de Off. l. iii. c. 10. In Contracts the Faults of the Commodity ought to be expressed; which, if it be neglected, although the Goods be in the Possession of the Purchaser, yet the Bargain may be vacated by an Action of Deceit. (Although what he there says of an Action of Deceit does not rightly agree with the Roman Laws.) Laſtant. l. v. c. 17. He who does not correct the Error of the Seller (as suppose he sees him deliver, by a Mistake, a more precious Commodity than was agreed for) or who does not warn his Servant to be a Run-away, or his House to be infected, consulting his own Profit and Advantage, is not a wise Man, as Carneades would have it, but a crafty Knave.

Plato makes it a Law, that if a Physician buys a Slave, who labours under any incurable Distemper of Body, or Mind, he must stand to the Bargain: But if an unskilful Person makes the Purchase, the Seller that imposes upon his Ignorance, must be fined double: But if one unskilful Man buys of another, the single Price is to be restor'd^b.

III. This Necessity of discovering the Faults arises from the Nature of the thing, because otherwise a just Price could not be assign'd; and not from the common Bond of Humanity (as if that received a closer Tie by Contract) nor from the Contractors¹ entering into some sort of Acquaintance, which may seem to oblige them to other Duties than those that are required by the Nature of Contracts; for when the Conditions are performed on both sides, we don't think our selves more obliged to him we dealt with, than to any other Man, tho' indeed such an Occasion may sometimes be the means of an Acquaintance and Friendship with him. And therefore, it is no Consequence, that, because it is not against the Law of Humanity to conceal a thing, therefore it is not against the Law of Contract. For if I be not engaged in Contract, I may lawfully conceal from others several things, tho' I alone am Gainer by it, which if I should discover, other People would share with me. As in case I should find a Treasure in a desert Place, without any Owner, no Law obliges me to tell another, that he too may partake of it^c. Vid. 2 Matt. xiii. 44. For here if the Purchaser had told of the Treasure, he had not bought the Field so cheap. Vid. Græc. l. ii. c. 8. f. 7. Hither may be referred the Story of Anicas, who first discovered the Samojedes, and settled a Trade with them, related by Lindopius in his continuation of Meidan, ad an. 1607. Cic. Off. iii. c. 10. says well, That we ought not to neglect our own Advantage, when we can improve it without Injury to another. For as Chrysippus elegantly observes, He that runs a Race, ought to endeavour might and main to get the Victory, yet he must not lay hands on him that he runs with, or use any other foul Play. And just so it is in human Life; any one may lawfully endeavour to better his Condition, but not at the Expence and Injury of another. Ambr. has express'd this Passage, Off. l. iii. c. 4. In Contracts that of^d Val. Max. l. viii. c. 2. f. 1. ought to take place. A fair Dealer ought, neither to magnify the good Qualities, nor conceal the ill ones of his Commodities. Hither may be referred that of Plato de Leg. l. xi. p. 966. The Law which provides against the Seller's Over-reaching, ought also to be extended to the Workman: And therefore he had best take heed that he does not rate his Work at more than 'tis worth, for he cannot be ignorant of the Value of it. And certainly it ought to be allow'd, in a free State, that a Workman should make use of Art, which is a plain Thing, and far from Deceit to impose upon the unskilful. Hither too may be apply'd that which^e Socrates says he heard of Aspasia, Good Match-makers, that are sincere in their Commendations of others, do good in making Alliances between Families; but those that are false, do no good in commending. For when the Parties are undecor'd, it so happens that they hate one another; and those too that were instrumental in the Match. Xen. Mem. l. ii. p. 439. Et. H. Steph.

IV. But as it cannot be doubted but the Faults of the thing itself ought to be declared; so whe-

MR. BARB. NOTES on §. III.

² This Example is only proper here, supposing that the Treasure belongs of Right to the Owner of the Field; for if the Laws of the Country adjudg'd it to him (as Græci conclude from that Place, that the Jeser Law did) the Buyer was guilty of a criminal Artifice, or indirect Robbery, if we consider the Action in itself, without any relation to the Parable, whose Circumstances, we know, are not at all to be neglect, nor more in this, than in the Parables of the unjust Steward, Luk. xvi. 1. and Judge, Luk. xviii. 2. But to speak my Thoughts, 'tis very uncertain whether it was in Use among the Yews, that the Master of the Field should have the Treasure found in it, but Græci allow'd no other Proof than the Circumstance of the Parable, which can't be truly depended on. Supposing then, that by the civil Laws the Treasure, unknown to the Owner, ought not to be left to the Proprietor of the Place where it is found, nor to be kept for the Prince; in this Case I cannot see any Cheat in the Silence of the Buyer; for inasmuch as the Owner himself hath not discovered the Treasure, he has no more Right to it than any other Man, and the Buyer is not oblig'd to tell him of what Discovery he has made. See l. iv. c. 6. §. 13.

treme Want of it. But this was not the Case of the Rhodians, they wanted Corn indeed, but not Money; for they were famous among the Antients for their Riches. Besides, I am not obliged to do a Kindness, when 'tis like to tend more to the Detriment of the Giver than the Benefit of the Receiver. But, in this case, the Merchant would have lost more than the Purchasers would have got by the Intelligence. For if he vended it to a great many Purchasers at the Market-price, each would have felt it but little; and if any one Man had engross'd the whole, he might thank his own Avarice, if he lost by it; and indeed we cannot expect, in the common way of the World, that Men should be so very exact in the Performance of this Duty: For, provided the Love of Money does not tempt the Merchant to cheat us, we may easily excuse them from what the Law of Courtesy and Good-nature may seem to oblige them to.

V. As for Faults already known to the Buyer, they need not be mentioned, for in this case both Parties proceed upon the same Foot^a. So likewise, where the Seller has told the Faults, the Bargain ought to stand good, for then 'tis manifest that the Buyer consents to them; ¹Cicero has a Case^b to this Purpose. Gratidianus sold to S. Orata those very Houses which he himself had bought of Lim but a few Years before. These Houses paid a Duty to Orata (which was out of his Mind) but Gratidianus made no mention of it in conveying his Right. The Cause was brought into the Court. Crassus was for Orata, and Anthony for Gratidianus. Crassus insisted upon the Law, that the Seller knowing it ought to have acquainted the Purchaser with the Incumbrance, but did not do it. Anthony insisted upon matter of Equity, that the Incumbrance was not unknown to Orata, who had sold the Houses, which made it needless for Gratidianus to say anything of it; nor could Orata be said to be deceived, that knew what Title he had bought. For as Ulpian says, lib. xix. t. i. l. i. f. i. *D. De Act. empt.*² He does not seem to have the thing concealed, who knew it, nor ought he to be advertised of it, who was not ignorant. Add. l. xviii. t. i. l. xliii. f. i. l. lvii. f. 3. *D. De contrah. empt. Lib. ult. D. De Aedil. editio*³. Upon the same Principle was founded the Sentence that Alvius gave in the Case of Fannia, who had been married to Timinus; but upon a Divorce demanded back her Dowry, which was considerable. He objected Adultery against her. The Cause was brought before the Consul. After a Hearing on both sides, it appearing, that she had been an immodest Woman, and that her Husband, knowing her to be such, had yet ventured to marry her: The Consul reprov'd them both, and order'd him to restore her Dowry, and her to be fined four Aesses for her scandalous Behaviour⁴.

VI. Besides, as in all Pacts, so especially in Contracts, neither Party should be forced into a Bargain by an unjust Fear. The Lacedemonians therefore did right in rescinding the Purchase of the Land that the Elians had extorred from the Possessors thro' Fear: For they were of Opinion, To force a Title from the weaker under the Pretence of Purchase, was no better than downright Robbery⁵. Thus when *Cicero*¹ objected against Verres, the Pictures and Statues which he had brought out of Sicily; Verres thought he could answer the Accusation in a Word, by saying², I bought them. But Cicero replies, That their Ancestors had wisely enacted, that whosoever should be sent Governor into a Province, should not be allowed to make any Manner of Purchase: And for that Reason Money and Equipage was provided them by the Publick. Slaves indeed were not, because there was scarce any Man of Figure in Rome, but had some of them. And yet no

“ of Gain? On this Account (says Mr. La Placette) I dare not condemn the Merchants, who make their Gains by the Advices which they receive from their Correspondents in other Countries. As their Correspondences cost them something, it is just they should gain by them, nor can I think that they are bound in Conscience to discover them to any body.

³ To this belongs that of Horace, Lib. II. Ep. ii. ver. 14, &c. where he brings in a Fellow selling a Slave; who, after having reckoned up his good Qualities, adds,

— Semel hic cessavit; & ut fit,
In fœcis latuit, metuens penitentis habere.
Dei nummis, excepta nihil te si fuga lædat,
Ille ferat pretium, pœnæ securus, opinor.
Prudens emisti vitiosum: aucta tibi est lex.

Imo, si quis ibidem: non enim te instruere domum tuam voluerunt in provincia, sed illum usum provincie supplere. Quæ fuit causa, cur tam diligenter nos in provincia ab emptionibus removerent? Hæc, Judices, quæ putabant ereptionem esse, non emptionem, cum venditori vendere quo arbitrata non liceret. In provinciis intelligebant, si is, qui esset cum imperio & potestate, quod apud quemque esset, emere vellet, idque ei liceret, fore uti, quod quisque vellet, sine esset auctore, sine non esset, quanti vellet, auferret.*

Man, in his Province, could buy a Slave, but in the room of a dead one; for they look'd upon it to be plundering, and not purchasing, when the Seller could not sell at his own Rate. And in a Province, they were convinc'd, that if the Governor, back'd with Power and Authority, should be permitted to buy what he pleas'd, it would be brought to that pass, that he would have whatsoever he had a fancy for, whether expos'd to Sale, or no, and at his own Rates. Add. L. xviii. t. 1. l. xvi. l. xii. D. de contr. empt. & l. xviii. t. 1. l. penult. D. ad L. Jul. repetund. L. vi. l. 2. t. 20. l. 1. l. de his que vi metusque causa, &c. Constitut. singularium, l. 1. t. 88. f. 1. Tacitus, Ann. xiv. c. 14. in fin. "When the Purchaser can force him to it, the Seller lies under a Necessity of parting with his Goods. Hither may be refer'd what Dio Cassius relates of Cesar, l. xlii. who, after Pompey's Defeat, seized upon that Money, which he had no other pretence of Levying, than under the specious Name of a Loan, tho' otherwise he had taken it by Force, as if it had been his Due, and never had any design to restore it." But yet sometimes the Subject may be forced by the Government in Matters of Sale or Hire: As when Merchants are obliged to sell that which the Government is in great Want of; or when their Waggons or Ships, or they themselves are prest; which, when the Good or Necessity of the Publick requires, and a just Rate is paid, may be fairly allowed of. Sometimes too, the State obliges us to buy such a sort of Commodity, of this or that Man only, and no where else.

VII. But 'tis plain, that in gainful Contracts this Equality does not take place; for where an Equality is to be observed, the Contract ceases to be gainful. But when a Present is made by way of Recompence, the Contract is something like Hiring.

And yet, in a Charge, or a Commission, an Equality may sometimes be regarded, tho' inditec'tly, and by Accident; for if any thing, besides Labour, has been laid out in soliciting the Business, or managing the Charge, it ought exactly to be refunded. And the Reason is, because in such Contracts as these the Labour is given gratis, but the Expence tacitly agreed upon to be repaid.

VIII. But in chargeable Contracts an Equality is to be so strictly regarded, that if one Party has received more than his Due, he must not retain the Overplus, upon presumption that it was design'd for a Gift. For Men do not enter into such sort of Contracts, with a Design to give any thing. And therefore such a mixt Contract must not be presumed, unless the Party expressly consents to it, or it appears that he knew the Thing to be under-rated. An Example we have in Pliny, l. vii. Epist. 11, & 14. where he says, "He had, upon the score of Friendship, sold Lands for less than they are worth. It was generously done of Saxvola, who being upon a Purchase, bid the Proprietor tell him, in one Word, what he would have for the Estate; who when he had done it, Saxvola told him he had undervalued it, and gave him 10000 Sesterces more than his Bargain." Cic. Off. l. iii. c. 15.

IX. From what has been said, it follows, that altho' all the Faults have been expos'd, and nothing demanded more than what was supposed to be the Value; yet if afterwards there appears to have been an Inequality, without any Fault of the Contractor (as suppose some Blemish lay undiscovered, or they mistook the Price) it ought to be corrected, and Amends made to the Sufferer. Nor is it necessary by the Law of Nature, that this Inequality should exceed the half of the just Price. For that famous Law, which

Mr. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on § IX.

The Words of the Code are, Rem majoris pretii, si tu vel pater tuus minoris dispraxerit; bonarum est, ut vel pretium te restituant emptoribus, si mandum emanatum recipias, auctoritate Judicis intercedentes; vel si emptor elegerit, quod deest justo pretio, recipias. Mr. Thomasis has publish'd a curious Discourse upon this Law in 1706. under this Title, De Equitate celebranda Legis 2. Codicis de rescind. vend. & ejus usu practico: Of which this is the Abridgment of the most considerable Matters in it; A Sale or Contract made null for the Smallness of the Price, altho' there was no Deceit or Force otherwise used, was not known before Dioclesian. From that time it hath been a Maxim current among the Lawyers, that by the Law of Nature every one may make as advantageous a Market for himself as he can, and to that End may make use of all innocent Artifice: Whence they began to make use of such sharp Terms as these, circumscribere, circumvenire, which are commonly taken in the worst Sense. See the Notes 1, 2. of the following Paragraph. After Dioclesian, the Emperors Constantine the Great, Gratian, Valentinian and Theodosius, Honorius and Arcadius repeal'd that Law of that Pagan Emperor. Venditionis acq. emptoris filium, nulla circumscriptiois violentia factam, rumpi minime decet. Nec enim sola pretii vilioris querela, contractus sine alia culpa celebratus, litigioso strepitu turbandus est, Leg. 1. See also Leg. 4. and 7. Dioclesian himself seems to have retract'd it at length, as appears by another Rescript, which is found under the same Title of the Code, and which is cited in the next § Note 5. 'Tis true, that at the End of that Law we find a Clause conformable to the 2d Law there treated on; but when we examine the foregoing Discourse, 'tis only a Clause put in by Tribonian; for if the Reasons alleg'd in the 8th Law be good, as they really are, they prove that a Contract ought not to be null'd, unless one of the Contractors has paid more by the half, or received one half less than the Thing is really worth. There are all the Signs in the World that the End of the 2d Law, where the Meanness of the Price, which nulls a Contract, is fixed to half the full Value of the Thing, is an Addition of Tribonian's: For besides, that it might have been better placed among the foregoing Words, the Laws of the Theodosian Code contradict it, and simply and in general disallow the Nullity of a Contract, upon the Account of the Smallness of the Price alone; and there appears no Footsteps of any Distinction of what is above or below the true Price. Tribonian having found in the Gregorian and Hermogenian Codes, whose Compilers not dreaming to bring the Civil Law into the Form of a System, had gathered together all the Imperial Constitutions and Ordinances before which refuses Relief, but where the Inequality is fo notorious, is purely positive, and founded principally upon this, That it would be impossible to dispatch Business, if the Magistrate might be appeal'd to for every little Injury of this kind. And besides, the Nature of the Market requires that we should look about us, if we would not be deceived for whatever Rate the Seller puts upon his Goods, the Price is ultimately determin'd by the Buyer^a; tho' indeed the Determination of this Law is too gross. For tho' the Magistrate ought not to be troubled for every Trifle, yet I see no Reason why he should not relieve me, if I have been very much injur'd, altho' not half in half: As if I should sell a House worth 900*l.* for 600*l.* 'tis hard I should be debar'd the Benefit of the Law, for the Recovery of the 300*l.* when in much less considerable Cases an Action is allowed me. And therefore, as a small Damage, even in the Law of Nature, is not sufficient to break off a Bargain; so where the Damage is great, altho' it amounts not to half the just Price^a, the Bargain ought to be rescinded, or the Price made up. And this Greatness of the Damage is to be estimated, either by the Exorbitancy of the Price, or the Poverty of the injur'd, which sometimes renders the Loss intolerable to him, which a richer Man would not be sensible of. Nay, even where the said Law is in Force, the Buyer is oblig'd, in Conscience, to make up a very great Damage, altho' it comes not up to half the Price; for that Law only designs the Ease of the Magistrate, and not that one Man should be a Gainer at another's Loss. Indeed they do well to extend the Benefit of the Law to the Buyer^a, as well as to the Seller; which too, they tell us, is to be extended to all other sorts of Contracts.

Among the Jews^b, if one defrauded another, whether Buyer or Seller, the Law afforded no Relief, if the Cheat came under the Sixth Part of the just Price. But if it exceed'd the Sixth Part, the Buyer might either immediately, or at any time during the Negotiation, rescind the Bargain, and recover the whole Price: But if the Seller had been the Sufferer, he was never barr'd from making a Recovery. And the same Law obtained in the Bartering of consumable Commodities, as of Fruit, Corn, and such like. But the Jew only, if injur'd, enjoy'd the Benefit of this Law; and not the Gentile, if injur'd by a Jew.

X. To what has been said, the Roman Lawyers have taken a great deal of Pains to reconcile a Passage in the Digests^c, which says, That in Buying and Selling the Parties may naturally over-reach one another. Of which Grotius^d seems to give a good Explication. For he shews, that may and must do not always denote that it is lawful, but only that it is so far permitted, as that the Sufferer can have no Remedy, in case the other insist upon the Bargain, and, being tax'd of Injustice, replies, that it was nothing but what was agreed upon betwixt them:

Constantine, not troubling themselves whether they agreed one with another, or not. Tribonian, I say, having found these two Rescripts of Dioclesian, of which the first was directly contrary to the first, but appearing to him nevertheless equitable, believed that they might be reconciled by a Dinction, which he annexed to each of them. After this he suppress'd the 1st and 7th Laws of the Theodosian Code, because they could not easily be accommodated in any suitable manner, to his Notions; and tho' he retain'd the 4th, which is now the 15th in the Title of the Justinian Code, he made several Alterations in it, that it might make for his Purpose evidently, as among others this: Instead of Repetitio in Reliquum, PRETII NOMINE VILIORIS, copiam minime consequatur, as the Laws of Gratian, Valentinian, and Theodosius import, he put, PAULO vilioris pretii nomine, &c. This manifest Corruption made all that he had to say of Dioclesian's two Rescripts plausible. And I will add, tho' Mr. Thomassius did not observe it, that there is Reason to believe, that in Book VIII, the Word Paulo is also inserted in the second Period, before Autore pretio. The Canon-Law having afterward approved the Foundation of the Law of the Justinian Code, it was look'd upon as a Conclusion flowing from indisputable Equity, and pass'd for a Rule in all the Courts, except Magdeburg; where such Political Ordinances are almost quite abolished. Nevertheless Mr. Thomassius maintains, that it can't be brought into Practice, because the common Price, by which the Damage must be regulated, is very changeable and uncertain; so that it is very hard to fix a Moiety or a Quarter, &c. Further, a great Damage, such as that we are speaking of, can't be done in a Contract, without some great Grievance to one of the Contractors at least, and then there's no need of Dioclesian's Law; or the Fault may be on both Sides; and then we must judge according to the Principles established above; Lib. 3. c. 6. § 6. See more in the following Note.

^a But Mr. Hortius observes here and in his Discourse De Lytro, Sect. 2. § 22. How doth this agree with what our Author says, c. 1. § 8. of this Book? Grotius also says, That as to outward Action, the Inequality to which both Parties have consented, and there has been no Lying nor Concealment of any thing that ought to have been discovered, such an Inequality pass'd for Equality; so that in the Civil Law, no Action in Justice lay before the Constitution of Dioclesian (i. e. before Law 2. spoken of in the foregoing Note.) Likewise, between such as are united only by the Law of Nations, no Restitution can be required, nor any Man be forced to make good such Damages, l. 2. c. 12. § 26. n. 1. It is true that he adds, that this is only an outward Permission, which is of no Force in Foro Conscientie, tho' it may be strengthened by Custom. But this supposeth, that the fixing a Price in Contracts is grounded on the Nature of Things themselves, or depends on the Will of a third Person; whereas the Truth is, that laying aside all Fraud, and all Orders of the Civil Law, 'tis the Consent of Parties that fixes the just Price; so that after their Agreement, there is no Injury done contrary to justice, properly so call'd. See Mr. Thomassius's Discourse, quoted c. 2. § 15, &c. 'Tis another Case to determine, whether we may commonly use this Right (See c. 1. § 9. Note 1.) or whether we do amiss in using it against the Laws of Liberality and Bounty, which require our Help to our Neighbour in his Need, and not to make an Advantage of his Want or Misfortune. Upon which Account he that compos'd Dioclesian's Rescript, may be freed from the Blame which Mr. Thomassius charges on him, sup. § 32. that he confounds the Rules of Humanity and Justice: For in the Style of the Roman Lawyers, Humanum q. l. signifies, 'Tis Just, Equitable, and Reasonable, &c. See, for Example, Code l. 1. t. 14. De Legib. & Senat. cons. & Leg. 8.

^b Cajacius maintains, Objevat. xvi. 18. & xxiii. 32. that it was not allowed by the Roman Law.

^a To which may be applied that of Cicero, Off. l. 3. c. 17. "Laws and Philosophers provide against Frauds different Ways; the Laws regarding only Matters of Overt Act, whereas Philosophers judge according to Equity and Reason." ^b Selden de J. N. & G. l. 6. c. 5. ^c Add. l. 19. t. 2. l. 22. f. 3. D. locati, &c. ^d L. 2. c. 12. f. 26.

² This Explication of the Word, Naturally, is not proper; for it is never taken by the Roman Lawyers so far as I know, for Custom; and tho' it may signify so in Authors, yet it follows not, that we may so explain it here. Nothing is more common in the Body of the Law, than to signify by Naturaliter, a Thing agreeable to natural Reason, or the Law of Nature; and so it is to be understood here. And so circumvenire (or as another Law has it, circumscribere) signifies here any Innocent Art to get as good a Bargain as we can. The Word Dolus here is taken in a good or bad Sense; and so Lucretius uses the Word Decipere, in these Verses:

Deceptaque non capiatur.*

That th' careless Age of Boys may so be cheated,
And being deceived, may not be defeated.

them: And he that won't open his Eyes, as the Saying is, must open his Purse. Add. Lex Cujavior. t. 15. c. 9. f. 1. and Capitulare Caroli, l. v. c. 210. In Xenoph. de Memorab. Socr. l. ii. towards the End, this Rule is given, 'Tis a Piece of good Husbandry, when a valuable Thing can be bought cheap, to buy it. Add a witty Saying of Cicero's in Gellius, l. xii. c. 12. Vid. Sen. de Beneficiis, l. vi. c. 38. Where he disputes whether Demades did well at Athens, in condemning one who got his Livelihood by providing Things necessary for Funerals, having prov'd that he desir'd a quick Trade, which could not be without the Death of a great many People. Add Capitulare Caroli, l. i. c. 131. As for the Instance of Jacob³, his Craftiness is the more excusable, because he had to do with a designing Man, who endeavour'd every way to over-reach him,⁴ and who impos'd hard Conditions upon him, giving him only half of the Young for keeping his Sheep, and yet making him stand to all Accidents. So also the Word naturally^b does not always signify what ought to be done by, or what is congruous to the Law of Nature, but what is customary, as, 1 Cor. xi. 14. Doth not even⁴ Nature itself teach you, that if a Man have long Hair, it is a shame unto him? Yet here the Word ἄκουσιν, to have long Hair, may be taken for too nice a Care in adorning the Hair, which Women seem to claim as their Right, and which seem too effeminate in a Man⁵. Tho' indeed it is disagreeable to the Dictates of natural Reason for a Man to assume that Habit, which Length of Time has appropriated to Women, and by which their Sex is distinguish'd from ours. But to return to the Matter in hand. Lib. iv. t. 44. l. xlviii. C. de rescind. vendit. 5. "It is the constant Way of Buying and Selling, for the Buyer to beat down the Price, and the Seller to raise it, till after many Words on both Sides, the former rises in his Bidding, and the latter falls a little from his "Demands; at last they agree in a certain Price." Anacharsis in Diogenes Laertius, B. i. f. 105. did not absurdly call the Market, "A Place to cheat one another in, and desin'd to Covetousness." Add. l. xviii. t. 19. D. de edilit. edicto. Every Man has naturally a great Desire of increasing his Stock, and therefore Trade could hardly be carried on in a Society, were there not some Encouragement for Industry. Vid. l. xvii. D. de Contrab. empt. "He deserves to be laugh'd at, who suffers himself to be impos'd upon." Plin. l. i. c. 24. princip. "To make a bad Bargain is the more ungrateful, because it exposes the Folly of the Maker."

— An tibi maris
Infidias fieri, pretiumque avellier ante,
Quam mercem ostendi?

Hor. Sat. l. i. f. 2. v. 103, 104, 105.

Would you be cheated? the Occasion's fair,
Since you would buy before you see the Ware.

Mr. CREECH.

Besides, each Party seems by tacit Consent (since an exact Equality, even by the nicest Scrutiny, is so difficult to be determin'd) to indulge one another the Liberty of deviating a little from the true Price. And therefore it seems to be the received Law of the Market, that every one should be free to make his best Advantage of Buying and Selling, provided there be no Deceit in the Commodity itself^d. For if there be, the Opinion of Fulgentius^e will take place, who says, That Mercury was therefore supposed to be the God of Trade and Thievery, because there is no Difference between the Cheating and Lying of a Tradesman, and the Robbery and Perjury of a Thief. "The Ephori fined a Young Man for Buying a Farm at a cheap Rate; and the Reason they gave, was, Because so young a Man was so much given to Lucre." Æl. V. H. l. xiv. c. 44.

Mr. Thomasius supra § 29. prefers another Explication. but not so exact or natural, tho' in the End it comes much to the same. It seems also to me, that in the Law of the Digests, l. b. 19. tit. 2. licet. &c. Leg. 22. § 3. These Words, quod plus & minoris sit, signify that which is worth more or less, and not what the Buyer esteems less worth, and the Seller more, at the Beginning of a Market, as that able Lawyer understands them.

⁴ St. Paul speaks there only of the Custom that was settled in his Time; from which he could not depart without a Mark of Singularity, and offending against common Decency. The Word, Nature, is often oppos'd to Instruction, and we know that Custom is a second Nature; so that we have no need of a Master to teach us, what has been once settled in a Country.

⁵ It will be convenient to set down the Law entire, for the Reason alledged by me Note 1. of the preceding Paragraph: *Si voluntate tua fundum tuum filius tuus vendidit, dolus ex calliditate, atque infidelis emptoris argui debet, vel motus mortis, vel cruciatus corporis imminens detegi, ne habeatur rata venditio. Hoc enim solum, quod paulo minore pretio fundum venditum significat, ad rescindendam venditionem invalidum est. Quod si videlicet CONTRACTUS emptionis, atque venditionis cogitationes substantiam, & quod emptor viliore comparandi, venditor cariore distrabendi votum gerentes, ad hanc Contractum accedant, utique post multas contentiones paulatim venditore, de eo, quod petierat detrabente, emptore autem hinc, quod obtulerat, ad lence, ad certum consentiant PRETIUM, profecto perspiceres, neque bonam fidem, quæ Emptionis atque Venditionis conventionem tectur, pati, neque ullam rationem concedere, rescindi propter hoc consensu finitum contractum, vel statim, vel post pretii quantitatis disceptationem, nisi minus dimidiâ justî pretii, quod fuerat tempore Venditionis, datum esset, Electione [jur] emptori præstitâ servandâ. CHAPTER IV.

WE come now to consider some of the principal Contracts more particularly; which, tho' they have been handled very copiously by the Roman Lawyers, yet, since most of what they have said, has been taken from the Law of Nature and Nations, may fairly be brought back to their proper place. Of gainful Contracts ¹ the chief ^a is a ^b Commission ², whereby one Man undertakes gratis another Man's Business, at his Request, and upon his Authority. This Contract indeed does not directly and in itself, presuppose Property and the Price of Things, but only by Accident, so far as the Person giving the Commission is concern'd to repay to the Person receiving it, whatsoever Charges he happens to be at in the Management of it: for his Labour only is suppos'd to be promis'd gratis. Now, if any Man undertakes another's Business, unknown to him, and manages it with Success, the Roman Law allows him ³ an Action for Business done, which is founded upon ^a Here our Author, as has been observed in another Place, has forgot to mention Donations between Parties living as Principal Contracts. See his first Note upon this Section. ^b Mandatum. • See what we have said upon this in B. 3. c. 9.

Mr. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on Chap. IV. §. 1.

¹ Donations or Gifts ought to have been treated of first; and I wonder this Author has said nothing of them. I speak here of Gifts among the Living; for Gifts among the Dead are discourg'd of l. 4. c. 9. §. 9. This Author in his Abridgement of the Duties of a Man and Citizen, l. 1. c. 12. §. 13, 14. opposes a free Alienation of Property or Gift to a Contract. That which made him not to range Gifts with Contracts, was, without doubt, the great Respect he paid the Roman Law in that Place, which nevertheless calls them sometimes a Contract, as in Code, l. 2. t. 20. De his quæ ei, metuque causâ, gesta sunt, Leg. 7. & l. 7. t. 39. De Præscript. 30. aut 40. annorum, Leg. 8. princ. which, according to Mr. Thomæus, De Arbis Emptionum, § 51. is the Effect of the Carelessness and Harshness of the Language of the Lawyers at that Time. I shall therefore briefly treat of Gifts among the Living in this Place. A Donation then is a Contract, by which we transfer freely the Property of a Thing that belongs to us, to another Person, who accepts the Benefit, whether we release it to him the same Moment, or reserve to ourselves the Use and Possession; so that the Contract is an Effect of Liberality, and the Giver actually parts with the Property of his Goods before his Death. By the Roman Law itself a bare Agreement makes the Act valid. See c. 2. § 2. Note 6. above. If the Gift be truly and lawfully made, it can't be revoked without very great Reason. Aliæ autem Donationes sunt, quæ sine ullâ mortis cogitatione fiunt, quas inter vivos appellamus — quæ si fuerint perfectæ, temere revocari non possunt. Perficiuntur autem, quum Donator suam voluntatem scriptis, aut sine scriptis, manifestaverit, Instit. l. 2. t. 7. Dat aliquis eâ mente, ut statim velit accipientis fieri, nec ullo casu ad se reverti. Et propter nullam aliam causam facit, quam ut liberalitatem & magnificentiam exerceat. Hæc proprie Donatio appellatur, Digest. l. 39. t. 5. Leg. 1. princ. Absenti, sine mittas, qui ferat, sine quod ipse habeat, sibi habere eum jubeat, donari recte potest. Sed si nescit — Donatæ Rei Dominus non fit, &c. ibid. Leg. 10. Non potest liberalitas nolenti acquiri, ibid. Leg. 19. § 2. 'Tis, for Example, a good Reason, 1. When the Receiver does not satisfy the Charges and Conditions upon which the Gift was bestowed. Generaliter sancimus omnes Donationes lege confectas firmas, illibatasque manere, si non — quædam conventiones, sive in scriptis donationi impostas, sive sine scriptis habitas, quas Donationis Acceptor spondit, minime implere voluerit, Cod. l. 8. t. 54. De revocand. Donat. Leg. 10. We must also place in the same Rank, 2. The great Ingratitude of the Receiver, viz. If he makes an Attempt upon the Life or good Name of the Giver; if he has offered to him any great Wrong or Violence; if he has maliciously caused him any considerable Loss or Damage; if the Giver, being reduced to great Necessity, he refuses to relieve him; altho', according to most Interpreters, this last Case is not contain'd in the following Law. Si non donationis Acceptor ingratus circa Donatorem invenitur, ita ut Injurias atroces in eum effundat, vel manus impias inferat, vel jacturæ molem ex insidiis suis ingerat, quæ non levem consensu substantiæ Donatoris imponat, vel vitæ periculum aliquid ei intulerit, ibid. We may add also, 3. The unexpected Birth of a Child, which happens to the Giver; for it is to be presumed, that he would have kept his Goods for his Children, if he had had any; and so he gave with this tacit Condition, that if he had any Children, his Gift should be null. Si unquam libertis Patronus filios non habens, bona omnia, vel partem aliquam facultatum fuerit Donatione largitus, & postea susceperit liberos, totum quicquid largitus fuerat, revertatur in ejusdem Donatoris arbitrio, ac Ditione mansuram, ibid. Leg. 8. Yet several Interpreters maintain that he speaks only of the Case express'd, viz. A Gift bestow'd on a Freeman, by him who had been his Master, and given him his Freedom. See Vinnas on the Institutes, l. 2. t. 7. § 2. But were it so, 'twould be a pure civil Constitution; for if we consider the Law of Nature only, the Reason which authorizes a Revocation here, ought to be of Force as to all other Persons. But it is true only, when the Giver bestows all his Goods, or the most Part; for when the Gift is inconsiderable, in comparison of what the Giver has left, we may reasonably presume that he may not do it, and that he had some Hopes of Children, especially if the Receiver is not well furnish'd himself. 4. A Gift may be revoked in part, when the Giver has not reserved Goods enough to portion such Persons as he ought not to disinherit: for in this Case the Receiver ought to return enough to make up a Portion for such as have a Right, and of which the Giver can't dispose to their Prejudice. See Code l. 3. t. 29. De inofficiosis Donat. nibus, & t. 30. De inofficiosis Datibus. But chiefly Mr. DAUMAT'S Laws, in their Natural Order. Part 1. l. 1. t. 10. ought to be consulted.

² See Mr. NOODT'S Probabil. Jur. l. 4. c. 12. & alt. where he distinguishes between a Commission, and certain Things which may be confounded with this sort of Contract, tho' they have no relation to it.

³ The Expression of the Roman Law, Utiliter gerere, signifies only to do a thing for the Advantage of him for whom we manage, which Prudence engages us to do, and 'tis likely he would have done himself; so that provided it is not our Fault, we need not warrant the Success, and we have Right to demand all necessary and needful Expences, tho' the Business has not so good an Event as was hop'd for. Is autem, qui negotiorum gestorum agit, non solvitur, si esse factum habuit negotiorum, quod gestit, nisi bene ipsi utatur, § 2 on what we may properly call a [†] tacit Commission^a, as is the [§] Obligation between a Guardian and a Minor^b.

II. The old Romans were extremely exact and conscientious in the Discharge of this Trust. For they look'd upon it to be founded upon good Nature and Friendship¹, the great Bands and Cements of human Society; and therefore deservedly had those in Detestation, who under such specious Pretences should deceive one who lays himself open to their Mercy, by having too good an Opinion of their Probity^c. [†] In private Affairs, says Cicero, our Ancestors thought guilty of the highest Crime, not only him that managed his Commission knowingly for his own Gain and Advantage, but even him who was wanting in his Care; and therefore judged the Breach of Trust to be as bad as Theft. For where we cannot be present our selves, the Fidelity of our Friends is presumed to supply our Place; which, whosoever violates, impugns the Safeguard of every Man, and, as much as in him lies, disturbs Society. We cannot do every thing our selves; at some things some are better than others. And therefore we contract Friendships, that by mutual good Offices our common Advantages may be carried on. Why do you undertake a Commission, if you design to neglect it, or to make a Gain of it? Why do you intrude your self into my Concerns, and by your pretended Kindness clog and hinder my Designs? Stand off, I can get another to do it for me. You undertake the Burthen of an Office which you think you can go through with, and which never seems heavy to those who are not light themselves: This therefore is the basest of Crimes; because it violates the two most sacred Things, Friendship and Faith. For no Man commits his Business, but to a Friend, nor trusts any, but whom he thinks faithful. The greatest of Villains therefore must be he, who breaks in upon Friendship, and at the same time cheats him who had not been capable of being thus cheated, had he not believed the Villain honest. Cic. pro S. Roscio, c. 38, 39. ³ Plautus Mercatore, Act. ii. Sc. 3. v. 42. A Young Man says to his Father, "I have heard you often say, That every Wise Man ought, in the first Place, to look after a Commission entrusted to him.

III. For the same Reason¹ the Roman Laws require, that a Commission should be executed with the utmost Diligence, altho' undertaken purely for the Benefit of the Person intrusting it sed sufficit, si utiliter gessit, & si effectum non habuit negotium, & ideo, si insulam fulsit, vel seruum agrum curavit, etiam si insula exusta est, vel servus obiit, agat negotiorum gestorem. Digest. l. 3. t. 5. De negotiis gestis, Leg. 10. § 1. Negotium gerentis alienum non interveniente speciali facto (and not pacto, as Mr. Bynkerhook has prov'd well, Obf. 1. 7.) casum fortuitum præstare non compelluntur, Cod. l. 2. t. 19. De negot. gestis. Leg. 22. It is not so with him who has gotten Possession of what belongs to another dishonestly, who has been at some Expences for his Maintenance; for if the Work he has employ'd them in comes to nothing, 'tis so much the worse for him, for he can't retain the Thing, till he has recovered his Damages; because he must be thought to act for his own Interest only, without any Regard to the lawful Proprietors. On the contrary, he is answerable for all things that are lost thro' his Negligence; and the Owner of the things has an Action against him for managing his Affairs. This is the Determination of the Roman Lawyers. See Mr. Noodt's Probab. Juris, l. 3. c. 9. I further say, That by the Law of Nature only, such a dishonest Possessor deserves, in Strictness, to lose all his Expence, tho' he had some regard to the other's Profit, and the Effect continued so that the Proprietor got by it.

⁵ It is not necessary to suppose here either a tacit Commission, or a Quasi-Contract, as the Roman Lawyers speak. The great Maxim of the Natural Law is, That we ought to do no Man a Damage; and if we have done any, to make it good again. This Law is so general, indisputable, and indispensable, that it is sufficient to establish all relative Obligations, as well of Guardians and Pupils, as of those who have taken upon them the Care of others Affairs at their Request, and such as have faithfully discharged it. It were easy to prove it, if the thing were not clear in itself. See what is said l. 3. c. 6. § 2.

² Tully's Latin is, In privatis rebus, si qui rem mandatam non modo malitiosius gessisset, sui questus, aut commodi causâ, verum etiam negligentius, cum majores summum admisisset dedecus existimabant. Itaque mandati constitutum est judicium, non minus turpe quam furti. Credo propterea, quod quibus in rebus ipsi interesse non possumus, in his operæ nostræ vicaria fides amicorum suppeditur, quam qui lædit, oppugnat omnium commune præsidium, & quantum in ipso est, disturbat civitæ societatem. Non enim possumus omnia per nos agere, alius in alia est re magis utilis. Idcirco amicitie comparantur, ut commune commodum mutuis officiis gubernetur. Quid recipis mandatum, si aut neglecturus, aut ad tuum commodum conversurus es? Car mihi te offers, & meis commodis officio simulato officis, & obstas? Recede de medio, per alium transigam. Suscipis onus officii, quod te putas sustinere posse, quod minime videtur græce iis, qui minime ipsi leves sunt. Ergo idcirco turpis hæc est culpa, quod duas res sanctissimas violat, amicitiam & fidem; nam neque mandat quisquam ferre nisi amicis, neque credit ei nisi quem fidelem putat. Perditissimi igitur est hominis, simul & amicitiam dissolvere, & fallere eum qui læsus non esset, nisi credidisset.

Mr. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on § III.

¹ The Words of the Code are, Suæ quidem quisque rei Moderator, atque arbiter, non omnia negotia, sed pleraque ex proprio animo facit; aliena vero negotia exacto officio geruntur, nec quidquam in eorum administratione neglectam ac declinatum culpâ vacuum est, l. 4. t. 35. Mandati, vel contra, Leg. 21. The Interpreters do not agree about the Degree of Care and Exactness, for want of which the Person concerned is authorized to require Damages of him who has undertaken his Affairs, either at his own Instance, or the other's Request. Some affirm that he is answerable both in the Management of the Affairs, and in the Commission, for the least Fault; but others say 'tis sufficient to attend the Affairs of another with that Application that he ordinarily does his own. See Vinnius upon the Institutes, l. 3. t. 27. § 11. num. 2. & t. 28. § 1. num. 3. and Mr. Hertius's Paræmiæ Juris Germanici, l. 1. c. 35. § 2, 3. Nor may we wonder at such a Difference of Opinions, since the Roman Lawyers themselves do not fully agree about the Nature and Degree of Negligence for which we are responsible in most Contracts, or, at least, they express themselves very ambiguously in the Writings that we have left us. This Mr. Theomastus makes appear at large in his Discourse Printed at Hall in 1705, entituled, De usu prædicto Doctrinæ difficillimæ Juris Romani de culparum præstatione in Contractibus. He also observes there, that by reason of the infinite Variety of Circumstances, it is impossible to settle any general Rule, which may extend to all Cases in this Matter. As for myself, 'tis my Opinion, that in what manner soever we have taken in hand another's Business, or are charged with their Affairs, we are always obliged by the Law of Nature, independent on the Civil Laws, to do all we can in them, but not more, at least, if we have not thrust ourselves improperly it a. Of this Cornelius Nepos gives us Atticus² as a perfect Pattern b. He never made any Promise, but with great Care and Caution; for he did not think it a piece of Generosity, but rather Levity, to promise more than he could perform. But when once he had undertaken any thing, he was as indefatigable in the Prosecution of it, as if it had not been his Friend's, but his own Concern: In such a Case he look'd upon his Reputation to be at stake, than which nothing was more dear to him c.

But if we hope to succeed well in giving a Commission, we ought to consider and form our Opinion of the Man from his past Diligence, and the Tenor of his former Life: For he that trusts a profligate Person may thank himself for his Disappointment, unless he particularly takes upon him to be more diligent than ordinary³, and is capable of being so. We read a pleasant Story of a Man^d who had fore Eyes, and came to a Horse-Doctor for Relief; the Doctor anointed his Eyes with the same Ointment he us'd amongst his Horses; upon which the Man falls blind, and the Cause is brought before the Judge, who acquits the Physician; For if the Fellow, says he, had not been an Ass, he had never applied himself to a Horse-Doctor.

IV. On the other hand, the e Agent ought to be repaid whatever Charges he has been at in the Execution of the Commission. For having promis'd Nothing gratis but his Care, Diligence, and Fidelity, a tacit Compact is suppos'd to have been made for the Repayment of Charges: And indeed it would be hard to render a Man's Kindness expensive to him f. And the same holds good of any Loss that happens by reason of the Trust, but not of such a Loss as is only occasioned obliquely by it: And therefore those Damages only are to be made up, which directly proceed from the Commission, and not those which happen only by the Bye, whilst the Business was on foot. To this Purpose is that Passage in the¹ Digests g: The Agent shall not account to the Person employing him all the Expences, tho' perhaps some of them he had not been at, were it not for his Commission², as if he has been plunder'd, or shipwreck'd, or put to Charges by his own, or his Servant's Sickness: For such Expences as these ought to be imputed to Chance, and not to the Commission. Indeed, when a Man of his own accord, upon no other Motive than his own Good-will, takes upon himself the Management of another's Business³, he is suppos'd willingly to run the risque of all Casualties, that unexpectedly happen in human Affairs. But the Case is alter'd, when a Man is commanded to manage another's Business; for there he that commands is concern'd to bear him harmless, since, in this Case the Person in Commission had not Power to act otherwise. But when a Man undertakes a Business in its own Nature hazardous and dangerous⁴, he is suppos'd (unless he expressly declares against it) to take upon him the common Accidents that usually attend such a Business^h.

V. It is a celebrated Question, Whether a Commission can be satisfied by an Equivalent? which we find elegantly debated in Gelliusⁱ. The Question, says he, is, Whether having a Commission given, and Orders and unnecessarily upon a Thing, in which we could have no Prospect of Advantage, or the Nature of the Engagements, either express or tacit, into which we are entred, does not require a certain Degree of Ability and Accuracy, whether we can attain to it, or not. For I understand, by what we are capable of, all that a Man can do for himself in the Things which he is most concerned for. (See § 6. note 2 following.) But let it be well understood, that we must not extend this beyond the End and Nature of a Contract; for we never engage to take care, or be at Expences extraordinary, nor to neglect other Affairs less important in themselves, to attend other Mens, as perhaps one would do, if he acted for himself. These Principles being laid down, it will not be hard, in my Opinion, to determine, after an attentive Examination of Circumstances, when Men are responsible for the Faults they have committed, in relation to Contracts.

² Our Author had better have observed, That, when we do not know the Character of a Person, we can't require greater Care than he usually bestows on what he loves best; for he can't be thought to engage himself farther; and it is not his Fault, if we have too good an Opinion of him, especially if he has not contributed to begot it.

MR. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on § IV.

¹ The Words are, Non enim, qui in operis non sunt, mandatum agunt, sed quod pollicentur sit à latronibus, aut naufragis res accipiunt, sed legem non solummodo approbant, sed etiam eam agunt. Nam hoc magis est quam mandatum imperari debet. See also Mr. DAUMAR'S Civil Laws in their Nat. Order, P. 2. l. 1. c. 15. Sec. 2. § 6.

² But when he makes a Journey on purpose, as we suppose, the Losses which happen by Chance ought to be look'd upon as the real Consequents of the Execution of the Contract; for if he had staid at home, he had not been expos'd either to the Tempest or the Thieves. And so they ought to be put among the Expences of attending upon his Commission. Another thing is, when he falls sick; for it is not a sufficient Proof that it was an Effect of the Fatigues of his Journey; but if it were, he ought also to repay his Agent the Charges of his Sickness. But I am positive that he ought not to regard what it cost him more than if he had been at home. See the following Note.

³ Upon which the Presumption grounded? I should rather assert, that he that takes upon himself a Commission, will expose himself to his own Charge; for, according to the Author, there is no Agreement to give his Labour only; and since Misfortune may happen every Day, the Commission may be very chargeable, if it be upon the Account of the Agent. So that I do not see how he can engage himself to bear the Losses to which he is expos'd, more than the Charges he must be at in discharging his Commission. The Prætorial. We may on the contrary hold, that no Man willingly runs the Risque of unforeseen Accidents, which, if it is possible, would not have happen'd to him without the Commission, especially if he has not fairly consented to it, which is not common. Such as accept Commissions, in the Execution of which they are subject to the like Accidents, will not, unless they be servicable in that Case; and those who have Power and Will, may as well do it out of mere Liberty, as to require no Satisfaction for their Misfortune, nor any Repayment of the Expences they have been at in executing their Commission.

⁴ Not at all, unless he be declar'd. See the foregoing Note. On the contrary, The more dangerous a Thing is known to be, we have the less Reason to believe that he would meddle with it, if he did not think he should be indemnified from all ill Accidents.

“Orders how to manage it, you ought to act “counter, if it seems for the Advantage of him that “gave it? Those that hold the negative, argue,
“that many have determined to have their Business “done after such a particular manner; and there“fore he whose Business it is, having deliberated “and fixed upon a Method, it ought not to be “done otherwise, altho’ some sudden unexpected “Accident should promise a better Issue; for fear,
“in case of Disappointment, the Guilt of Disobe“dience, and the Punishment due to it, should un“avoidably follow: Whereas, should the Thing suc“ceed right, Thanks be to Providence: But yet an “ill Precedent would be introduc’d, for breaking in “upon well-laid Counsels, and the Sacredness of a “Commission.” Others, on the contrary, are of “Opinion, “That the Inconveniences that may hap“pen, upon acting Counter to Order, ought to be “compared with the Probability of succeeding; and “if the former appear lighter and less than the lat“ter, then ought we to proceed accordingly; for “fear of losing an Opportunity, which Heaven in “this Case seems to offer: Neither need we fear
“such a Precedent, if those that follow the Example “never do it, but with the same Reason.” Then “follow some Precepts of Prudence, “Particularly, “Regard is to be had to the Temper and Nature of “him from whom the Commission is receiv’d; that he “be not of a cruel, rough, untractable, inexorable “Disposition ^a, for in such a Case, the safest way “would be to stick to his Orders.” He adds as an “Example, Crassius Mutianus, “Who sent an “Architect for the greater of two Beams, to raise “his Battering Ram with; but the Architect think“ing the lesser the fittest, brought that; upon which “Account Mutianus order’d him to be scourged, for “he imagined that Discipline would be trampled “upon, and Authority despis’d, if a Man, under “Command, instead of obeying the Orders of his “Superior, should impertinently interpose his own “Judgment:” Tho’ this is to be said for the “Architect, that Mutianus sending a Man skillful in “the Art, and signifying to him what Use he design“ed the Beam for, seem’d, in a manner, to advise “with him about it ^{a b}. On the other side, we have “an Example of Mildness in the Emperor Adrian ^c;

“for when the People had demanded something in a “tumultuous manner, he order’d the Crier to pro“claim Silence. But he fearing the Consequence of “such an harsh and unusual Word, stretch’d out his “Hand, and having thereby procur’d Silence, cry’d “aloud, This is what the Emperor would have; with “which the Emperor was not offended. “One time, “when Commodus found the Bath too warm, he or“der’d the Keeper of it to be thrown into the Fur“nace: But the Servant who had received the Or“der, threw in a Sheep-skin, by the Stink thereof to “induce the Emperor to believe his Order to be put “in Execution.” Lamprid. in Commod. c. 1. Gro-“tius ^d is of Opinion, that a Commission may be dis“charged by an Equivalent, provided it appears “that it was not prescribed to be manag’d under any “particular Form, but under the general Considera“tion and Prospect of some Advantage, which may “be obtain’d as well one way as the other.

In short, the State of the Case is this: In some “Commissions the Business only is specified, and the “Management of it left to the Discretion of the Agent:
“Sometimes the Management too is prescrib’d, but ra“ther by way of Advice, as seeming best to him that “gives the Commission; but yet so as not to exclude “the Agent from using his own Method ^e, if it should “seem best at the Point of Execution. But lastly, The “Method is sometimes so strictly prescribed, that the “Agent cannot depart from it, let what will happen.
“Here ’tis plain that a Commission is satisfied with an “Equi-

they signified, That there are many Men, who having espoused one Party, will never forsake it, &c. whereas A. Gellius says only, That there are some Men, who determine in Effect Pro and Con in the same Question, &c. we ought to observe, that in the Sentence which begins with Neque timendum exemplum, &c. there is something corrupted, tho’ the Sense does not clearly discover it. See J. Fred. Gronovius’s Note upon it.*

^a Mr. Montaigne speaks something to this Purpose; blaming Two French Ambassadors, who under a Pretence of not engaging the Matter on the worst Side, would not give him a true Account of Affairs, and then goes on: “However that be, I “would not be so used in my low Sphere. We are ready to withdraw Obedience upon every Occasion, and usurp upon our “Masters. Every one aspires naturally to Liberty and Authority, and therefore to a Superior no Advantage is to be so prized,
“as sincere and native Obedience. The Office of a Commander is ruin’d, if Men may obey at Discretion, and not thro’ Sub“jection (which is A. Gellius’s Notion, who says, Corrumpi & dissolvi officium omne imperantis ratus, si quis ad id, quod facere “justus est, non obsequio debitis, sed consilio non desiderato respondeat) as Crassus Mutianus shews, &c. But if we ought to confi“der that such a strict Obedience belongs only to positive and precise Commands, Ambassadors have more free Orders, which
“in many Things depend principally on their Management. They don’t barely execute them, but frame and fashion their “Master’s Will according to their own Judgment. I have known some Persons acting by others Commands, reproved for fol“lowing the Instructions of the King’s Letters, rather than the Opportunity of dispatching Affairs. Men of Understanding “blame the Custom of the King of Persia now in use, which ties up their Agents and Lieutenants so strictly to their Orders,
“that they can’t do the least Thing without them. This Delay, in a Kingdom of so vast an Extent, has produced great De“triment to their Affairs. So Crassus writing to an Artist, and telling him to what use he designed the Mast; Did he not forbid “him to make use of his Advice, or interpose his Determination?” Essays l. 1. c. 6.

Equivalent in the second Case, not in the Third. To this Purpose we have a Case in the Digests:³ I commission you to be Surety to Sempronius for Titius, you don't make yourself a Surety, but give Sempronius a Commission to trust Titius. If you have been at Expence upon this Account, the Question is, Am I responsible? Which is declared in the affirmative. For I gained my End, which was, that Sempronius should trust Titius, and whether he does it by your Suretyship, or your Commission, it is all alike to me; and I am obliged by one, as well as the other, to repay what you have laid out upon this Account.

But, as I observ'd above, we must carefully distinguish^b between the Commission of a Superior and the Commission of a Friend; which two are widely different, and agree in nothing but the Name: And therefore what the Civilians have said upon the latter, are very injudiciously apply'd to the former. For, in private Affairs, 'tis easy to presume, that the Method is prescribed only by way of Advice, so as to leave room for the Discretion of the Agent. But when a Business is enjoin'd by a Superior, the bare Execution of it is suppos'd to be meant; and, in this Case, it will not be lawful to depart from the Method prescribed, unless Leave be given (as frequently it is) by an express Clause to deviate from it, as Occasion shall require; or unless the Words, interpreted according to Reason, and the received Rules of Speech, so as to answer the Design of the Commission, can warrant the doing of it. For that Sense that the Meaning of his Words fairly imports, is to be presum'd the Meaning of the Person: Yet this Liberty is not to be taken, but in Cases of Necessity, † for all the Force of Authority would be elud'd, and the Commonwealth would be often brought into Danger, if a Minister, of his own Head, should take upon him the Part of the Governor. Mr. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on § VI.

² The Digests thus speak in this Case, Alius tamen [is, qui utendum accepit] ex 2. Tit. non diligentiam custodit, sed rei præstare compellitur, nec sibi sed ei cuius diligentiam adhibere, quam satis non habet, et, si non diligentiam custodit, petetur, l. 44. t. 7. De Obligat. & Actio. l. 1. § 1. Here let us apply and explain at the same Time what we have said, § 3. Note 1. If we consider the Thing in itself, he that has borrowed a Thing, is bound to take more Care of it than he does of such Things of his own, as he most esteems: I say, as he most esteems, because we must observe, that the most negligent Persons are very careful of some Things, which affect them much. Their Care itself usually does their Affairs proceed from this, that they do not affect them enough to make them resolve to conquer their Inclination to Ease, or to divert them from some Business they are about, or to keep them from some Pleasure, that they love better. As to such Objects as offer themselves to their Embrace, or when something extraordinary stirs them up, and rouses them, they know how to put forth themselves and take good Method, and just Measures enough, unless they be Men very dull; so that the Rule I give, serves not to authorize or excuse their Negligence. Every one has commonly Care enough of the Affairs and Goods of another, when he does as much as he would do for himself in Matters of the greatest Concern to him, and I require such a Degree of Exactness, whereas the Lawyers allow Men to come short of it in some Contracts. A Man can't dispose of another's Interests, as he may of his own; and so when he has the Affairs or Goods of another in his Hands, he is thought to be engaged not to neglect any thing that concerns them. But when he hath enlarged his Care and Diligence so far, 'tis all our Interests can require, if he is not evidently engaged in any thing more; but if the Care of our own Goods and Affairs interferes with the Care of another's Goods and Affairs, that we can't attend both at the same time, it is natural for the first to prevail, every one being more thoughtful (all Things else being equal) of himself than of others; so that this Order ought not to be reversed, unless he is to satisfy some special Engagement, either express or tacit. We will now return to the Contract, of which he has spoken. I say then, that altho' a Man be not mindful of his own Concerns, but abandons all, yet is he no less answerable for his Negligence, when he has hurt, or lost what he has borrowed; for it is certain, that if such a Thing had belonged to him, and he loved it much, or had some extraordinary Reason to keep it well, and do all he could to preserve it, he would have taken more Care of it. But when he has done all he can in this Case, the End and Nature of a Loan, considered in itself, can require no more of him, tho' other more fit and wiser Persons might have managed better, and secured it more from Mistakes, unless there be some tacit Agreement, not only to indemnify the Proprietor, in case the Thing borrowed should be lost or much damaged, but also to pay for it, if it happen to perish in our Hands, especially if it be by our Fault; provided, that it might have been safe in the Lender's Hands, and indeed few Persons will lend otherwise, especially, if they turn'd by the Loss. We borrow, tho' with Trouble, and are uneasy to see a Thing defaced or abused, provided we can make use of it as formerly, or can restore it at a small Charge; but when 'tis quite spoiled, or lost, we trouble not ourselves in the least to distinguish, whether it was by the Fault of him, to whom we lent it to do him a Pleasure, or not. We believe it sufficient to consider, that if he had taken Care of it, it had escap'd that Accident, and that it was not our Fault, that it was exposed to it, while it was in the Hands of him that us'd it.

that prudent Men keep their own ^a; ³ that it be not put to any other Use, nor made use of any farther than the Person lending design'd it ^b; lastly, that it be return'd in the same State and Condition, as when it was borrowed ^c; indeed what Detriment it necessarily receives ^d from the ordinary use of it, need not to be repair'd, for that the Owner is suppos'd to give gratis ^d. Besides, if I lend a Thing for such a certain Time, and in the mean while by some unforeseen Accident want it my self, the other is obliged to deliver it immediately upon Demand: For no Man is presum'd to lend his Goods, but so long as he can conveniently be without them. And he must be either very careless, or have a Design to impose upon another, who lends those Things which he is likely to want himself. And therefore a Loan for a certain Time is upon Condition, that the Owner shall not, in the mean time, have urgent Occasion for the Thing himself; but without such an urgent Necessity a Loan ought ^e not to be demanded before the Time ^e.

Let us see therefore in what such a Loan as this and ^f a Grant at Will and Pleasure differ and agree. In respect of the Object and the Use they agree; for the same Thing that may be lent, may be granted during Pleasure, and the Use, in both Cases, is given gratis. But they differ, in that the Loan is a Contract, the Grant is not; the former obligatory on both Sides, the latter only on one. The Loan is given for a certain Time or End; the Grant only during the ^g Will of the Giver. The Receiver of the Loan must make good all Damages; the Receiver of the Grant only those that happen by his ⁷ Knavery, or gross Negligence ^g.

It may indeed be doubted, whether the Receiver of a Loan is bound to stand to those Chances which it was not in his Power to prevent, and this ^h is generally held in the negative ^h. But, in my Opinion, we ought ³ To use it otherwise is a kind of Robbery according to the Law a Lawyer, whose Expression here are a little extraordinary. Sive is, qui rem utentiam accepit, in alium usum eam transferet, quam cujus gratia ei data est, sicutum committit; eubati si p. argentum utentium accepit, quasi canis ad carnem invitaturus, & ad peregr. sicum tulerit: aut h. p. equum, ut dicitur, ut dicitur, datum sibi longius aliqui duxerit; quod veteres scripserunt de eo, qui in usum equum perduxisset. Institut. l. 4. t. 6. De obligation. quæ ex delicto nascuntur. § 6. But the same Lawyers add, that if the Owner of the Thing borrowed permits us to make another Use of it, than was expressly agreed for, and knows what is done, he is not then to blame. Placuit tamen eos, qui rebus commodatis aliter uterentur, quam utendas ac cepissent, ita sicutum committere, si se intelligant id invito Domino facere, cumque si intellexissent, non permissuram; at si permissuram credunt, extra crimen videtur, optima sane distinctione, quia sicutum sine affectu iurandi non committitur. Institut. ubi sup § 7.

⁴ The Words of the Digests are, Si reddita quidem sit res commodata, sed deterior reddita, non videbitur reddita, nisi quod interest, præstetur. Lib. 13. t. 6. Comod. vel contra, l. 3. § 1. Si commodavero tibi equum, quo uteris ad certum locum, si nullâ culpâ tuâ intercurrente, in ipso itinere equus deterior factus sit, non teneris commodatis; nam ego in culpâ ero, qui in tam longum iter commodavi, qui eum laborem sustinere non potuit. Ibid. l. 23.

⁷ So the Digests order, Illud admittatur, quod culpam non præstat is qui precario rogavit, sed solum dolum præstat; quanquam qui commodum suscepit, non tantum dolum, sed culpam præstat. Nam immerito dolum solum præstat is, qui precario rogavit, cum totum hoc ex liberalitate descendat ejus, qui precario concessit, & satis sit si dolum tantum præstetur. Culpam tamen dolo proximam contineri, quis merito dixerit. Ibid. Leg. 8. § 3. See CUJACIUS Obsèr. 4. 7. But Mr. THOMASius in his Discourse, De culpam præstatione in Contractibus, Chap. 1. § 48, &c. shews, that the Distinction between a Loan and Grant at Will is grounded only upon the Subtilties of the Roman Law, and that there is something of Humour, in the Reason, that ULPIAN alledges here, as well as in the Comparison, which he elsewhere makes between a Grant at will, and Gifts between the Living.

⁸ They are grounded upon this Law among others: Quod vero Senectute contingit, vel morbo, vel ei Latronum ereptum est, aut quid simile accidit, dicendum est, nihil eorum esse imputandum ei, qui commodatum accepit, nisi aliqua culpa intercurrent. Proinde et si incendio, vel ruina aliquid contingit, vel aliquid damnum fatale, non tenebitur, nisi forte, cum possit res commodatas salvas facere, suas prætulit. Digest. Lib. 13. t. 6. Commodati, vel contra, Leg. 5. § 4. See also, Leg. 19. & l. 44. t. 7. De Obligat. & Action, l. 1. § 4. But from these Words, Nisi forte, cum possit, &c. several Lawyers infer, That in a common Dinger a Man ought rather to save a Thing borrowed, than his own Goods; and they add this Proviso, If the first be not of less Value. Whereupon Mr. TITIVS maintains, that these words, suas prætulit, mean not, That he chose rather to save his own Goods, than what he had borrowed, but only that when he could have saved both, he took not care of any but his own, and so it became his Fault. Indeed all that goes before, shews, that ULPIAN will have the Borrower answerable for his own Negligence only, and not for Misfortunes, which he could not foresee; so that these last Words must be explained by supposing some Circumstance, by which it may appear, that the Borrower was in fault; for he is not always obliged to prefer the Preservation of another Man's Goods before his own. The Interpreters generally hold, that the Thing borrowed ought to be of a greater Value; for otherwise, if we save it with a Prejudice to our own Goods, he that owes it ought to pay the Overplus. But this Determination is plainly false; for upon what Account is he, to whom the Thing borrowed belongs, obliged to pay the Value of that which is lost, to save his? He is in no wise the Cause of the Damage received; and he has not promised to indemnify us in case such a Thing happens, which are the Foundation of every Natural Obligation to make good the Losses of any other Person; nor is there any Civil Law that authorizes such a Determination. And, indeed, who is there who would rather suffer his own Goods to be lost than preserve them, on the Condition of paying a Thing of a greater Price, than what he sacrificed, to save them? Lastly, suppose, that the Borrower should prefer the Preservation of his own Goods before what he has borrowed, altho' they were of less Value, 'twould only follow from thence, that, since he has only used his own Right, the Owner of the Thing borrowed, can lawfully demand nothing in this Case; as on the other side, if he neglects to use his own Right, he can lay the Fault on himself only. But it is ridiculous to affirm, that, because he has preferred the Saving of the Thing borrowed before his own, that the Lender ought to account to him for it, and make good his Loss, since he recover no more than his own. Wherefore Mr. TITIVS concludes, that as often as it happens, that there is not time to save Two Things of equal Value, and alike exposed, which ever of them he serves, 'tis so much the better for the Owner, and so much the worse for the other. Obs. on Lauterbach, Obs. 392. Moreover, the Author before quoted, alledges a Passage in Virgil, where the Word, Præferre, bears much the same Sense, by a like Figure, as he affirms it doth here. Mr. NOODT makes use of it in his Observat, l. 2. c. 15. to explain another Law taken out of ULPIAN, 'tis in Lib. 12. of the Æneids, where Juno speaks to the Nymph Juturna, That she was loved ought to distinguish, whether or no the Damage had happen'd, if the Thing had continued in the Owner's Custody ^a; for if it had, no Restitution is due, but if it had not, it seems due in Equity; for otherwise a Man's Generosity and good Nature might be too expensive to him, if, besides ^b the free Use of his Goods, he must be depriv'd of the Perpetuity of them, which he had not been but upon this Account. Nor is there any Reason why he, rather than the other, ^c should bear the Burthen of the Misfortune, since the other ^d was the Occasion of it. The Roman Law ^e gave the Lender Damages, if the Loan was stole; and yet such a Robbery might be committed without any Fault in the Person robb'd. Indeed if a Man, by Fire, should lose all, and be reduc'd to extreme Poverty, it would be inhuman to demand the Value of the Loan; and since Fire, Shipwreck, and such Chances often happen, the Lender may be presum'd willing to run the Risque of them. And thus I think that Law the 18. prin. and l. v. f. 4. & 7. D. commodati ought to be limited. Neither can I well approve of what is said in l. xix. D. dict. tit. which does not seem to agree with what is said in l. xii. f. 1. D. dict. tit. But yet if the Borrower, when he might have sav'd the Loan, preserves something more valuable of his own, he becomes responsible. Fortho' no Man can blame him for letting that perish which was less valuable, yet since it might have been sav'd, and was lost for the Benefit of the Borrower, there is no Reason, why the Lender should stand to the Loss ^e. ^f On the other side, it is but reasonable, that if any Expence has been laid out upon the Loan, besides what was necessary for the Use of it, ^g the Owner should repay it ^d.

VII. ^e A Charge is ^f when we commit to another's Trust and Custody any Thing belonging to us, to be loved by her Husband better than all his other Mistresses, because she was troubled at, and persecuted him with all her Force, Sis, ut te comitis — PRÆTULERIM. See Servius, who also alleges a Passage in Saly's of the like Import with Curthius's, Lib. 6. c. 4. num. 18. Mare Caspium dulcius ceteris. 'The Caspian Sea is sweeter than the other, as if they were a certain Sea of sweet Water. See the Art of Thinking, Part 2. c. 10. &c. where it is proved, that in Comparative Propositions, the Positive doth not always agree with both Members of the Comparison. Mr. NODD treats upon this Matter more at large in his Julius Paulus c. 7. where he produces other Examples of like Nature. But notwithstanding all this I do not think it necessary to join in the Explication of Mr. TIRTUS upon these Words. Nisi forte cum possit res commodatas salvas facere, suas præstatit, which is also found in the Receptæ Sententiæ of Julius Paulus, l. 2. c. 4. § 3. with this Difference, that there he reads, rem commodatam & servam, the Singular for the Plural, as if this Maxim had passed into a general Rule, that every one is responsible for the smallest Faults (culpe levissima) in such Things, as are borrowed for his own Advantage only. (See Digest. Lib. 13. t. 6. Leg. 5. § 2.) The Lawyers look upon it as an Omission, which amounts to the greatest Fault and Neglect for a Man to prefer the Saving of his own Goods before what he has borrowed, tho' there was no way to preserve both at the same time. It is sufficient according to them, that he might have saved another's Goods, if he would, and they have no regard to the Concurrence of the Interest of the Owner, who hath lent, and that of the Borrower. If Ulpian had only affirmed, that the Thing borrowed ought to be paid for, when it might have been secured, as well as a Man's own, he need not have added that Restriction, which was understood of itself. It had been sufficient for him to have said, Nisi forte res commodatas salvas facere poterit, since, whether he hath saved, or no, the Thing belonging to us, that Circumstance alters not the Nature of the Fault, since the Thing borrowed might at the same time be saved. We then see that the Sense of the Word mentioned, comes to this: At least, if he might have saved the Thing borrowed, whereas at the same time he suffer'd it to be lost. But here the Lawyers are not aware that they make a special Case, which must be determined by some other Principle than their Culpe levissima, and since they will have the Owner of the Thing borrowed to bear the Loss, when it happen'd by Chance, and without the Fault of the Borrower, they ought to esteem, as a Thing of the greatest Force, the Impossibility of saving the Thing borrowed, without sacrificing our own Interests. Wherefore let us consult what is said Note 2. of this §, where we shall find more natural and more coherent Decisions of this Matter.

⁹ This Reason, Mr. TIRTUS, Orat. on Pudentor's, 365. says, proves nothing, because the Lender knows well, or at least ought to know, that these sort of Accidents may happen, and so tacitly consents that they be subject to these Hazards, Dangers, and Misfortunes. Otherwise it may be answer'd, that the Borrower had better have hired the Use of the Thing lent, than to be oblig'd to pay for the Thing, if it may be spoil'd without his Fault. But besides, that there is almost ever a tacit Engagement, that the Thing shall be paid, and I have said Note 2. we ought to believe that the Borrowers live at ease (for if they are in Satisfaction they may prefer to the Owner of the Thing borrowed, would generally take upon himself all fortuitous Accidents, and not to take any account, since the Usage of what is lent them gratis, either spurs them a Buying it, or is very necessary to them, and they could not, for the present, be accommodated any other way, or, after all, the Benefit may be returned to the Lender, by obliging against the Danger of unforeseen Accidents. And it is more grievous for him who lends, to lose his Goods, than for him who borrows, to restore the same Thing, or the Value, in case any Accident happens, which takes them in use. The Maxim used by the Roman Lawyers, upon another Occasion, may be applied here, Beneficentia non est officium suum. Digest. l. 29. t. 3. Testamenti quemcumq. aperiantur. l. 7.

¹¹ The same Reason, when the Lender of the Thing borrowed, has freely consented to it, as Mr. TIRTUS says, but a Loan is not the same as a Hire Account, and I have observ'd several Times before. The Laws of the ancient Germans order expressly, that the Thing borrow'd, or be lent, while 'tis in the Possession of the Borrower, he must pay the Owner for it, as Mr. TROMA-SIUS tells us in his Discourse already quoted, De calparum præstatione in Contractibus, c. 2. § 18.

¹² Mr. Puffendorf says, If a Man borrow ought of his Neighbour, and it be hurt or die, the Owner thereof not being with it, he shall pay for it; but if the Owner thereof be with it, the Borrower shall not pay for it. The Reason of this, without doubt, was, that the Owner being absent, could not take care of his Goods, nor see whether they were encl. maged or lost by the Fault of the Borrower. Besides, if the Borrowers were discharg'd of the Loss in the Absence of the Owner, it might give an Occasion to use the Thing borrowed ill, or to neglect it, and feign it lost, when 'tis not. As to the Law of the Digests cited here by the Author, he entitles it Commodati vel contra, and it should be Depositum, &c. As it is here determined, that all Chances are sometimes to be put to the Account of the Person entrusting another, Mr. Puffendorf informs us, "That there is more Reason that the Borrower should indemnify the Proprietor for the Loss that happens by a like Accident." See also Exa. xxii. 13. 14. 15. And d. l. 18. prin. D. commodati.

be kept gratis ^a. And here the Trustee is bound to preserve it diligently, and to return it upon ^b Demand. Yet sometimes Circumstances may so happen, as to excuse him from making a Return even then. A Charge ^c, which you have received from a sober Person, you shall not ^d return when he is drunk, or extravagant, or mad; for in such a Condition he is not fit to make use of it. Nor shall you return it to Debtors or Slaves, whose Creditors and Masters lie in wait for them; for this would not be to return, but to betray the Charge. Suppose a ^e Man, in his Senses, leaves a Sword in your Keeping, and demands it when he is mad; in such a Case, to restore it is a Crime, and the Refusal of it a Duty. What if you should receive Money in Trust for him, and then find that he is taking up Arms against his Country, would you return the Money? Certainly not, because it would be against the Commonwealth, which ought to be preferred. To restore ^e a Charge is in itself a commendable thing; yet all Times and Places may not be proper for it. Sometimes the restoring it may be as bad as the disowning it. The Owner's Advantage ought to be consulted, and if the restoring it tends to his Prejudice, it ought to be withheld. Ambr. Offic. l. i. c. ult. brings these Instances: "If a Man, who had entrusted Money to you, joins with the Barbarians against his Country; or, if any present be likely to rob him of it; or, if he be mad, and cannot keep it, you ought not to restore it. Would it not be a Breach of Duty to give a mad Man his Sword? Or to restore any thing stolen, to the Prejudice of him that lost it?"

But if I had agreed to call for the Charge at such a certain time, I may, nevertheless, if I please, change my Mind, and demand it ^f sooner. A Passage in Quintilian seems counter to this. Some Charges, says he, are depos'd to be return'd at Demand; some at such a time. How was this depos'd? To be paid when you had left off being extravagant: But when you demanded it, you had not parted with your Extravagancies, and therefore it was not due; nor can he be said to have broke his Trust for refusing to restore it at a time, when you yourself own he could not be forced to it. To this I answer, If he that demanded it was the very Person that depos'd it, it ought not to be withheld; but if another had depos'd it, suppose him whose Heir the Demandant is, the Trustee could not be oblig'd to restore it, before the Conditions required were performed ^h.

As for the Degree, it is allow'd on all Hands, that ordinary Diligence is sufficient; for the Contract is not for the Trustee's, but the Deponent's Advantage, and it is his own Fault, if he deposes his Goods in the Hands of a careless Person: And for this Reason the Trustee does his Duty, if he takes the same Care of the Charge, as he does of other Things, and applies the same Diligence about that as about his own Affairs ^g, be it never so small ⁱ. But since, in a Charge some Offices of Friendship do usually intervene (for no Man deposes but with a Friend, or one that he has a good Opinion of) I think, generally speaking, that Care is required in the Management of a Charge, which diligent, industrious Men usually take about their own Affairs. Nay sometimes a more exact Care is necessary, not only when it is expressly promised, but when the Condition of the Charge requires Quid? si is, qui apud te pecuniam deposuerit, bellum inferit Patriæ, reddere Depositum? Non credo; facies enim contra Rempublicam, quæ debet esse carissima." Plato explaining that Maxim of Symonides, That Justice consists in rendering to every Man his Due, says, "A Thing entrusted, is due to him of whom we hold it; yet we ought not to restore it to him, if he be not in his Senses; because among Men, who are not Enemies, this is not to render a Man his due, when it may tend to the Prejudice both of the Giver and Receiver." His Words are, Τί φησὶ καὶ Σιμωνίδης, λέγοντα, ἐρῶς λέγειν περὶ δικαιοσύνης; "Ὅτι (ἢ δ' ἔσ) τὸ πρὸς θεοὺς ἐλάττωμα ἐκείνου ἀποδοῦναι δίκαιον εἶναι. — Αἴτιον γὰρ ὅτι ἐστὶν ἄλλοις λέγειν, ὅτι ἀρετὴ ἐλάττωμα, τὸ πρὸς παρακατασκευῆν ἢ ὄπην, μὴ σωφρονῶς ἀποδοῦναι, καίτοινα θεοῦ λόγον παρὰ τὸ εἶναι, ὃ παρακατέθετο — τοῖς γὰρ φίλοις οἷον ὀφείλειν τὸ φίλος ἀγαθὸν μὴ ἢ δρῶν, καὶ ὃ μὴ εἶναι. Μανθάνω, ὡς δ' ἔρω, ὅτι ἐπὶ τὸ θεοῦ λόγον ἀποδοῦναι, ὃ δὲ τὸ χρεῖστον ἀποδοῦναι παρακατασκευῆν, ἔάνπερ ἢ ἀπόδοσις, καὶ ἢ λύσις βλαβερὰ μὴ εἶναι, οἷοι δ' ὄπην, ὃ, τε ἀπολαμβάνων καὶ ὃ ἀποδοῦναι. De Republ. l. 1. t. 2. This remarkable Authority may be added to what Mr. Noort in his Probabil. Juris has alleg'd, l. 3. c. 2.

^d The Words of the Digests are, Si deposuero apud te, ut post mortem tuam reddas, & tecum & cum hærede tuo, possum depositum agere, p. s. m. enim mutare voluntatem, & ante mortem tuam depositum repetere. But this hinders not, but that we may refuse to return to our Trust, unless he who put it into our Hands order'd it to be given to some third Person, after a certain Term of Time. As for Example, If any one command us to deliver such and such a Thing to his Heir after his Death, unless he be debauch'd. And thus we may allow what Quintilian hath said here. For as for the Person who hath entrusted us, we can't lawfully refuse to deliver it at his Request.

^e The Words of the Digests are, "Sed is [apud quem rem aliquam deponimus] etiam si negligenter rem custoditam amiserit, securus est; quia enim non sua gratia accipit, sed ejus à quo accipit, in eo solo tenetur, si quid dolo perierit. Negligentia vero nomine ideo non tenetur, quia qui negligenti amico rem custodiendam committit, de se queri debet, magnam tamen negligentiam placuit in doli crimine cadere, l. 44. t. 7. De Obligat. & Action. Leg. 1. §. 5. Quod Nerva diceret, latiore culpam dolum esse, Proculo displicebat, mihi verissimum videtur; nam etsi quis non ad eum modum, quem hominum natura desiderat, diligens est, nisi tamen ad iuum modum curam in deposito præstat, fraude non caret; nec enim salvâ fide minorem iis quam suis rebus diligentiam præstatit," l. 16. t. 3. Depositum, &c. l. 7. §. 2. Mr. Thomastus, in his Discourse De culp. præst. in Contract. c. 1. §. 42. observes very well, "That 'tis not without Reason that the Roman Lawyers, who require of a Proctor the greatest Exactness, make not a Person entrusted answerable for the most gross Negligence: For a Contract of Commission is not made more for the Interest of a Proctor, than a Thing entrusted of the Person to whom it is entrusted; for a Trust is a kind of Proctorship, by which a certain Person is obliged to keep what he is entrusted with. It is true, that in both these Contracts we ought to take the greatest Care and Exactness which we are capable of, i. e. as I have explain'd it above, as much as we would have for our own Interests, about things we most prize. The Laws of Society and Necessity of Commerce engage us to it; so that any Man who leaves his Goods in the keeping of another may expect it. If the Trustee will not do all he can for him that depends on him, he ought to refuse the Trust; but since he willingly accepts it, 'tis just that he should take the same Care which he would readily do in his own Case.

quires it, as if it be very valuable, or if one's whole Fortune depends upon it^a. Which Carefulness does not consist in having it Day and Night before our Eyes, but that we lay it up in the safest Place we can, and where it is likely to receive least Damage. And therefore although I satisfy the Laws of Friendship, if I take the same Care of my Friend's Goods as I do of my own, nor can any one in Modesty desire more; yet it is fit, when I cannot save both, that I neglect my own, if of little worth, to preserve my Friends that is more valuable; for Instance, in a Fire, I ought to preserve a Chest of Gold and other precious Things, or full of Deeds and Writings of Moment, rather than some of my own poor Household-stuff. But then the Deponent will be obliged to pay me the Value of those things which I suffered to perish for the Preservation of his, as well as other Expences and Losses received upon the Account of the Charge. But if a Man should prefer the Preservation of his own mean Goods to the more valuable Charge of his Friend (if it has not been covenanted to the contrary) he can be thought only to have^s violated the Laws of Friendship and good Nature, and cannot be forced to make good the Value of the Thing; for he is no Gainer by it, and the Intermission of Acts of Friendship and good Nature does not oblige to the Restitution of what Losses may happen thereupon. But the Reason why the Roman Lawyers require a less Degree of Diligence in a Charge than in a Commission, is, because the latter is managed by our own peculiar Act, and which therefore we have in our own Power to direct in every little Circumstance of it. But in the former no body desires that I should be obliged to sit up, and watch by my Charge Night and Day, it being enough if I lay it up in a convenient Place, and never view it, unless when some particular Occasion requires, as I use to do with such Things of my own². To the Law in Exod. xxii. 12. If it be stolen from him, he shall make restitution unto the Owner thereof; Grotius adds this Gloss, *Provided it be by palpable Negligence, which does not much differ from Knavery*¹².

It may bear a Question, Whether the Trustee may make use of the Thing entrusted with him? To which I answer, That if the Charge can possibly receive any Damage in the Use, he ought not to do it without the Owner's Consent. Scævola in Gellius, l. vii. c. 1. "He that uses a Thing that was simply committed to his keeping, or puts it to other Uses than the Owner gave him leave, is guilty of Theft"¹¹. But if the Thing be never the worse for being us'd, as if I should lay a silver Cup for Ornament on the Side-board, or make some use of it for the Entertainment of some extraordinary Guest, I don't see any Harm in this, provided the Owner is not particularly concerned, that no Body should see it, and the Trustee knows that he is to stand to whatever Risque it may run by being us'd. But when the Owner has lock'd or seal'd up the Charge, we ought not, upon any Account, to open it^b. Nay, a consumable Commodity given in Charge, altho' neither lock'd nor seal'd up, may not be made use of by the *Trustee*¹², unless he be able to restore the same in Quantity and Quality upon De-

^s Thomasius, in his Discourse aforementioned, § 44. does not think this Determination good; for he says, "We do not offend against the Laws of Humanity, unless there be no Engagement." And since, according to our Author, when one suffers the Loss of his own Goods to save a Thing of greater Value, with which he is entrusted, he may make him pay for his Loss: We must own, that in Strictness he is obliged to save a Thing committed to his Trust at the Expence of another of less Value, which belongs to him, as he is also obliged to be at all necessary Expences to preserve his Trust. As for me, I believe that this last Case, and some others, are out of the Extent of our Engagement to general Contracts. The interfering of our own Interest with that of a Person whose Business we have voluntarily taken in hand, or Goods to keep, begets a tacit Exception, which may not take place; but then it must be judged of by other Principles. I am not indispensably obliged to neglect my own Affairs, tho' less considerable in themselves, to attend another Man's, that I have undertaken; at least, I am not expressly engaged to such a Preference, or the Nature of the Thing itself doth not require it necessarily. Nor are we any more obliged in Rigour to save what is committed to our Charge, to the Damage of a Thing of less Value that belongs to us: for besides that, whatever Disproportion there may be, if we consider the Things in themselves, what is of less Value, may be of greater Worth to the Trustee than the other is to him that has entrusted it to him. He may have sometimes a very great Occasion for the Thing he must sacrifice, or he may set a great Esteem on it for some particular Reason, or the Loss can't easily be made good. As therefore we do not commonly engage to do all we can for the Security of our Trust, inasmuch as at the same time we do not think of the Preservation of our own Goods, we are not, properly speaking, in rigour obliged to suffer the Loss of any Thing that belongs to us for this Reason only, because it is of less Value than that which we have in our keeping. To this we may add, that in the Trouble into which we fall by an unforeseen Accident, we have not so much Presence of Mind, for the most part, as to consider what Things are best worth saving, or if we shall have time enough to save this or that. We generally run to that which comes first into our Mind; and as it is natural to think of our own more than of another's Goods, no Man can think it an Injury, if we prefer the Preservation of our own Goods, tho' of less Value, before that of another's. It is also very often hard to know whether we can preserve our Trust, tho' we neglect our own Goods. I conclude, All must be left to the Conscience and Friendship of the Trustee.

² But says Mr. Thomasius, ubi supra. § 43. "As there are divers sorts of Affairs which require a different Care, and more or less Application on the part of the Proctors; so there are divers sorts of Trusts, which must be differently kept, and with more or less Watchfulness. One sort of Care we must have of an House, another of a Slave or Domestick Servant, another of a Jewel, or some other precious Thing, another of such things as are not portable; and therefore we are satisfy'd to place them in a Court, or some such Place, &c. so that 'tis not true to speak generally and without Restriction. 'Tis sufficient to put a Thing in a convenient Place; and when that's done, we can't any more conclude that a Trustee is only answerable for his Knavery and gross Negligence, than we may infer, for the same Reason, that the Seller, before the Delivery of his Goods, is also responsible for his Knavery, and the same Degree of Negligence, and nothing else."

¹² Mr. SACY's Decision upon a Case which he propounds in his Treatise of Friendship, appears a little too severe, not to say very sour. "I am not afraid to say (these are his Words) that he, to whom a Thousand Livres are entrusted, may not make use of them to save the Life of his Friend, who is fallen into the Hands of Thieves, who threaten to take it away, if that Sum be not paid by a certain time. This is a Case, in which we ought to forget that we have any Trust, because in having such a Sum entrusted to us, 'tis as if we had none: For it is not lawful for us either to open or force the Chest where it is. And if we dare to do it, we commit no less Crime, than if we broke open our Neighbour's House, and took that Sum; the only Difference is, that the Law punishing this last with Death, and taking no Notice of the other, leaves our Punishment to Infamy tho', in the main, 'tis the same thing. The Sum entrusted, is in the Hands of the Person trusted, not as in his House, but in his House to whom it belongs; and so when the Trustee makes use of it, he steals it no less than if it were not entrusted to him,

"he

Demand: For we are often in so great want of such sort of things, that we cannot part with them on any Terms. Lastly, 'tis well ordained in the Roman Law, that whosoever should disown a Charge, which the Deponent, in Distress, had reposed with him, as being in danger of Fire, Shipwreck, Tumult, or such like, should be fin'd double; for such inhuman Villany deserves to be severely¹³ punished, which does not scruple to make a Gain of those Men who are the Objects of Compassion. Vid. l. i. f. 1, 2, 4. D. depositi, d. l. Quinctilian, Decl. 245. adds, "A Charge ought to be restored the sooner for being deliver'd secretly and without Proof." Add Exod. xxii. 7, 8, 9. Lev. vi. 2, &c. Nay, I think it a worse Crime to disown or withhold a Charge, than to commit a Robbery; for here only Justice and Property are violated, but there Friendship and good Nature too suffer^a. Nor does it extenuate the Crime, that the Trustee, having the Charge put into his Hands, has an Opportunity of playing the Knave (which is otherwise tempting enough) laid in his Way; whereas the Thief has no such Tempration, but of his own Accord seizes upon other Mens Goods, and, which is more, breaks in upon that common Security which makes every Man's House his safest Sanctuary. Nor is a Guardian guilty of a less heinous Crime, who debauches an Orphan committed to his Trust, and received into his House^b.

Since the Keeping only is given gratis, it is plain that all the Expences laid out upon the Charge ought to be repaid, Upon which Ground it is rightly declared in the Digests^c, That if a Charge be received at Asia, to be restor'd at Rome, it must be at the Expences of the Owner, not of the Trustee.

"he took it out of the House of the true Proprietor." Pag. 125, &c. This Author does not distinguish whether he be able or not to pay the Sum entrusted to him, which he made use of to save the Life of his Friend; all that he says tends only to prove, that, let the Reason be never so important and pressing, for which the Thing entrusted is made use of, he is guilty of Theft for this alone, that he made use of what he had in keeping. But this is one of the Cases of Necessity, which are above the common Rules, and whose Exception is included in all Engagements. Whatever a Man can do for himself, that he can certainly do in the like Circumstances for his Friend, who is his second self; and we ought to have such a good Opinion of him who trusts us, as to believe that he would lend us his Money for that Use freely, and so he may be thought tacitly to consent to it. I proceed further, and say, That supposing the Sum deposited be inconsiderable, in respect of the Estate of him to whom it belongs, I can't see but that it may be made use of to save the Life of a Man and a Friend, tho' we do not think him rich enough to pay so great a Sum under a long time, if ever. If it be allowable, as I have prov'd above, l. 2. c. 6. not only to take the Goods of another, but also to run the Hazard of one's Life to preserve his, is it not much more excusable to take the Liberty of disposing of a Thing trusted to us, in such a pressing Necessity of a Friend? And yet there is a great deal of Difference between this Action and that of a Man who robs to save his Friend; for this last commits a manifest Violence and Injustice, whereas the other only makes use of the Opportunity that Providence has given him, where he may presume upon the Consent of him who has committed that Money to his Keeping. It is much like, as if a Man, being pursu'd by his Enemies or Thieves, takes the first Horse he lights of to make his Escape, tho' the Master is neither present, nor knows it.

CHAP. V.

Of chargeable Contracts in particular; and, First, of Bartering, Buying and Selling.

- I. Of Exchanging or Bartering.
- II. When a Contract of Buying and Selling is compleat.
- III. Of the Loss or Gain of a Thing sold.
- IV. Of Agreements commonly join'd with Sales.

- V. What the Buyer ought to perform to the Seller, and e contra.
- VI. Of Buying in Hope and Expectation.
- VII. Of Monopolies.

OF chargeable Contracts, Bartering is deservedly esteem'd the Chief; for in Days of Yore¹, before Money was found out, there was no other Method of maintaining Commerce. The Dutch made use of the simple and antient way of Bartering Commodities, Vid. Tacit. de Morib. Germ. c. 5.^a Now Bartering may be made two ways; either the Commodities may be valued for Money, and then, instead of Money, exchanged for one another; or the Commodities may be immediately compar'd together. The first sort is, in a manner, Buying and Selling, for here the Things are rated according to their Prices on both Sides; which Sort of Bartering is at this Day very frequent.

And therefore there is no Reason to conclude, that pure Bartering was in use at the time of the Trojan War, as most do from that Passage in Homer, Iliad. v. 472.

Mr. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on Chap. V. § 1.

Ἐνθα ἄρ' ἀνίζοιτο κερηκομένους Ἀχαιοί,
 Ἄλλοι μὲν χαλκῷ, ἄλλοι δ' αἶθωνι σιδήρῳ,
 Ἄλλοι δὲ ξυνοῖς, ἄλλοι δ' ἀπείσι βέεσσι,
 Ἄλλοι δ' ἀνδραπέδεισι.

The Grecian Chiefs their chearful Bowls prepare,
 And barter Brafs and Steel for sumptuous Fare.
 Some truck with Slaves or Skins of slaughter'd Kine,
 And some the Ox ic self exchange for Wine.

For, says Pliny ^a, I wish we could quite lay aside the Use of Gold, which all good Men speak against, and which was found out to the Destruction of Mankind. How much happier was it when one thing was exchange'd for another? As (if Homer may be believed) was done at the time of the Trojan War: For then, I suppose, Commerce was set on Foot for the Conveniences of Life. He tells us, That some purchas'd with Hides, some with Lion, others with Plunder: Tho' he himself was an Admirer of Gold, yet he so rated Things, as to make Glaucus exchange his golden Arms of a hundred Oxen Price, for Diomedes's of nine. Hence it is, that the Fines inflicted by the old Laws consisted of Cattle, even at Rome. Indeed, at this Day, nothing is more common than for Soldiers to exchange their Booty for other Commodities; for their Booty does not always consist of Money, and they do not scruple to take other Things that come in their way. And therefore it does not follow, that Money was not in Use at the Time of the Trojan War, because the Soldiers purchas'd Wine with their Plunder: Nay, there is mention made of Talents of Gold in Homer; for in Iliad. i. v. 122. Agamemnon promises to give Achilles δέκα δ' χρυσίου πικύων, Ten Talents of Gold, & Odys. θ. v. 393 Each of the Phœacian Princes give Ulysses χρυσίου πικύων πηλίου, A Talent of venerable Gold. And altho' that Gold in Odys. v. 11. is call'd, χρύσος πολυδαΐεσσιν, yet it is not probable, that all Gold was then wrought, or us'd only for Cups and such sort of Vessels. Nor does it appear why Homer should give such a high Value to Gold, if it had not been then the Standard Price of other Things. Besides, πορδαία & μόνι signify any Materials capable of being finish'd upon. As for Homer's calling Glaucus's golden Arms ἐκατόβοια, or worth an hundred Oxen, and Diomedes's Brafs ones, ἐναυβοια, or worth nine Oxen, without doubt he did it, because in old Times, the greatest Riches consisted in Cattle, of which Oxen being the chief, because of the absolute Necessity of them in Husbandry, it was usual to refer the Price of other Things to them; which common way of speaking did not immediately grow out of use, after Money had been made the Measure of all things. And therefore it is observ'd ^b, that Maidens, who by reason of their Beauty received great Presents from their Gallants, were call'd παρθένας ἀλορηχοίας, Virgins who gain Oxen: But granting that Coin'd Money was not then known among the Grecians, yet the Use of Gold and Silver, by weight, might possibly have obtain'd in Commerce. Indeed, that many Nations used Money before the Trojan War, is plain enough from Holy Writ.

This Place of Homer puts me in mind of the Controversy between Cassius and Sabinus ^c, Whether before Money was in use, or now, since the Use of it, it might be call'd Selling, if v. g. I should give my Cloak for a Coat? Sabinus asserted that it was, from this Passage of Homer, as if the Grecian Army had bought Wine with Brafs, Iron, and Men; but ἀνιζέει does not properly signify to buy Wine, but to procure it by any means whatsoever, as among the Latines, pabulari, lignari, frumentari, signify to forrage, to get Wood, and Corn by any Method whatsoever ^d. The other Opinion indeed seems more feasible, because it is one thing to buy, another to sell, the Buyer one Man, the Seller another; the Price one thing, and the Commodity another; but for the same Man to be Buyer and Seller, and the same Thing both the Commodity and Price, seems absurd. But to this we reply what we just now said of the two Sorts of Bartering; for if we suppose the Things to be first rated by Money, the Buying will be reciprocal, and therefore not absurd for the same Person, in a different respect, to be both Buyer and Seller.

Under the Name of Bartering may be brought the reciprocal Donations which commonly pass between Friends; which not being a Contract, do not require Equality ^e. And to this may be refer'd the changing of Arms between Glaucus and Diomedes ^d, which, for the Inequality, may perhaps be call'd Foolishness on Glaucus's side, but cannot be call'd Injustice in Diomedes. Maximus Tyr. Dilect. 23. says, "Glaucus rated his Purchase from the Occasion, not according to the real Value." And again, Dilect. 24. "Nor had he that receiv'd the golden Arms more than his Due, nor he that received the brafs, less; but both did generously; the Inequality of the Matter being made up with the Equality of the Design that each had of obliging the other." Add. Ilocr. ad Nicocl. in princ. Among the Russians there is a Market for holy Images, which they do not pretend to sell, but to exchange for Money ^e.

II. But since Money has been introduc'd, the Contract of Buying and Selling has been most in Use ^f, whereby the Property of a Thing, or some Right equivalent to it, is acquir'd for a certain Sum of Money: And here the first Enquiry is, When the Contract is so compleated, that nothing remains but that the Seller relinquish the Thing, and the Buyer take Possession

^a Of this Opinion the Dionysii speak thus, Sed verior est Nervæ & Proculi sententia, permutatiōnem, non emptiōnem hoc esse. Nam ut aliud est vendere, aliud emere, aliud emptor, aliud venditor; sic aliud est pretium, aliud merx, quod in permutatiōne discerni non potest, uter emptor, uter venditor sit, ubi sitra.

^b Men. Tyrinus's Greek ἵ. Οὐδὲν γὰρ ἔπε τῷ λαβόντι χρυσὸς πλέον, ἔπε τῷ δαμάξαντῳ ὁ χαλκὸς ἑλαπτόν, ἀλλὰ ἀμορτοῦσι χαλκὸς ἔρει ἐκάτεσσιν ἐν πῶ ἀνίσω τ' ἕκαστος, ἰσοῦσι τῆ γνημῆ δοθέντα. See Mr. Davis's Notes on it. We may also add here, That by the Roman Law an Exchange is a Contract without a Name, for which there lies no Action in Justice but the Delivery of the Thing exchanged is made on both Sides. MR. BARB. NOTES on § II.

^f The Words of the Digests are, Et si quidem pecuniam dem. ut rem accipiam, emptio & venditio est. So we may sell a Service, an Inheritance, a Debt, in a Word, all Sorts of Rights, Names, and Actions. See Digest. De hereditate, vel actione tradita, l. 18. t. 4.

Session of it? According to the *Roman Laws*² the Contract is completed as soon as both Sides have agreed upon the Price; and then the Buyer can force the Seller to deliver up the Thing; and the Seller can oblige the Buyer to take it, and to pay down the Price immediately, or at the Time appointed².

But the Contract may be incomplete, and not capable of bearing an Action, either upon a general or a particular Account. The First is, when the Buyer and the *Seller*³ are not agreed, but still endeavour to bring one another to their own Terms; where they are both free to give back and break off the Bargain, having not yet contracted an Obligation, provided there be no Deceit nor Design in either Party to elude the other; which indeed obtains in all Contracts. The Latter is, when the Bargain turns upon some Conditions⁴ either express or understood; as if the Ware is first to be seen or tasted^d, for here the Bargain goes upon a Supposition, that the Thing will not only appear as the Seller had represented it, but that it will then please too. For indeed the Knowledge of the Thing is always necessary for the determining of the Price; and it is imprudent to buy without seeing it, where we cannot depend upon the Word of the Seller.

The determining of the Commodity by Weight, Measure, or Number⁵, is not properly a Condition of Sale, unless the Thing be so, as not to serve my Turn, but in such a Quantity. However, for putting the Contract in Execution, it is necessary to measure, number, or weigh⁶; for we cannot otherwise specify the Thing, and set it apart from those of the same sort. Nor, without this Measuring can the Goods be deliver'd, or Property transferr'd; for I have no other way of determining what belongs to me, and what to the Seller. Sometimes indeed we buy at a Lump; and then Measuring is only for Experiment, not for the rating of the Commodity; for in that Case, the Measure does not precede the Delivery; it being one thing to sell this Vessel of Wine that holds ten Gallons, and another to sell ten Gallons out of this Vessel⁸.

Lastly,

² Altho' the Buyer pays nothing down, nor gives any Earnest. *Est autem emptio Juris Gentium, & ille contractus peragitur, & inter absentes contrahi potest, & per mandatum & per literas, Digest. de contrahendâ Emptione, Leg. 1. § 2. Leg. 10. § 4. § 6. & 35. § 5. 6. 7.

³ As when they have not agreed upon the Price, but only have said, We shall well agree, I'll sell it at a reasonable Price, &c. It is the same, according to the Roman Lawyers, when we say, I'll sell it for what you please, for what you think reasonable, &c. Ubi constat imperfectionem esse negotium, cum emere volenti sic venditor dicit, Quid ANTIQUELUS, quanti equum putaveris, quanti asinum materis, valebis emptum. Digest. ibid. Leg. 35. § 1. Some ask, Whether a simple Contract to sell or buy, obliges to any thing by the Law of Nature and Nations? Mr. THOMASius, in his Dissertation De Arrhis emptionum, § 23. denies it absolutely; and the Reason, says he, is clear, "There is only a loose Consent which is come to no Determination, and which gives no Right to him to whom the Promise is made, to demand any thing: For how can he pretend that he hath bought or sold any thing actually? But if one has no Mind to sell, 'tis easy to evade his Promise by exacting an enormous Price, or by annexing such Conditions as we think fit; and if one has no Mind to buy, he can as easily get off by very small Offers, or by engaging him to very hard Terms. Or how can a Man pretend to be endangered, since there is neither any good, nor Price fixed; and he hath nothing to do but to declare that he is ready to conclude the Bargain, if he resolves to go on with it; and to take away all Ground of Complaint, he may allege that he has broken his Word, and so lay all the Blame on him that the Bargain is not completed?" But if we will judge of the Thing by the sole Right of Nature and Nations, I do not think that any Man can come fully into the Satisfaction of THOMASius. I distinguish here between an uncertain Promise, which neither obliges, or engages any Man, and a real Promise, upon which the Person, to whom it is made, may depend: The first sort may be eluded after the manner that this same Lawyer hath represented, because we have promised so far only as we please to keep it; and to him, to whom the Promise is made, has no Right, but the other ought certainly to be ordered so, as not to come to Nothing, and the Promise to conclude it at his own Pleasure. Let us clear this by an Example; I see a Thing useful to me in another's Possession, I ask him whether he'll sell it to me? He answers, Yea. Whereupon I go away without bargaining, or requiring him to lay aside for me. In this Case, I am, tho' if the Owner of the Good, sells them to another, and resists, to sell them to me afterward, when I come again to desire it, he does me no Injury, for he is under no Engagement to me, no otherwise than that we might have agreed, if I had at that instant bargain'd; but since I neglected it, 'tis so much the worse for me. And this hath chiefly a Place, when he that declared his Price at that instant, is a Trader by Profession, and deals in Things of that Nature; for we know well, that if we do not take such Men at their Word, when they offer to sell a Thing at such a Price, we do nothing; by a much greater Reason they are free to sell, or not, when nothing is said. But suppose that I say to a Tradesman by Profession, My I depend upon it that you'll sell me such or such a Thing? And he thereupon positively promises me that he'll keep it for me, then he tacitly engages that he'll sell it me at a reasonable Rate, if I deal with him for a Thing whose Price often varies, or at the usual Price. If then he raise the Price for it; provided that I come soon to buy it, or in the time agreed on; for if I let the Time pass, or, if it were not so, I stay a long time before I come again, the other Contractor is released of his Word, by reason of the Occasions which he makes use of selling his Goods to Advantage; for before this he was not free to recant, because I might fall of accommodating myself elsewhere.

⁷ Si id, quod venditur, appareat, quibus quibus, quantum sit, & pretium, & quid venit, perfecta est emptio. Digest. De periculo & commodo Rei venditæ. Leg. 3. princip. In his que ponere, numero, mensuræ constant, — si omne vinorum, vel oleorum, vel frumentorum, vel argenti, quod utroque est, non pretio venditur, item juris est, quod in cæteris rebus. Quod si etiam ita venditur, ut de singulis amphoras, item aliter, ut de singulis metretas; item frumentum ut in singulis modis, item argenti ut in singulis libras certum pretium distinetur, — & si illique numero constant, si pro numero corporum pretium sit paratum. Sabinus & Cassius tunc perfecta emptio venditio est, cum a mensurata, ad mensuram, ad pondus sint; quia venditio, si hoc casu, non videtur fieri ut in singulis metretas, & modis, & cæteris, quæ quævis namentis eris vel appenderis, Lib. 18. t. 1. De contrah. empt. & Leg. 35. § 5.

Lastly, the Bargain is incomplete, if the Parties^a particularly agree to have one another's Consent express'd in Writing, and the Writings be not yet finish'd. But 'tis another thing, if this Writing is design'd only for a Help of the⁹ Memory, or an Evidence of the Thing. What the Hebrews observ'd, in relation to this Contract, is curiously taken notice of by Selden, De J. N. & G. secund. Heb. l. vi. c. 1 & 4. Add a Place of Theoph. in Job. Serm. 42.

III. And here we must take special Care to distinguish between the Contract itself, and the Execution of it. The Contract is completed as soon as the Commodity and Price is agreed upon, provided there be no Condition added, that can suspend the Obligation, or any thing else, that can leave room for either Party to recede from the Bargain; but the Execution of the Contract consists in the actual Delivery of the Money by the Buyer, and of the Commodity by the Seller. It is indeed most natural, that as soon as the Contract is completed, it should be put in Execution; or that as soon as the Price is agreed upon, the Buyer should deliver the Money, and receive the Commodity; which they call *Trucking with ready Money*¹. Vid. Plaut. Afin. Act. I. Sc. iii. v. 47. As also Plato de Leg. l. xi. in his Commonwealth enacts, "That whatsoever is bought and sold, be done in such a certain Place of the Forum, the Seller delivering the Commodity, and the Buyer paying down the Price immediately."

But when there is some time between the Completion of the Bargain, and the Delivery of the Thing; it may be demanded to whom the Damage, or the Profit of the Commodity belongs in the mean time, to the Buyer or to the Seller?² 'Tis well known that the Roman Law, as soon as ever the Bargain is completed, imputes the Risque of the Commodity to the Buyer,³ altho, it be not yet deliver'd, and altho' the Seller remains Master of it. By Risques they mean the Accidents 'tis liable to, from external Injuries, as Theft, &c. or internal Decay proceeding from natural Causes⁴. But how can the Damage belong to the Buyer, when he is not yet the Owner, whereas the Loss of a Thing is to the Owner? To which some answer⁵; that that trite saying, The loss is to the Owner, is true, when the Owner is oppos'd to those who have barely the Use and Custody of the Thing; and not to those who have Right in it, and a Power to call for it as their own. Which Distinction is founded upon this Reason, that the Buyer might, and ought to have immediately taken Possession of the Commodity, and to have paid down the Money; which if he had done, it had perish'd in his own keeping; and therefore his Delay and Negligence ought not to turn to the Loss of the Seller. Besides, the Risque belongs to the Buyer, not only because he is the Owner, but because the Seller, after the Completion of the Bargain, in respect of the Buyer, is not consider'd an Owner, but as Trustee of such a particular Commodity, for which, if it be lost without his Fault, he ought not to be responsible.

⁶ But after all, since it is the Seller's Business to give the Buyer Possession, if he has not discharged this Duty, I do not see why he, rather than the other, should not stand to the Loss of it. For the Answer, That a Person, having promis'd another a Thing, does not stand oblig'd in case the Thing be lost, does not come up to our Case^d: For there the other Party was to have gain'd the things gratis; and it would be hard and unjust for a Man that had promis'd a certain Species, upon the Loss of it, to be bound to make good the Value. But in such Dealings as admit of no Latitude, the Case is altered; for why should

² The Words of the Law are, Quoniam autem emptio & venditio contracta sit, - - periculum rei venditæ statim ad emptorem pertinet, tametsi caris tradita emptori non sit. Itaque si homo mortuus sit, vel aliqua parte corporis letalis sit, aut cadens tota, aut aliqua ex parte, incendio consumptæ fuerint, aut fundus ei floribus totus, vel aliqua ex parte ablatas sit, sive etiam inundatione aquæ, vel arboribus turbine dejectis, longe minor, aut deterior esse corporis, emptoris damnus est, et nocere est, licet rem non fuerit multo, pretium plerumque. Quicquid enim sine dolo & culpa venditur, necesse est, necesse est. Instit. lib. 3. tit. 24. § 3. The Negligence for which the Seller is responsible, if there be no Cheat, is, what the Roman Lawyers call a small Fault, which is oppos'd to the Care which a good Master of a Family commonly has of his own Affairs; for they require such a Degree of Exactness in all Contracts, as may be for the Advantage of both Parties. Si nihil appareat convenit, res in culpa est, et culpa est à venditore, qualis bonus Paterfamilias jais rebus adhibet, quam si præstitit, & rem non perdidit, periculum esse debet. Digest. lib. 18. tit. 1. De contrah. empt. Leg. 35. § 4. Sed ubi utriusque utilitas contrahitur, ut in specie, ut in dote, ut in societate, & abbas, & culpa præstatur. Lib. 23. tit. 6. Circumstantiæ venditoris, Leg. 5. § 2. As for me, I hold to what I have said in the foregoing Chapter; and, without having regard to that Distinction about the Advantage, which accrues by a Contract, either to the Parties only, or to both together, I believe, that the Seller, and every other Person, who is engag'd expressly or tacitly to preserve a Thing that belongs to another, in any wise is responsible for what ever happens, if he has not done as much as he could or would for himself, and his own Interests, in things which he values good.

⁶ We may add here what CUIACIUS, and some other Lawyers affirm, that, according to the Roman Law, all Accidents, before Delivery, must fall upon the Seller. See CUIACIUS upon Leg. 33. of the Digest. Tit. de re pignoratitia, in his Treatise of Pignoratitia, Lib. 8. Mr. VAN ECK, Professor at Utrecht, observes in his Principia Juris Civ. under the Title, De periculo & commodo rei venditæ, § 10. "That the Learned can't reconcile this Law with the common Opinion; and as for himself, he declares freely, that he may say, without any Injury to the Roman Lawyer Population, that they never were perfectly agreed about that Matter.

should the Buyer, who has not yet had the Delivery made him according to the Contract, be deprived of the Goods, and yet pay the Seller the Price of them ^a?

The best way to discover natural Equity, in this Point, is to distinguish whether the Delay was absolutely necessary, ⁷ for the Delivery of the Commodity; or only occasion'd through the Default of one of the Parties; and if occasioned, whether by the Buyer, or the Seller?

The first Case may be put thus; suppose I buy Cattle, which at present are at some distance, and the Seller, in driving them to me, happens to have them intercepted by Robbers, Wolves, or some other Accident; in this case no doubt the Loss is the Seller's.

Where the Delay has not been necessary, but occasion'd by the Seller, ⁸ then too the Loss lies at his door.

But if the Buyer be the Occasion of it, then he stands to the Loss of it. For the very Moment that the Commodity was due, and the Seller ready to make Delivery of it, the Property pass to the Buyer, and the Thing then began to belong to him only ^b. And therefore, if the Seller out of Kindness keeps in Custody the Goods, which the Buyer did not so much as commit to him in Trust, 'tis unreasonable to expect, that he should stand to the Casualties that may attend them. But in Case the Buyer had committed them to his Custody, then must they be look'd upon as a Charge, and consequently the Receiver must be free from whatever Casualties may happen to them. In which Case, the Delivery of the Commodity ought to be made by a Fiction brevis manus ^c, but otherwise than is done in the Loan, or Letting of a Thing. For there, by the Delivery we alienate our own, but here the Alienation is made to us. What has been here said of the Damage may be apply'd to the Gain also ^d.

IV. Moreover 'tis usual for this Contract to be qualified with the Addition of several other Pacts, according to the Pleasure of the Contractors, or the Law of the Land. In which the Law of Nature is concern'd no farther, than that each Party stands to his Agreement, provided nothing absurd, or unjust is contain'd in it, and that every Subject conform himself to the Law of his Country, as he expects to have his Contract valid in it. Thus nothing is more common, than to agree upon Payment of the Money sometime after the Delivery of the Thing; and also, that the Thing shall not be deliver'd till such a time; the Property, in the mean time, together with the Gain or Hazard attending it, lying in the Seller ^e.

Besides, we frequently practise what the Civilians call ² Additio in diem, which gives the Seller Leave to accept of any better Bargain, that shall offer it self by such a day. This may be done ³ two ways: First, when the Bargain is completed, but upon Condition that it shall be null, if better Terms offer themselves; or secondly, if it be only agreed de futuro, that it shall be a Bargain, if better Offers are not made ^f. In the former case, the Property passs over to the Buyer; in the latter, it remains in the Seller, till the Completion of the Contract.

What they call ⁴ Lex Commissoria makes ⁵ void the Bargain, if the Price be not paid by such a Day. And in this Case, either the Seller may immediately deliver the Goods, and in Default of the Payment, claim

⁷ The Roman Lawyers say also, That in this last Case the Seller is bound to Damages and Gains, i. e. he ought to indemnify the Buyer from the Loss he has had, or the Profit he has mis'd of by his Delay. Si res vendita non tradatur, in id quod interest, agitur; hoc est, quod rem habere interest emptoris, — cum per venditorem steterit, quo minus rem tractat, omnis utilitas emptoris in aestimationem venit; quæ modo circa ipsam rem consistit. Neque enim, si potuit ex vino (pata) negotiari, & lucrum facere, id aestimandum est, non magis quam si triticum emerit, &c. Dig. lib. 19.
